"Once again good cooperative law enforcement work by federal and local agencies has led to a Mexican drug kingpin's losing millions of dollars worth of meth and cocaine," said U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias. "These arrests and seizures remind us that metro Atlanta remains a major drug distribution hub. But we will maintain our focus on attacking these drug trafficking organizations until they decide that they don't want to risk operating in our communities."

Neighbors Aghast At Drug Bust Rental House In Clayton Full Of 'Ice' (AJC)

By Kathy Jefcoats, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 25, 2006

Neighbors in the otherwise quiet Old South subdivision in eastern Clayton County were stunned to learn Tuesday that the mud brown ranch on the corner was a stash house containing, police say, $27 million in illegal drugs.

"I was just floored, scared for the kids, my family, and saddened at the state of the community is such that I have to educate my kid more about drugs," neighbor Dale Shaw said.

"It's just insane. God knows what goes on right under your nose."

DOJ_NMG_0085899

U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency Administration agents raided the well-kept home at the corner of Wood Hollow and Old South lanes Monday. U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias said agents took 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine, known as "ice," and 72 kilograms of cocaine from the home.

Three Mexican citizens, Leonardo Garcia-Miranda, 30, of Hapeville and Jonesboro residents Ramon Luis Soto-Maciel, 29, and Rafael Heredia-Ramos, 42, are charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crystal methamphetamine, federal officials said.

Soto-Maciel and Heredia-Ramos rented the Jonesboro home from its owner, a former long-term resident, who now lives in McDonough, said neighbors Coley and Sandra McWilliams.

They said the men had only been there a few weeks. "[The owner] tried to sell it, but no one wants to buy in Clayton County," Coley McWilliams said. "Clayton has become a mecca for crime, it's terrible."

The owner could not be reached for comment Tuesday night.

Neighbors said the men kept to themselves.

"They did a lot of yard work," Sandra McWilliams said. "I never saw a lot of cars or even visitors over there. They weren't noisy or anything."

Clayton County Assistant Police Chief Jeff Turner said the men kept a low profile.

"But that's what you'd expect if you had that amount of drugs and money around," he said. "You'd keep to yourself, not attract any attention."

Although agents reported only finding the drugs, Shaw wondered about the presence of guns, another safety factor.

"With that kind of stash and money, there is usually fully automatic weapons," he said. "That is a definite concern."

On Monday, DEA agents and DeKalb County police made a controlled purchase of about

1 kilogram of cocaine from Soto-Maciel, Nahmias said. A confidential source and Miranda, who allegedly brokered the deal, were stopped shortly after leaving the site of the transaction, he said.

The cocaine was recovered, and Miranda was arrested. A subsequent consent search of Miranda's Hapeville home resulted in the discovery of about 4 ounces of "ice," packaging materials and a scale used to weigh drugs, Nahmias said.

DEA agents continued their surveillance on Soto-Maciel after the transaction was completed. After visiting and exiting the Jonesboro home, Soto-Maciel was approached by DEA agents.

He fled, throwing down a package in the process, authorities said. Soto-Maciel was caught and the package, allegedly containing ice, was recovered.

Ramos was seen standing in the doorway of the Jonesboro home and was detained. Agents then got written consent from Ramos and Soto-Maciel to search the house.

The arrests are the culmination of a monthlong federal investigation by U.S. Department of Drug Enforcement Agency Administration and DeKalb Police Department.

DEA Seizes $27 Million In Meth, Cocaine (ND)

News-Daily, October 24, 2006

The United States Drug Enforcement Administration and a metro-area drug task force has seized 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine and 72 kilograms of cocaine from a Jonesboro house.

The seized drugs are worth an estimated street value of $27 million, United States Attorney David Nahmias said.

DEA officials believe the drugs, seized in a bust Monday, were being delivered to the house from Mexico and stashed there. They were then being delivered from Mexico to 2829 Wood Hollow Lane in Jonesboro and then distributed from Jonesboro to be sold on the street in Atlanta and in other cities along the East Coast, officials said.

DEA Special Weapons and Tactics unit, assisted by uniformed Clayton County Police officers, DeKalb County Police and the DeKalb County Sheriff's Office, raided the house Monday, arresting three men and seizing the drugs along with drug paraphernalia and large amounts of cash.

The agencies' cooperation led to "a Mexican drug kingpin in Mexico losing millions and millions of dollars," Nahmias said.

DOJ_NMG_0085900

The three men were all citizens of Mexico and are allegedly connected to a Mexican drug cartel. Ramon Luis Soto-Maciel, 29, and Rafael Heredia-Ramos, 42, were living in Jonesboro. Leonardo Garcia-Miranda, 30, was living in Hapeville.

The men are facing federal charges of conspiring to distribute meth and cocaine.

DEA Special Agent in Charge Sherri F. Strange said the seizure is a sign that Atlanta continues to be a major hub for drug trafficking, especially meth.

"What we cannot be numb to is there are real people out there using meth," she said. "Let every smuggler hear me loud and clear: DEA and our law enforcement partners will not rest until every dope dealing, poison peddling meth distributor is behind bars."

Fifty to 75 percent of all meth seized on the East Coast is seized in Atlanta, Strange said.

Clayton Police Assistant Chief Jeff Turner said the drug bust is an example of what can be done when law enforcement agencies work together.

"This is just a small amount of effort," Turner said. "This is what we can do if we all work together."

Turner said the Clayton Police had not received any calls about the house because "stash houses" don't have the sort of high-intensity traffic that attracts neighbors' attention to houses where people are dealing drugs.

"Stash houses" can be identified, Strange said, by the fact that no one comes or goes from the house, someone is staked out watching the house and lights are always on.

Turner said Wood Hollow Lane has not been a problem area for Clayton Police. There was an electrical fire at the address a few years ago, but besides that officers had not received calls to the house, Turner said.

"But if you have drugs in Clayton County," Turner said. "We're going to be coming for you. We're coming to get you."

Drug Bust Nets Meth, Thousands In Cash (WSB)

WSB-TV, October 24, 2006

ATLANTA -- Federal agents seize pounds and pounds of meth and cocaine in metro Atlanta – along with thousands of dollars in cash.

This latest drug bust is bringing more than drugs and money – it's also bringing a title Atlanta does not want. Agents tell Channel 2 the metro area is now the largest meth distribution hub on the east coast.

Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration says it's a balancing act. They say they've reduced the number of local meth labs but are working to also crack down on international shipments which make Atlanta number one for meth distribution on the east coast.

For most people it's hard to understand the impact of getting 145 pounds of methamphetamine off the streets.

"What's noteworthy about this case is the 145 pounds of ICE can easily yield over 300,000 dosage units," said DEA Special Agent Sherri Strange.

That's 300,000 hits of the drug that won't happen now. Good news, especially when you consider where agents say Atlanta ranks as a meth distribution hub.

"I think on the east coast, Atlanta is number one unfortunately," said Special Agent Strange.

That means the crimes associated with distributing the drugs stay here as well. Agents just caught three men linked to the Mexican drug cartel for the drugs – 145 pounds of meth, and 72 kilos of cocaine -- most of them found in a Clayton County home.

The undercover operation that led to the three men who were arrested included DEA agents as well as law enforcement in DeKalb and Clayton counties. Agents say that kind of cooperation will lead to more arrests.

Record Drug Bust In Clayton Co. (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, October 24, 2006

Residents of a Clayton County subdivision were stunned to learn what federal agents found inside a home in their neighborhood.

The Drug Enforcement Agency says they found 145 pounds of ice -- the crystallized form of methamphetamine -- 27 kilos of cocaine, and more than $100,000 in cash.

DOJ_NMG_0085901

Investigators say the home was being used as a stash house by three Mexican nationals who were distributing the drugs for a drug kingpin in Mexico.

The DEA says it's another indication Atlanta is a meth hub.

"With the recent seizures of meth and ice in Atlanta, each one being larger than the other one, I don't want us to become numbed by the numbers," said DEA Special Agent-in-charge, Sherri Strange.

It is the third-largest seizure of meth for the DEA in Atlanta.

Some of the drugs were already being distributed on Metro Atlanta streets. It was a street-level undercover buy in Hapeville that lead police and federal agents to the Clayton County home.

Second Internet Pharmacy Closed (NOTP)

By Mark Waller, East Jefferson Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, October 25, 2006

Sales of painkillers draw DEA attention

Federal agents shut down and searched an Elmwood pharmacy they suspect of shady Internet business practices on Tuesday, marking the second crackdown of its kind in East Jefferson this month, officials said.

Agents removed cardboard boxes of drugs while executing a federal search warrant shortly after 2 p.m. at Pharmacy 101 in the Elmwood Plaza Shopping Center on Jefferson Highway at Edwards Avenue. Workers at nearby businesses said they were relieved.

"I couldn't be any happier," about the pharmacy's closing, said Al Alcock, owner of nearby Big Easy Tools. "I think almost everybody here's noticed something weird going on ever since they opened up. Some of the people were questionable whether they were desirable."

Unlike the previously shuttered Elite Pharmacy, located farther west off Jefferson Highway in River Ridge, Pharmacy 101 began as a retail operation about two years ago and later added Internet sales, investigators said.

Elite sold prescription drugs exclusively on the Internet and took no walk-in patients, so when agents arrived there Oct. 10, neighbors said they had never noticed anything troubling.

But similar to Elite, Drug Enforcement Administration officials said huge purchases of painkillers drew their attention to Pharmacy 101. They said the pharmacy was Louisiana's largest purchaser of oxycodone, used in Oxycontin, and the third-biggest purchaser of hydrocodone, found in Lorcet, Lortab and Vicodin.

Officials did not specify the amounts of drugs processed at the pharmacy, but they removed several boxes of Lorcet and Lortab.

They said the pharmacy also had supplies of the anti-anxiety drug alprazolam, known as Xanax, the muscle relaxant carisoprodol, known as Soma, the painkiller hydromorphone, found in Dilaudid, and the painkiller methadone.

William Renton, special agent in charge of the New Orleans DEA office, said the pharmacy raised concerns similar to Elite by filling online prescriptions between doctors and patients in different states, meaning the prescribing doctors could not have properly examined the patients.

He said the handling and storage of controlled substances at Pharmacy 101 was sloppy, including drugs kept in cardboard boxes scattered on the floor.

He said the pharmacy's ownership was hazy, with the business changing hands recently and the new owners failing to secure the state and federal registrations necessary to run a pharmacy.

Both the DEA and the Louisiana Board of Pharmacy investigated Tuesday, as Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies helped manage the scene. Nobody was arrested.

"We determined that this location is a hazard to the public interest," Renton said, standing in front of the closed pharmacy. "We decided to seize the inventory of this location."

The Louisiana secretary of state lists the pharmacy's directors as Harry H. Harris III and Robert L. Richey. Harris could not be reached Tuesday. Asked about the pharmacy by telephone, Richey said: "I have no comment with regard to that."

DOJ_NMG_0085902

The state Pharmacy Board listed Cheryl A. Batiste as the pharmacist in charge at Pharmacy 101. Attempts to reach Batiste were unsuccessful Tuesday.

During the raid, beginning about 9:30 a.m. and lasting all day, several customers arrived at the pharmacy only to be turned away by deputies. The neon "Open" sign was off and the door was locked.

"These are good people," said Margaret Vedrenne of Chalmette, after finding the pharmacy closed and growing irritated by the commotion.

Cassandra Boudreaux of Metairie said the closing prevented her from being able to fill a painkiller prescription because she needed the pharmacy to contact her doctor to verify that it could not provide her medicine, allowing the doctor to write another prescription she could use elsewhere.

"I just need them to void it and fax it back to my doctor," Boudreaux said. "I won't use them no more," she said about the pharmacy

Renton said the raids Tuesday and earlier in the month were part of a nationwide crackdown on Internet pharmacies. Also Tuesday, he said, investigators searched the office and residence of an Internet provider in Houma related to Pharmacy 101.

. . . . . .

Mark Waller can be reached at mwaller@timespicayune.com or (504) 883-7056.

Texas Drug-run Ends In 5 Arrests, Half-ton Of Pot (FWCOM)

By Dionne Waugh

FortWayne.com, October 25, 2006

Federal prosecutors have accused five men of drug distribution in the transportation of 1,000 pounds of marijuana – packaged in bales – from Texas to Fort Wayne.

Juaquin Tapia, 54, of Brownsville, Texas; Andres Cuellar, 44, of La Rosita Coahullia, Mexico; Jose Ramirez, 57, of Fort Wayne; Jose Hernandez, 40, of Goshen; and Enedeo Rodriguez Jr., 25, of Warsaw were all charged last week with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute more than 100 kilograms of marijuana. Hernandez has also been charged with possession with intent to distribute more than 100 kilograms of marijuana.

The charges were announced this week.

According to federal court documents, an undercover Texas Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent tipped off authorities to the plan.

According to the agent, Tapia hired him to drive the drugs to Fort Wayne, telling him he would be paid $100 a pound and initially giving him $500. Cuellar told the undercover agent to contact Hernandez when he arrived in Fort Wayne, court records stated.

Under control of customs' agents, the marijuana was transported to Indianapolis and then Fort Wayne on Oct. 16. Surveillance units from customs, Indiana State Police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Indianapolis Police Department worked together on the case.

In Fort Wayne, the undercover agent contacted Hernandez, who brought the agent and drugs to a house in the 1700 block of Gable Road and that is owned by Ramirez, according to court records.

Hernandez called Ramirez and told him "the girls are in town," which is slang for drugs, court records stated.

Hernandez paid the undercover agent $14,000 in cash and said Ramirez had between $15,000 and $20,000 in the house and would pay him when he arrived, according to court records.

Officers raided the house when the men split up later that night. After searching the house, officers found 83 bundles, or about 1,000 pounds, of marijuana, plus packing materials, scales, $14,500 in cash, a loaded .380-caliber firearm and 20 to 30 additional pounds of marijuana, according to court records.

All five men were arrested. When questioned by agents, Hernandez said he would be paid $10,000 for his role in the delivery, and that he had brought marijuana to Ramirez's house before, court records said.

Hernandez also said that he and Rodriguez were the distributors and Rodriguez was the broker who made the payment, according to court records.

DOJ_NMG_0085903

dwaugh@jg.net

4 Face Charges After Raid Of Green Cross Dispensary (DB)

Daily Breeze, October 24, 2006

Federal agents seized about 70 pounds of marijuana along with nearly 100 pot plants, a shotgun and a small amount of cash during last week's raid of a medical marijuana dispensary in Torrance, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman said Monday.

Though the DEA claimed no arrests, police working for a county task force jailed four people who arrived later that day to sell cannabis to the co-op.

Facing charges of possession and transportation of a controlled substance with intent to sell are Brian Keldoff, 47, of Lawndale; Cory Zila, 20, of Mammoth Lakes; Kelly Culver, 26, of Newport Beach; and John Ornguze, 24, of Ladera Ranch.

Authorities began their search about 2:15 p.m. Thursday in the 22900 block of Hawthorne Boulevard, where Green Cross of Torrance had been in business since April.

Witnesses said police and federal DEA agents blocked the entrances of Green Cross' parking lot before a half-dozen or so officers approached the business with their guns drawn.

Marijuana-laced food was among the items seized, DEA Special Agent Sarah Pullen said.

Following the raid, four people were taken into custody after they allegedly attempted to sell pot to undercover detectives working for LA IMPACT, a countywide task force with an emphasis on drug trafficking.

"Within a five-hour time span, four people came in and essentially offered to sell marijuana to the facility," Torrance police Lt. Rod Irvine said.

That led to the additional confiscation of more than 20 pounds of pot and more than 60 vials of hash oil, a concentrated form of cannabis.

Though state law permits the regulated growth of marijuana for medical use, the would-be vendors were not authorized to cultivate or sell the drug, Irvine said.

Investigators searched the dispensary because they suspect Green Cross director Rafael Chavez and his brother, Edward Chavez, have been illegally selling pot to customers with no medical conditions, according to a DEA affidavit.

Chavez could not be reached for comment Monday, but he has repeatedly defended his establishment, saying it offers "compassion" to patients suffering from chronic pain and disease.

In 1996, California voters passed Proposition 215, allowing doctors to recommend marijuana to patients afflicted with cancer, anorexia, AIDS, glaucoma and other illnesses.

But the state initiative does not supersede federal law, which maintains it is illegal to grow, possess or use the drug.

"For the most part, I don't know what's going on, but I do think it's not good for all these patients that are relying on this," Chavez told the Daily Breeze after the raid last week. "It's legal in California, and I'm being harassed by federal agents."

Green Cross opened its doors in Torrance on April 20, prompting some concern among local officials. On Aug. 1, the City Council responded by passing an ordinance denying business licenses to marijuana dispensaries and other establishments considered out of step with federal law.

With its current license set to expire in December, the dispensary remained open.

In the weeks prior to Thursday's search, investigators surveyed the dispensary at least twice. According to the affidavit, a team of agents and police officers watched 25 customers stop by the co-op during a two-hour span on Oct. 10.

Police pulled over the customers as they drove away, and those who were questioned admitted purchasing various types and quantities of the drug, which ranged from $55 to $70 for an eighth of an ounce.

Pullen, the DEA spokeswoman, said Monday that no charges had been filed as a result of the evidence collected during last week's search. But, she added, the investigation is ongoing.

"Obviously," she said, "we build cases in an attempt to dismantle and disrupt organizations."

Imported Meth: State's New Scourge? (INDYSTAR)

By Paul Bird

DOJ_NMG_0085904

The Indianapolis Star, October 25, 2006

'Ice' heats up amid war against Indiana-made drug

Greenwood police have seized $300,000 of methamphetamine -- a drug that police in Indiana have been fighting hard to eradicate -- in a bust involving a highly addictive and often-imported variety called "ice."

About methamphetamine

• Ingestion: Smoked, snorted, swallowed, injected.

• Sample of ingredients: Alcohol; ether; benzene; toluene/paint thinner; Freon; acetone; chloroform; camp stove fuel; anhydrous ammonia; iodine crystals; red phosphorous; black iodine; lye; Drano; battery acid/sulfuric acid; Epsom salts.

• Indiana meth vs. Mexican ice: In Indiana, clandestine labs are operated in many places, including houses, sheds and moving vehicles, and the meth that's made is a very basic form, often diluted with chemicals. The ice methamphetamine originating in Mexico is refined further to form crystals that turn the substance into a purer, more potent drug.

Sources: U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Greenwood police, Associated Press

Police say ice, often three times as pure and expensive as its Indiana-made counterpart, typically travels a route that begins in Mexico, crosses the border and then is distributed across the United States.

"They jam our borders with up to a dozen semis at a time, and they know that every one of them can't be checked," said Matt Fillenwarth, investigations commander for Greenwood police. "If four trucks are found loaded with drugs, that means eight more got through."

Greenwood police arrested two men Friday and seized 2 pounds of crystal methamphetamine, nicknamed "ice" on the street because it is almost transparent.

Federal authorities had warned local police that Mexican ice had been found in the northeastern United States and soon would be reaching the Midwest, said Greenwood Police Chief Joe Pitcher.

"This is even more telling, because finding this substance here is telling us the local meth flow is drying up and the users are seeking a foreign source, and we know it is from Mexico," Pitcher said.

Ten Greenwood police officers and a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent arrested the two suspects after the men traveled to a McDonald's restaurant at 1197 S. Park Drive, just off I-65 in Greenwood, to deliver a pound of the drug. The deal was made through a police informant.

Arrested Friday on charges of dealing methamphetamine were Vincente Linares-Avila, 26, 1900 block of Fox Hill Drive in Indianapolis, and Oscar Medival-Cota, 26, who is thought to be an Arizona resident.

A man agreed by telephone to sell 4 pounds of the drug to an undercover narcotics officer for $12,500 per pound, Fillenwarth said. They arrived at the restaurant about 7 p.m. and were arrested as they were leaving.

Police found a pound of the drug in the car and another pound at a house near 62nd Street and Michigan Road in Indianapolis, where one of the men lived. The drug was described as highly refined, and DEA chemists in Chicago will examine it.

"That's the most ice I've ever seen in one arrest," Fillenwarth said.

The network that police suspect the two men belong to is predominantly Hispanic, and authorities think the drugs were smuggled from Mexico to Arizona before being transported to Indiana, Fillenwarth said.

Authorities also suspect members of that network to be what are known as "polydrug dealers," because they work in professional labs where they turn out not only ice, but also marijuana, cocaine and black-tar heroin.

Fillenwarth described the ice police seized Friday as being about 90 percent pure, compared with meth produced in Indiana, which is only about 20 percent to 30 percent pure.

"It only takes a fraction of it to get high and addicted," he said. "It is potent stuff."

Dealers often "cut" the drug, or dilute it, to increase their profit.

"This stuff we confiscated could be at least tripled in volume, if not more," Fillenwarth said. "And what was selling for $300 a gram originally now is selling for $900 a gram."

DOJ_NMG_0085905

Police think local meth production had been declining recently. They cited a 2005 state law that restricted access to cold and allergy medicines that contained a key ingredient in meth's production. In the year since the law's inception, meth lab seizures dropped 25 percent statewide, from 1,109 to 846.

Fillenwarth said the decline in clandestine labs has enhanced the Mexican drug business.

"These Mexican labs are professional labs and turning out lots of illegal drugs," he said. "Six years ago, the troublesome drug was crack cocaine. Now the problem is ice, and next year it could be something new.

"Ice makes someone crazy when they are coming down after being up without sleep for three or four days straight," he said. "They'll do some terrible things."

Call Star reporter Paul Bird at (317) 444-2709.

Doctor Gets Long Sentence For 'prescription Mill' (FLJOURNAL)

By Kim Crawford

Flint Journal (MI), October 25, 2006

A one-time Flint Township doctor who was convicted earlier this year for distribution of narcotic drugs will spend the rest of his life in prison, a federal judge ruled Monday.

"You were running a prescription mill," U.S. District Judge Paul V. Gadola told Mukunda D. Mukherjee of Fenton, who formerly practiced as an M.D. "What you've done was destructive to people, destructive to families and destructive to society."

Mukherjee, 64, said that he had made "bad decisions" and that his life had gone into "a downward spiral." His wife of more than 30 years also is divorcing him, he said.

Mukherjee was indicted in

June 2004 on one charge of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and 53 felony and misdemeanor counts of illegal distribution of various prescription pain killers, including Oxycontin, Vicodin, morphine and drugs with codeine.

Patricia Garner, a worker in Mukherjee's office, and her husband, Jason K. Garner, were also indicted.

The investigation had started some four months earlier. Tipped off by a confidential informant, agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the state-local narcotics units, the Flint Area Narcotics Group and the Bay Area Narcotics Enforcement Team started a probe. The Genesee County Sheriff's Department was also involved, said the U.S. attorney's office in Detroit in a statement released after the sentencing.

During the investigation, undercover officers saw long lines of people, some from other states, waiting to get into Mukherjee's office on Professional Drive in Flint Township to get prescriptions for powerful pain killers.

The prospective patients paid doctor's office employees to move up on the waiting list to see the doctor. Two undercover officers and the confidential informant were given prescriptions of Vicodin, cough syrup with codeine, a morphine-type drug and other controlled prescription drugs on multiple occasions.

A detective testifying about her dealing with Mukherjee said that she was never examined by the doctor. He typically charged $45 for the first prescription and $90 for a second, postdated prescription, while his employees charged fees of $20, $50 and $60 to people who wanted to get in to see him.

The Garners pleaded guilty in April of this year and were sentenced - she to 2 years in prison, and he to 6 months.

Mukherjee was convicted on 44 of the counts against him in a trial this year.

Mukherjee's combination of 12 consecutive 20-year sentences, 14 consecutive 5-year sentences and 18 1-year sentences, totaling 328 years, will effectively keep him in prison for the rest of his life.

The doctor's attorney said he would appeal the sentence. Mukherjee protested after the sentencing that he had "brought down by criminals" and that he'd only been trying to help people.

The government also has seized $169,000 from Mukherjee's five bank accounts, according to court documents.

FLINT: Doctor Gets 328 Years For Giving Drugs To Addicts (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, October 25, 2006

A federal judge has sentenced a Flint-area doctor to 328 years in prison for illegally prescribing prescription drugs, one of the stiffest sentences ever handed down in an illegal prescription case in eastern Michigan.

U.S. District Judge Paul Gadola imposed the sentence Monday on Mukunda Dev Mukherjeree, 64, of Fenton. A jury convicted Mukherjeree in February of 44 counts of illegally prescribing Oxycontin, Vicodin and Phenergan with codeine and morphine at his office in Flint in 2003-04.

The counts carried maximum penalties of 1, 5 and 20 years in prison, and Gadola took the unusual step of making them all consecutive.

Gadola also ordered Mukherjeree to forfeit $150,000 in assets.

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said the severity of the sentence "should be an object lesson to any unethical medical professionals who would use their prescription-writing authority to put dangerous narcotics into the hands of addicts."

The Drug Enforcement Administration, the Bay Area Narcotics Enforcement Team, the Flint Area Narcotics Group and the Genesee County Sheriff's Department investigated the case.

HARRISON TOWNSHIP: Meth lab on wheels has resident facing charges

It seemed like any other red two-door sedan wheeling over Harrison Township roads.

But after a traffic stop, Macomb County Sheriff's deputies soon realized the 1993 Grand Prix was a portable methamphetamine lab.

The woman operating the car, Tina Zilliox, is scheduled for a preliminary exam next Tuesday in 41B District Court in Clinton Township. She faces multiple felony charges, including operating a meth lab.

The charges stem from an incident about 1:30 a.m. Oct. 16, when deputies say they spotted Zilliox, 42, a township resident, driving erratically. When they pulled over the car, they discovered she had an expired registration and an outstanding warrant in Flint for meth and marijuana possession, the sheriff's office said Tuesday.

Inside the trunk was a cooler bag with household products commonly used to cook meth. The traffic stop was then treated as a hazardous-materials scene, requiring assistance from a State Police unit that secures meth labs.

Sheriff's Capt. Tony Wickersham said the items were "all chemicals that you can buy over the counter at any store, but when mixed together and inhaled, can create a dangerous area."

Zilliox is being held in Macomb County Jail in lieu of a $20,000 bond.

SOUTHFIELD: Hearing today on plan to clear trees for church

Just west of the Code House at Mulberry and Civic Center is a woods that could be displaced by a church.

A public hearing on a site plan for the Mitcham A.M.E. Churchall is set for 6:30 p.m. today in the Southfield Pavilion, 26000 Evergreen. A Planning Commission recommendation is to go to the City Council.

The church owns 5 acres, and Southfield owns a 4 1/2-acre woods west of the house, said Nik Banda, planning director.

More than 40% of the trees would be taken to make way for the proposed 9,100-square-foot church, he said.

The city is requiring a wall around three sides of the building to shield residents from lights and noise.

Compiled by David Ashenfelter, Christy Oyama-Arboscello and Julie Edgar.

Alleged Pot Farmer, After A Smug Remark, Hears The Feds' Retort (STNIA)

By John Annese, Staten Island Advance

Staten Island Advance (NY), October 25, 2006

N.C. man facing 10 to life on new charges involving an Island warehouse

More than a year ago, when federal drug agents raided his 600-plant marijuana warehouse in Port Richmond, Scott Lawler said the loss was disappointing, but "it could have been worse," the feds allege.

Now it's worse.

A federal grand jury has indicted the North Carolina man on federal drug manufacturing charges -- charges that could bring him 10 years to life in prison.

On Aug. 29, 2005, agents with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration armed with a search warrant raided a warehouse at 116 Faber St. in Port Richmond, within 300 feet of two churches and 600 feet of a Catholic school.

Inside, they found about 600 marijuana plants "in various stages of maturity," as well as a number of plants partially flushed down a toilet, according to papers filed in Brooklyn Federal Court.

DOJ_NMG_0085907

That day, the feds arrested Grzegorz and Adriana Lyp, the New Jersey couple who were allegedly taking care of the warehouse when the raid took place. Adriana was never charged, while Grzegorz, who waived a grand jury indictment back in May, faces drug manufacture charges.

Lawler, whose name was on the warehouse lease and who paid the security deposit with a personal check, was arrested this summer. The grand jury indicted him this month.

About a week after the raid, law enforcement officials intercepted the Lawler's "it could be worse" conversation, the feds allege. Lawler said he still had some "seeds," and that he'd help start up a new location when he came back to New York for the Christmas holidays.

Lawler's attorney, Bradley D. Simon, declined comment yesterday, and a message left at Lawler's Wilmington, N.C., home was not returned.

The company that owns the warehouse belongs to Pasquale (Pat) Pappalardo, of Joe & Pat's Pizzeria in Castleton Corners.

Pappalardo expressed shock yesterday about the DEA's marijuana find, though he remembered a visit from detectives at his real estate office last year.

Though he didn't recall meeting Lawler, Pappalardo said the warehouse's tenants paid month-to-month and told him they were using it as an art studio to create sculptures.

"Because nobody was ever there, they were the only people in the building, and they were paying on time, there was no reason to question it," he said. "I guess you never know, it's a different business they were in."

The DEA caught wind of the pot-growing operation back in March 2005, when a confidential source who had flipped after a drug conviction tipped them off about the warehouse, according to court papers.

Agents visited the brick two-story Faber Street building several times. It looked abandoned -- the windows were boarded up, according to court papers.

But in April 2005 , the agents saw people visiting the building to drop off construction material. Two agents walked by the building and smelled "a strong skunk-like odor," court papers allege. And later on, a drug-sniffing dog sniffed out traces of a controlled substance at the front doors.

When the DEA checked electricity records, agents found the building spent $1,300 a month on power -- enough power to run a deli six days a week, and certainly more than a boarded-up warehouse would need, the feds allege.

And the city's water inspectors hadn't been able to read the warehouse's water meters for two years, because they couldn't get access to the building, the feds allege.

When the DEA came knocking on Aug. 29, 2005, they spotted Grzegorz Lyp get out of his car and enter the warehouse, according to court papers. His wife, Adriana, waited in the car.

The feds approached her and asked her to call her husband on her cell phone. And even though the agents told her not to tip him off to their presence, Mrs. Lyp immediately blurted out, "The cops are here."

One of the agents talked to Lyp over the phone and asked he come downstairs, and Lyp responded that he'd be out "in one minute," court papers said.

When Lyp didn't emerge, the agents went in. The agents were about to open a steel door on the second floor when Lyp opened the door, revealing the marijuana harvest, the feds say.

"A number of plants were recovered from the toilet, in an apparent attempt to discard of them," DEA agent Gaetano DiPasquale wrote in one court statement.

Lawler has been released on $200,000 bail, and is forbidden from contacting Lyp. Lyp has been released on $400,000 bail.

John Annese is a news reporter for the Advance. He may be reached at annese@siadvance.com.

Convicted Doc Accuses Feds Of Double Cross (MDH)

By Jo Ann Hustis, Herald Reporter

Morris Daily Herald, October 25, 2006

Dr. Edwin to serve 6 months for not tracking painkillers

DWIGHT - Dr. Parambaloth Edwin believes the federal government spent five years and $5 million just to hand him six months in jail.

"A lot of money for nothing," he said Monday, in the wake of his sentencing in federal district court in Chicago for failure to accurately track tens of thousands of tablets of prescription painkillers he dispensed through the years to patients.

"They sentenced me for not accounting for 50,000 pills. They'd taken the records from my computer and such, so there was no record. That's illegal.

"You cannot confiscate records from a practice," he added.

"It was all taken without leaving any records and lists, so we had nothing to go on."

Edwin, 66, a retired physician who practiced 26 years locally and in Wilmington, is to begin serving his sentence in January 2007.

He pled guilty Thursday to failure to keep accurate and complete records of hydroconone, a generic form of Vicodin, an addictive form of painkiller. He was also fined $5,000 in the case.

Grundy County Coroner John Callahan said the physician was brought to the attention of authorities as far back as 2003 through investigations, toxicology screening, and interviews with families by his office and those of other area coroners.

"They had already started the investigation. Our reports, which we turned over to them in Chicago, greatly enhanced their prosecution of the case," he said.

Edwin is a native of India who obtained his medical degree in Switzerland and did his residency in Grant Hospital in Chicago. He pled guilty to felony record-keeping in exchange for dropping more-serious charges of distributing controlled substances.

He said Monday the Drug Enforcement Agency cleaned out his office during the case. He was charged in June 2005 on 17 counts of allegedly dispensing painkillers to patients without a legitimate medical purpose.

The indictment cited Edwin with illegally dispensing 685 hydrocodone tablets in various strengths to 12 unnamed patients between Aug. 14, 2001, and March 18, 2003.

Assistant U.S. District Attor-ney Madeleine Murphy said Thursday, however, prosecutors could not prove Edwin was responsible for the deaths, as the victims had also taken illegal narcotics.

Callahan said it is believed Grundy County had four deaths stemming from prescriptions issued by the doctor.

"And, there could have been more," he noted. "Sometimes people don't keep medications in the bottles in which the prescriptions came. Sometimes these drugs are being sold on the street and so we don't know where they came from."

Edwin said in his 26 years of practice in Illinois, no malpractice judgments were recorded against him in the National Practitioners' Databank.

"They said I killed patients," he said. "(Patients die) in any practice, but these were not due to my care. None of them had any connection with my treatment and medication - there is no proof of anything," he said.

"They died of natural causes due to illicit drug abuse. Usually if (the DEA) has evidence, they don't drop a case. They spent five years and $5 million trying to press a case against me."

Edwin said the investigation into his practice began in 2001.

"They thought we had big drug dealings going on," he said. "In the plea agreement, there was nothing about any drug dealing. They had no proof."

Edwin said he pled guilty because, under the plea agreement, the DEA was to drop all but the record-keeping charges.

"As soon as I signed the agreement, they tried increasing the charges," he added. "I was told it would be a probation. As soon as I signed, they sent the report to the judge, saying I should receive more than six months."

Edwin said he believed he was wronged.

"Some kind of a double-cross," he noted. "It's not appealable. These kinds of pleas are not appealable."

The doctor can apply for reinstatement of his medical license in April 2008. He may do this, he said, because many retired physicians want to maintain their medical license to work part-time.

"To keep up with medicine, not to make money," he said.

Callahan called the issue a bizarre case.

"You'd like to think after someone spends time and effort and years to become a doctor, they wouldn't abuse the privilege of prescribing medication," he said.

"This certainly doesn't reflect on the doctors in our area. But, it's nice to know people like that are being dealt with accordingly."

Edwin said the $5 million to put him behind bars is his estimate.

"A lot of money for nothing. Go and (seize) all these (records) and find nothing behind it. The (DEA) tried to do audits - a criminal investigation. They are not detectives or investigators. I don't know why they didn't put DEA agents on the case. Looking for promotions, I guess," he said.

"The bottom line is, they spent so much money to put some doctor in jail for six months."

Pot Trial Pushes A Hot Button (FRESBEE)

By John Ellis, The Fresno Bee

Fresno Bee, October 25, 2006

Prosecutor says medical marijuana backers should not wear buttons in court.

In the upcoming trial of Merced marijuana activist Dustin Costa, prosecutor Karen Escobar says the federal government — just like the defendant — has the right to a fair trial.

To that end, she is asking a federal judge to prohibit Costa's supporters from wearing buttons, T-shirts or anything else that promotes legalizing medical marijuana.

Such "paraphernalia," she said, could have an "improper influence on jurors required to follow the law."

The request prompted Costa's defense attorney, Robert Rainwater, to point out that Escobar was wearing a lanyard with "DEA" on it, for the Drug Enforcement Administration — which could bias a jury in the opposite direction.

Why should she have that right, Rainwater said, when supporters of Costa and medical marijuana might not.

U.S. District Judge Anthony W. Ishii did not rule on Escobar's request, but said it was in a gray area of First Amendment free-speech rights versus the right to a fair trial.

Monday's exchange in U.S. District Court in Fresno came as both sides hashed out motions before Costa's trial, scheduled to begin Nov. 7.

A three-count indictment charges Costa with growing more than 100 marijuana plants — equivalent to nearly 9 pounds — with the intent to distribute. Costa also faces a charge of possession of a firearm "in furtherance of drug trafficking crime."

But this is more than a simple drug-trafficking case. Costa was president of the Merced Patients Group, a private cannabis club in Merced that claimed 230 members.

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which gives ill people the right to use marijuana for medicinal purposes when cleared by a doctor.

In June 2005, however, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the federal government could prosecute people who use marijuana for medicinal purposes.

Costa was arrested a short time later.

Rainwater already has said Costa believed he was growing and distributing marijuana while it was still legal under state law.

Waiting in line behind Costa at Fresno's federal courthouse are at least one — and possibly two — similar cases. In some hearings, Costa's included, supporters have shown up in T-shirts with slogans such as "Marijuana — better than Ritalin."

In making her case, Escobar referenced a 1995 Superior Court trial in San Jose where a man was convicted of murdering his estranged wife's fiancé. The victim's family sat in the front row of the gallery during the trial, wearing buttons with the murdered man's picture.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the verdict and ordered a new trial, saying the buttons may have biased jurors.

Ishii acknowledged supporters of either defendants or the prosecution could be affected in the matter: "This is one of those issues that cuts both ways."

DOJ_NMG_0085910

The reporter can be reached atjellis@fresnobee.com or (559) 441-6320.

White House To Seek More Colombia Aid (KCS)

By Joshua Goodman

The Kansas City Star, October 25, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia - President Bush will ask Congress to maintain current aid levels to Colombia - running at more $600 million yearly - to support the Latin American nation's fight against terrorism and drug trafficking, an administration official said Tuesday.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, leading a high level U.S. delegation to Colombia, said the mostly military aid would remain unchanged through at least 2008.

"For the past few years we've extended about $600 million per year to the Colombian people for all these programs and our administration in Washington will ask Congress to maintain that level in 2007 and 2008," Burns said.

The call for continued funding is a major boost to President Alvaro Uribe, Washington's staunchest ally in Latin America, and comes despite the failure of efforts to reduce the country's cocaine trade.

"In any counterterrorism or counter-narcotics campaign you sometimes have to adjust strategy to be effective as conditions change," Burns said. "We'll be open to any suggestions the Colombian government makes."

U.S. officials have said recently that aid for the drug eradication strategy known as Plan Colombia, which has cost American taxpayers more than $4 billion since 2000, should be gradually reduced as Colombian authorities take over more duties.

Legislators in both countries have questioned the effectiveness of a relentless aerial spraying campaign of coca plantations that is the cornerstone of the strategy. According to the most recent U.S. government survey, coca production surged 26 percent in 2005 to 355,800 acres.

Burns said the Bush administration would also ask Congress to extend unilateral trade privileges for all four drug-producing Andean nations - Bolivia, Colombia,(AP) - Ecuador and Peru.

Colombia Aid To Stay Same Despite Rights Allegations (MH)

By Sibylla Brodzinsky And Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, October 25, 2006

BOGOTA - The Bush administration plans to keep U.S. aid to the Colombian military at current levels through 2008 despite human rights and corruption scandals that already have delayed some U.S. disbursements, a top official said Tuesday.

"We intend to ask our Congress to maintain the current level of funding" for 2007 and 2008, said Nicholas Burns, the State Department's acting No. 2 official, with the title of under secretary of political affairs.

But Burns also noted that he would raise the recent allegations of corruption scandals and human rights abuses in the army, reported by the media and non-government organizations (NGOs) here, during his two-day visit.

"We raise these issues when there are allegations made by credible NGOs," he told reporters on his arrival, ``and I will be raising them with Colombian officials."

Burns was accompanied by a high-powered delegation of 15 officials that included Anne Patterson, a former U.S. ambassador in Bogotá who now heads the State Department's anti-drug-trafficking programs.

Originally approved as a $1.3 billion, five-year U.S. effort to help finance a counter-drug campaign, Plan Colombia formally ended in late 2005 with outlays topping $4 billion. The U.S. Congress extended the aid this year as the two countries negotiate a longer-term arrangement. The U.S. money has improved the security situation here, but its impact on the cocaine and heroin industries remains unclear.

MONEY PUT ON HOLD

But State Department officials told The Miami Herald that about $55 million earmarked for the Colombian military for the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 was put on hold over concerns that President Alvaro Uribe's government has not been aggressive enough in pursuing military officers accused of human rights abuses.

DOJ_NMG_0085911

"You need progress, and, frankly, progress hasn't been as fast as we would want," said a State Department official who declined to be quoted by name to speak freely on the subject. ``That's always been part of the problem in Colombia."

The official said there was still enough U.S. money in the pipeline to keep the military programs running for now.

By law, the Bush administration must certify that Colombia is making adequate progress on human rights twice during the year in order to keep the U.S. aid flowing. But this year's certifications have been held up because of the reports of army abuses.

Rights groups consider the certification process a valuable tool to pressure the Uribe administration and the military to move strongly against the violators.

"If you want to see a few cases move, it's much stronger than any noise that the Colombian human rights community is going to be able to make," said Adam Isacson, a Colombia analyst with the Center for International Policy, a Washington-based advocacy group usually critical of the Bush administration.

``There's always the symbolism . . . the fact that Colombia's main military benefactor still has such strong doubts that they can't issue a seal of approval."

SUSPICIOUS EVENTS

In May, 10 members of an elite U.S.-trained counterdrug police were killed by army troops near the southwestern city of Cali. It was initially portrayed as a case of friendly fire, but Colombian prosecutors later alleged the troops were working for drug traffickers.

In Barranquilla, eight army officers and soldiers face criminal charges after six civilians were killed in an operation in August first presented as a kidnap rescue raid. It was later revealed that the deaths were drug related.

Last month, prosecutors opened an investigation of 18 soldiers for the deaths of 29 civilians, whose bodies were allegedly dressed in military fatigues and presented as guerrillas killed in skirmishes.

Local media also revealed details of an investigation into at least two army officers who allegedly paid former guerrillas to stage fake bomb plots in Bogotá ahead of Uribe's August inauguration to a second term. One bomb went off July 31, killing one civilian and wounding 21 others.

Miami Herald correspondent Pablo Bachelet reported from Washington.

Colombia, US Examine Drug Plan (PRENSA)

Prensa Latina, October 25, 2006

Bogota, Oct 24 (Prensa Latina) Colombian President Alvaro Uribe and US Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns are analyzing Tuesday results of the Colombia Plan, which many consider has failed in wiping out the drug trade in this nation.

Until Thursday, Burns will be in Colombia on an official visit accompanied by top functionaries of the departments of State, Defense and Justice, of the Agency for International Development and the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Several analysts and politicians from both countries think the Colombia Plan has also been insufficient in reducing illegal drug crops and eliminating guerrillas in the Andean state.

Local Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo Araujo said that during this visit the two parties will also look at the results of Washington s over $5 billion assistance to the plan.

Araujo pointed out they will tackle US social-military aid to Bogota, their bilateral free trade agreement, tariff preferences, human rights protection, democracy strengthening and advances of the reinsertion process of those demobilized from armed groups, especially from paramilitary guerrillas.

Besides President Uribe, visitors are slated to gather with ministers Araujo, Carlos Holguin, Interior and Justice, and Juan Manuel Santos, Defense, among others.

Rumsfeld Urged To Fight Afghan Opium (AP)

By Dennis Conrad, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Two GOP congressmen have told Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that more needs to be done about Afghanistan's opium crisis because of increased violence and terrorism against coalition forces.

DOJ_NMG_0085912

The opium and illicit drug trafficking has greatly increased in recent months and threatens to ``totally corrupt all of the new Afghan democratic institutions we support," Illinois Reps. Henry Hyde and Mark Kirk said in an Oct. 12 letter.

Hyde is chairman of the House International Relations Committee and is retiring after a 32-year congressional career. Kirk, now serving his third term in Congress, is a former longtime aide to the committee who also has served as an intelligence officer in the Pentagon's war room.

Rumsfeld had no response to the congressmen's letter as of Tuesday, according to Hyde's committee staff.

A Rumsfeld spokeswoman, Air Force Lt. Col. Karen Finn, said the Pentagon intends to respond. ``We take this matter very seriously," she said.

The congressmen suggested that the Drug Enforcement Administration combat the problem by focusing on drug kingpins in Afghanistan, heroin processing labs and drug convoys.

Hyde and Kirk said the convoys that carry the drugs out of the country bring back land mines and modern weapons bought with drug money from the Taliban and other anti-coalition forces.

``We all know the drugs fuel the violence and insurgency, we think that the debate concerning these obvious links is over, and now we need a new policy that addresses both the drugs and related terror, simultaneously," they added.

The congressmen cautioned that the DEA cannot do its job in Afghanistan without military support and assistance, including the Defense Department's military operational and tactical air support for some of the DEA's counterdrug missions.

A coordinated approach needs to be accomplished before the start of the 2007 opium crop, the congressmen said.

Finn said that over the past two years the Defense Department has worked to support DEA efforts to combat the narcotics threat in Afghanistan.

``In accordance with our statutory authorities, the secretary has already authorized Operation Enduring Freedom forces to embed nonmilitary counternarcotics personnel (to include DEA) when operating in areas of known or suspected drug-related activity," she said.

Senator Seeks Change In Afghan Drug Policy (UPI)

United Press International, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 (UPI) -- A U.S. House leader urged the Defense Department to change strategy against Afghan heroin production, saying the existing policy isn't working.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said in a letter to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld the poppy eradication program in Afghanistan is a failure, USA Today said Tuesday. Hyde urged Rumsfeld to help Drug Enforcement Administration agents seek out drug lords and heroin processing centers rather than focus on poppy farmers.

Officials said the poppy eradication effort eliminated about 37,807 acres so far this year, about 7 percent of the acreage cultivated, USA Today said.

In the previously unpublished Oct. 12 letter, Hyde said the drug situation has "increased violence and terrorism" against forces stationed in Afghanistan and is threatening to "totally corrupt" new Afghan policies and programs the United States supports, USA Today said. Others officials, including Rumsfeld, voiced similar concerns that drug money is fueling a resurgence of Taliban and al-Qaida forces in Afghanistan.

Rumsfeld has not responded to Hyde's letter, but a Defense Department spokeswoman said the department is treating the matter seriously, USA Today said.

IMMIGRATION:

DNA Testing A Mixed Bag For Immigrants (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

DNA testing has emerged as a powerful and sometimes controversial tool for U.S. residents seeking to help overseas relatives enter the country legally.

DOJ_NMG_0085913

The tests have been invaluable for thousands of citizens or permanent residents who want to sponsor relatives but lack birth certificates or other documents to prove the family relationship. But some immigration lawyers worry that U.S. authorities are increasingly requiring DNA tests even when the paperwork is in order -- adding substantial costs and delays to an arduous process.

"What's troubling is that it seems like the availability of DNA testing is leading to a greater level of mistrust of identity documents that otherwise would have been readily accepted," said Alison Brown, a lawyer based in Silver Spring.

Last year, about 718,000 people were granted permanent residency or a temporary visa on the basis of being a parent, child or sibling of someone who was a U.S. citizen, permanent resident or temporary visa holder.

Officials at the State and Homeland Security departments said they do not track the number of DNA tests submitted by people seeking to sponsor a relative for a visa. But the AABB (formerly the American Association of Blood Banks), the accrediting organization for laboratories that do DNA testing for immigration applications, receives about 12 e-mails or phone calls a day from people seeking referrals for immigration purposes, a spokeswoman said. At Fairfax Identity Laboratories, one of two DNA laboratories in the Washington region accredited to handle immigration cases, the number of requests for tests has increased about 20 percent, to about 2,000, in the past year, said Joe Chimera, senior vice president.

Immigration lawyers interviewed in the Washington area said officials who process visa applications at U.S. consulates overseas appear to be driving the increase in DNA testing.

"In many consulates, DNA testing has really become the norm," said Daniel Park, whose Alexandria-based practice serves mostly clients from Latin America.

Parastoo Zahedi, a lawyer practicing in Tysons Corner, said she became concerned about that possibility seven months ago when an official at the U.S. consulate in Abu Dhabi, the United Arab Emirates, told one of her clients that he had to submit a DNA test to prove he was related to his 65-year-old mother in Virginia, who was sponsoring him for permanent residency.

Zahedi said she was surprised because the client, a 42-year-old Iranian, had all the documentation normally required to prove his relationship to his mother, including a valid Iranian birth certificate. The Department of Homeland Security had already approved the client's petition -- the first step in any visa application. The interview at the consulate was the final step, in which he was supposed to demonstrate that there was no reason to bar his admission to the United States.

"At first, I thought it was something he said in his interview -- maybe some hesitation in one of his answers that raised suspicions," Zahedi said.

But in the ensuing months, she said, two more Iranian clients with solid documentation were told the same thing at the U.S. consulates in Abu Dhabi and Istanbul.

One of Zahedi's clients, Mehdie Halatai, 72, of Oakton, said his 17-year-old son, Mehran, got the word in Abu Dhabi. "My son said the official told him very simply, 'No DNA test, no visa.' . . . There was no explanation," Halatai said.

Testing ultimately proved the relationship -- as it did for Zahedi's two other clients.

But the test cost about $800, and because there is no U.S. consulate in Iran, the family had to pay hundreds of dollars more in travel expenses to send Mehran Halatai back to Abu Dhabi for the test and a second consular interview. The back-and-forth also has added several months to Mehran Halatai's wait.

Priscilla Labovitz, a lawyer practicing in the District, said a similar situation has delayed a Cameroonian-born client's reunion with his two teenage children in Mali for nearly two years.

"There's no alarm bell that goes off when you look at their documents," she said. "Yet this man has had to put up with hassle after hassle to arrange the DNA tests."

Zahedi wonders why her clients had to submit to them in the first place.

"I think they are being picked on because of where they're from. . . . After all these years of practice, why am I only seeing this coming into use now? It makes no sense unless someone from above is saying that they need to have more scrutiny of people from these places."

Tony Edson, deputy assistant secretary for visa services at the State Department, said consular officials are warned about credibility problems with particular types of documents from particular places. But he said that there is no blanket DNA test requirement for applicants based on nationality and that it is against agency rules for consular officials to require DNA testing in individual cases.

DOJ_NMG_0085914

"Our policy is explicitly that it is not required. It is always voluntary," Edson said.

Edson added that a DNA test is one of a variety of types of supporting evidence that consular officers will accept from applicants whose primary documents are deemed insufficient.

"The confusion may arise," Edson said, from the fact that "we do require applicants to prove they are who they say they are. If everything else they present doesn't prove that, then we may suggest genetic testing."

Some lawyers counter that growing awareness of the accuracy of DNA testing -- which has been available since the late 1980s -- has caused consular officials to become unduly mistrustful of other legitimate forms of evidence.

"It seems like in the past they were more accepting of the fact that a lot of Third World countries may not be as sophisticated in their production of documents as the United States," said David Goren, a lawyer based in Silver Spring. "Now, if there's so much as a typo or some whiteout, it's just assumed that it's a fraudulent document."

Others contend that consular officials have good reason to be wary.

"Look, the consulates are just trying to prevent fraud," said Luis Gonzalez, a lawyer based in Falls Church. "A lot of people think that they can just come to the consulate and say this is my son, when really he's the nephew."

Several lawyers said they have had cases in which a client learned from DNA testing that the child being sponsored was not biologically related.

DNA tests can save considerable time and difficulty for someone like Pedro Antonio Monjaras, 47, a naturalized U.S. citizen living in Annandale who recently brought his 20-year-old daughter over from El Salvador. Monjaras said that he has always supported her financially but that he did not sign her birth certificate until five years ago. As a result, that document was not considered sufficient evidence of their relationship.

Monjaras might have been able to prove his case by submitting receipts for the money transfers he has sent his daughter and by obtaining affidavits from previous neighbors. But Monjaras, a delivery truck driver, said it would have taken months.

"You're here, they're over there, and each step takes forever to organize," he said. "I would literally have had to send people money for the pen and paper for each affidavit."

So when his attorney proposed a DNA test, Monjaras leapt at the idea.

"It was like, 'Great! Problem solved,' " he said.

TAX:

Tax Breaks For Football (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Before Miami police quelled the recent riot involving more than 100 University of Miami and Florida International University football players in the Orange Bowl, fighting erupted among fans in the stands. In two masterpieces of misdirected anxiety, the commissioner of the Atlantic Coast Conference, to which Miami belongs, said the rioting "has no place in college football" and the commissioner of FIU's Sun Belt Conference said "there is no place in higher education for the type of conduct exhibited."

But the question really raised by the barbaric behavior, and by nonviolent but nonetheless lurid behavior by some universities, is: What is the place of high-stakes football in higher education?

Twelve days before the Orange Bowl brawl, Republican Rep. Bill Thomas wrote, as chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, an eight-page letter to the president of the National Collegiate Athletic Association, asking awkward questions. Thomas wonders how, or whether, big-time college sports programs, which generate billions of tax-exempt dollars -- CBS pays the NCAA an annual average of $545 million, mainly for the rights to televise the March Madness basketball tournament -- further the purposes for which educational institutions are granted tax-exempt status. Other questions include:

How does the NCAA fulfill its proclaimed purpose of maintaining "the athlete as an integral part of the student body"? Only 55 percent of football players and 38 percent of basketball players at Division I-A schools graduate. The New York Times has reported that at Auburn, a perennial football power, many athletes have received "high grades from the same professor for sociology and criminology courses that required no attendance and little work." Eighteen members of the undefeated 2004 team took a combined 97 hours of those courses while at Auburn. Who believes such behavior is confined to Auburn?

DOJ_NMG_0085915

In recent decades the NCAA has increased the number of games that football and men's basketball teams are allowed to play. Thomas wonders how these changes help athletes improve their academic performances. Perhaps these changes have pecuniary purposes?

The NCAA says it aims to "retain a clear line of demarcation between intercollegiate athletics and professional sports." But aside from not compensating the athletes in a way commensurate with the money they generate for the universities, how is that line clear?

Some say the tax-exempt status of college sports is justified by the fact -- and it is a fact -- that successful sports teams often trigger increased applications for admission, and largess from alumni and legislatures. But, Thomas notes, "federal taxpayers have no interest in increasing applicant pools at one school opposed to another." Furthermore, athletic success that causes a surge of giving to universities might decrease giving to worthy charities.

Also, tax exemption is financing an escalation of coaches' salaries. More than 35 college football coaches are paid more than $1 million annually. The University of Colorado athletic department has borrowed $8 million, much of which will be used to buy out the contract of a fired football coach. Noting that several universities pay their men's basketball coaches four to five times what they pay their women's basketball coaches, Thomas wonders: "What additional educational benefit do men's basketball coaches provide beyond that which is provided by women's basketball coaches?" If the disparity has a commercial rather than an educational rationale, why should the commerce be tax-free?

Tax exemption also is a federal subsidy for ever more lavish facilities: Oklahoma State University, which is receiving $165 million from T. Boone Pickens to improve its athletic facilities, was already planning a $102 million upgrade of its football stadium. OSU charges fans a $2,500 "annual donation" just to become eligible to buy tickets for the best seats. The University of Michigan, which has had 198 consecutive sellouts at its stadium -- it now seats 107,501 -- is spending $226 million to add 3,200 luxury seats and 83 suites. The University of Texas at Austin is spending $150 million to add 10,000 seats to its current 85,123 capacity. These may be sound commercial decisions, but why should this commerce be tax-exempt?

Thomas wants to know: How many NCAA members "generate a net profit on the operations of their athletic departments (excluding university subsidies such as student fees or general school funds and services)? Of the institutions that generate a net profit, how many use the profit for purposes unrelated to the athletic department?"

Thomas is retiring, but if Democrats capture control of the House, the new chairman of Ways and Means, Charles Rangel, may hold hearings into the NCAA's tax-free lifestyle. Such hearings will be embarrassing, if people who operate football and basketball factories are capable of embarrassment.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Feds Ease Limits On Same-sex Schools (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, October 25, 2006

For the first time in a generation, public schools have won broad freedom to teach boys and girls separately, stirring a new debate about equality in the classroom.

The Education Department on Tuesday announced rules that will make it easier to create single-sex classes or schools, a plan that's been expected for almost three years.

The move comes as the value of same-sex education is in doubt. Research shows mixed results, as even the department's own review says.

Yet Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said more parents deserve to have the option. The push began not with the White House, but rather with female senators of both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0085916

"Research shows that some students may learn better in single-sex education environments," Spellings said, careful not to offer an outright endorsement.

"The Department of Education is committed to giving communities more choices in how they go about offering varied learning environments," she said.

The new federal rules may change how schools will look in the future.

To be published Wednesday and take effect Nov. 24, the rules update the enforcement of Title IX, the landmark anti-discrimination law. The current language has stood since 1975.

Until now, single-sex classes have been allowed in only limited cases, such as gym classes and sex education classes.

The new rules will allow same-sex education anytime schools think it will improve students' achievement, expand the diversity of courses, or meet kids' individual needs.

Enrollment must be voluntary. And any children excluded from the class must get a "substantially equal" coed class in the same subject, if not a separate single-sex class.

Districts can also offer an entire school for one gender without doing the same for the other gender, as long as there is a coed school that provides substantially the same thing.

Advocacy groups for women criticized the new rules as a weakening of civil rights.

"That is not a substitute for true equality," argued Jocelyn Samuels, vice president for education and employment at the National Women's Law Center. "It's a very dangerous sign to schools, that they can relax their vigilance in ensuring equal educational opportunities," she said.

As one example, Samuels said, schools can now offer a specialized math class in physics for boys. Would the excluded girls, she wondered, get the same quality in a coed class?

Stephanie Monroe, who oversees civil rights for the Education Department, promised fair enforcement. The department will look at teacher quality, textbooks and other factors to determine if coed classes are essentially the same quality as the single-sex classes.

About 240 public schools offer same-sex education in the United States, up from just three in 1995, according to the National Association for Single Sex Public Education.

Given new federal clarity, "There's no question that we're going to see very dramatic growth in the next year or two," said Leonard Sax, the association's executive director.

He said separate classes can erode stereotypes — not reinforce them — by letting boys and girls explore their interests freely. A same-sex environment might encourage boys to play the flute, or girls to work on assembling computers, he cited as examples. Success requires involving parents and teachers, not just sticking kids in different rooms, he said.

Yet Sax also criticized the Bush administration for taking so long.

Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas and Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton led the way in 2001, pushing single-sex education options in the No Child Left Behind law.

The department released proposed regulations in March 2004. After 31 months, an unusually long review time, the agency is releasing final rules that are substantially the same.

Monroe said the department wanted to ensure the rules follow the law and the Constitution. Still, Samuels predicted the new rules would be challenged in court.

The changes affect elementary and secondary education, not colleges. The current ban on single-sex vocational education in both classes and schools at the K-12 level will remain.

Federal Rules Back Single-Sex Public Education (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24— The Bush administration is giving public school districts broad new latitude to expand the number of single-sex classes, and even schools, in what is widely considered the most significant policy change on the issue since a landmark federal law barring sex discrimination in education more than 30 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0085917

Two years in the making, the new rules, announced Tuesday by the Education Department, will allow districts to create single-sex schools and classes as long as enrollment is voluntary. School districts that go that route must also make coeducational schools and classes of "substantially equal" quality available for members of the excluded sex.

The federal action is likely to accelerate efforts by public school systems to experiment with single-sex education, particularly among charter schools. Across the nation, the number of public schools exclusively for boys or girls has risen from 3 in 1995 to 241 today, said Leonard Sax, executive director of the National Association for Single Sex Public Education. That is a tiny fraction of the approximately 93,000 public schools across the country.

"You're going to see a proliferation of these," said Paul Vallas, chief of schools in Philadelphia, where there are four single-sex schools and plans to open two more. "There's a lot of support for this type of school model in Philadelphia."

Until now, Mr. Vallas said, there had been a threat of legal challenge that had delayed, for example, a boys charter school from opening in Philadelphia this September. New York City has nine single-sex public schools, most of which opened in the past four years.

While the move was sought by some conservatives and urban educators, and had backing from both sides of the political aisle, a number of civil rights and women's rights groups condemned the change.

"It really is a serious green light from the Department of Education to re-instituting official discrimination in schools around the country," said Marcia Greenberger, a co-president of the National Women's Law Center.

Under Title IX, the 1972 law that banned sex discrimination in educational institutions that receive federal funds, single-sex classes and extracurricular activities are largely limited to physical education classes that include contact sports and to sex education.

To open schools exclusively for boys or girls, a district has until now had to show a "compelling reason," for example, that it was acting to remedy past discrimination.

But a new attitude began to take hold with the passage of the No Child Left Behind law in 2002 when women senators from both parties came out in support of same-sex education and asked the Education Department to draft guidelines to permit their growth.

The new rules, first proposed by the Education Department in 2004, are designed to bring Title IX into conformity with a section of the No Child Left Behind law that called on the department to promote single-sex schools.

The interest in separating boys from girls in the classroom is part of a movement to allow more experimentation in public schools.

Although the research is mixed, some studies suggest low-income children in urban schools learn better when separated from the opposite sex. Concerns about boys' performance in secondary education has also driven some of the interest same-sex education.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings described the changes as part of a greater effort to expand educational options in the public sector. "Every child should receive a high quality education in America, and every school district deserves the tools to provide it," Ms. Spellings said.

She said that research supported offering single-sex education, and that the changes would not water down the protections of Title IX.

But Stephanie Monroe, who heads the Education Department's office of civil rights, acknowledged the equivocal nature of the department's own research on the issue.

"Educational research, though it's ongoing and shows some mixed results, does suggest that single-sex education can provide some benefits to some students, under certain circumstances," she said.

Although the changes announced Tuesday will not officially take effect until Nov. 24, school districts, including in New York City, had anticipated the new rules and some opened single-sex schools on the presumption of today's changes.

Kelly Devers, a spokeswoman for the New York City schools, said the system's lawyers planned to examine the rules to see how they expanded options for principals. Until now, public school districts that offered a school to one sex generally had to provide a comparable school for students of the other sex. The new rules, however, say districts can simply offer such students the option to attend comparable coeducational schools.

DOJ_NMG_0085918

Critics argue that the changes contradicted the intent of Title IX and would not withstand a legal challenge — a point Education Department officials disputed.

Nancy Zirkin, vice president of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, an umbrella organization representing about 200 civil rights groups, said the new regulations "violate both Title IX and the equal protection clause of the Constitution."

"Segregation is totally unacceptable in the context of race," she said. "Why in the world in the context of gender would it be acceptable?"

The American Civil Liberties Union signaled it might consider going to court. "We are certainly in many states looking at schools that are segregating students by sex and considering whether any of them are ripe for a challenge," said Emily Martin, deputy director of the Women's Rights Project at the A.C.L.U..

Tom Carroll, chairman and founder of the Brighter Choice Charter School for Boys and the Brighter Choice Charter School for Girls in Albany, said the new regulations gave greater legal protections to single-sex schools that had, until now, operated under the threat of lawsuits by such groups. "The A.C.L.U. now has a dramatically steeper hill to climb to upset the apple cart on single-sex schools," Mr. Carroll said.

He said his schools' research showed boys were stronger in math and girls were stronger in literacy. But in recently released test scores, he said, his schools did better than any other public schools in Albany. "Paradoxically, by educating them separately," he said, "we were able to do much to reverse the gender gaps that typically leave girls behind in math and boys behind in literacy."

Schools May Offer More Single-Sex Classes Under New U.S. Regulations (WP)

By Valerie Strauss

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

New federal regulations announced yesterday give school systems around the nation more flexibility in offering single-sex public education, even though the Department of Education concluded a year ago that there was not enough evidence to definitively evaluate single-sex classes.

Critics contended that the move was an invitation to schools to violate laws prohibiting sex discrimination in federally funded education programs.

The action, announced by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, gives school systems more freedom to establish single-sex schools and classes, as well as extracurricular activities at the elementary and secondary education levels. The regulations will take effect Nov. 24.

"Research shows that some students may learn better in single-sex education environments," Spellings said in a news release. "The Department of Education is committed to giving communities more choices in how they go about offering varied learning environments to their students."

The agency made the change even though it reported a year ago that there was not enough evidence to say whether single-sex education is beneficial or harmful to students.

Stephanie Monroe, assistant secretary for civil rights in the Education Department, said the agency received more than 5,800 comments from the public about the change.

"We didn't receive comments saying that it in and of itself was wrong," she said. People "were more concerned about the way it was being implemented."

Monroe added, "Students in public schools deserve the same opportunity of other students whose parents can afford to send them to private schools."

Earlier regulations permitted school systems to provide single-sex public schools to students of one sex if there were single-sex public schools for the other. Now school systems may open a single-sex school to students of one sex if there is a substantially equal single-sex or coeducational school for students of the other sex.

The American Civil Liberties Union said the new regulations are an open invitation to schools to violate Title IX, the federal law that prohibits sex discrimination in educational programs that receive federal funding.

DOJ_NMG_0085919

"The regulations allow schools to separate girls and boys for virtually any reason they can dream up -- including outdated and dangerous gender stereotypes," Emily Martin, deputy director of the ACLU Women's Rights Project, said in a statement. "And although the administration's regulations claim to make these programs optional, sex segregation can never be truly voluntary."

Single-sex School Restrictions Ease (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, October 25, 2006

School districts across the nation this fall will have unprecedented freedom to open up all-girls' or all-boys' schools and classes under sweeping new regulations announced Tuesday by U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings.

The shift is the biggest in 31 years and for the first time allows schools to separate students by gender if they believe it helps — a standard that is under debate in the existing research.

Participation in such programs would be voluntary, but schools choosing to separate a class for one sex wouldn't have to provide an equivalent class for the other sex. They'd simply have to offer a "substantially equal" coed class in the same subject.

The regulations, which take effect Nov. 24, also clarify rules on creating entire single-sex public schools.

Since the current rules went into effect in 1975, single-sex classes have been allowed only on a limited basis, such as in charter schools, sex education courses or gym classes. The Bush administration, supported by Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas and Democratic New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, has favored loosening the rules.

There are 241 public schools offering single-sex coursework, up from just three in 1995, says Leonard Sax of the National Association for Single Sex Public Education. He thinks about 1 in 10 of the USA's 90,000 public schools could decide to become single-sex.

Critics, such as the American Association of University Women and the American Civil Liberties Union, call changes troublesome.

Emily Martin of the ACLU Women's Rights Project said the new regulations "represent a through-the-looking-glass interpretation" of the federal Title IX law, which prohibits excluding students from school programs on the basis of sex. She noted that schools could now "separate girls and boys for virtually any reason they can dream up — including outdated and dangerous gender stereotypes."

Spellings said research shows that "some students may learn better" in single-sex environments, but other administration officials Tuesday admitted that the best research offers only tepid support. A 2005 analysis of current research, cited on the department's website, noted that "any positive effects" of single-sex schooling on long-term academic achievement "are not readily apparent."

The analysis found no differences on college test scores, graduation rates or graduate school attendance and bemoaned "the lack of high-quality research on these important criteria." And it found no research on how single-sex schooling affects critical factors such as teen pregnancy rates, differential treatment by teachers, parental satisfaction and school bullying.

Speaking to reporters Tuesday, Stephanie Monroe, who heads the department's civil rights office, minimized the research, saying that as a parent she'd want all options available to her child.

"The department believes that this is an option that should be made available," she said.

Public Schools Sanctioned For Single-sex Classes (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

The U.S. Department of Education yesterday announced new rules that will allow public schools to create classes, grades and even entire schools that teach students of one sex only.

"Research shows some students may learn better in single-sex educational environments," Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said in announcing changes that will take effect Nov. 24 and that will be voluntary.

"Every child should receive a high-quality education in America, and every school and district deserves the tools to provide it. These final regulations permit communities to establish single-sex schools and classes as another means of meeting the needs of students," the secretary said.

DOJ_NMG_0085920

The guidelines have been studied for four years. Education officials began examining policy changes after research indicated that some students learn and behave better in boys-only or girls-only environments.

The American Association of University Women and other groups oppose single-sex schools.

"The research supporting single-sex education is inconclusive. Indeed, in its most recent report, the Department of Education calls ... the benefits of single-sex education equivocal," said Catherine Hill, the association's director of research.

Education Department officials in a teleconference yesterday made it clear that the evidence is mixed.

"The research suggests single-sex education can provide benefits to some students under certain circumstances," said Stephanie Monroe, the department's assistant secretary for civil rights.

"We're not imposing this as a one-size-fits-all mandate. This is an option that can be helpful to some students, and that's what the literature says. Local schools and parents will make the decision on what is appropriate for their students," she said.

The federal rules that will be published today in the Federal Register represent amendments to how the Education Department will enforce the Title IX anti-discrimination law of 1972. That law prohibits sex discrimination in education programs or activities that receive federal funds.

The need to ensure legal compliance was one reason why the regulations took so long to develop, Miss Monroe said. "This is an important issue, and we wanted to make sure the department got it right. ... We made sure [the amendments] are legally sound, are consistent with Title IX, and with the Constitution," she said.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales approved the guidelines after making a few changes that officials described as minor.

Kent Talbert, general counsel for the Education Department, said it "took two to three years" for officials to analyze more than 5,800 public comments on the issue of single-sex education.

Miss Monroe said most who commented "did not think single-sex education is wrong," but many "were concerned about how it would be implemented." She said the department thinks it has "adequately addressed those concerns."

Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women, said in an interview that her group is "very concerned" with the guidelines and repeatedly filed objections.

"Whenever there are efforts to provide separate but equal [programs], it never manages to be equal. Girls invariably get the short end," Mrs. Gandy said.

Single-sex classrooms have become more common, increasing from four public schools in 1998 to at least 228 today, according to the National Association for Single-Sex Public Education.

In the Washington area, Frederick County's Twin Ridge Elementary School began offering all-boys classes for fourth- and fifth-graders two years ago. The decision was prompted by lagging test scores for boys, the school's principal told the Baltimore Sun in May 2004.

In Baltimore, at least eight city schools offer all-boys classes "taught by black men and designed to present role models to African-American boys," the Sun reported. This fall, Septima Clark Public Charter School in Ward 8 became the District's first all-boys charter school, The Washington Post reported.

Failing Schools Fighting Back (WP)

By Daniel De Vise

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Last summer, Sherina Garner was offered a chance that doesn't come often in public education: a free pass for her daughter to leave the neighborhood school for a better one.

She turned it down. Carlisha Garner, 11, returned to Beacon Heights Elementary this fall, even though the Prince George's County school had missed performance targets for the past two years and, under federal education law, the entire student body was entitled to transfer out.

"From what I can see, my child is very bright, and she has been getting a good education at Beacon Heights," Garner said. She didn't want her daughter to switch schools "just because of a test score."

DOJ_NMG_0085921

This fall, 10 of the 450 students at Beacon Heights exercised the transfer option offered them under the No Child Left Behind Act -- a mere trickle, compared with the number of students who have left other Prince George's schools in the same predicament in recent years.

Rather than accept the inevitable stigma of being on the wrong side of the law's school choice provision, officials at Riverdale's Beacon Heights and other embattled schools are trying a new tack: fighting back by marketing themselves to parents.

They promote the extra resources afforded to schools after their test scores repeatedly fail to meet standards, the easy proximity of a neighborhood school, the familiarity of friends and even their so-called inadequate results.

Four years into No Child Left Behind, many of the campuses entering the school choice process are actually fairly good schools. Principals point out that the standard for "adequate yearly progress," the measure of success under the 2002 federal law, is a bit higher each year. And a school can be labeled a failure if any one of several statistical subgroups misses the mark. For example, the test scores of special education students or those with limited English skills can open an entire school to transfers.

In Prince George's, the epicenter of choice in Washington's suburbs, the number of elementary and middle schools on Maryland's school improvement list -- signaling two years of missed academic targets -- rose from 55 last year to 63 this year. Yet, new transfers totaled just 612 this fall, down from 955 last year and 1,071 in 2004.

Consistently, about 1 percent of students eligible to transfer nationwide elect to do so. Maryland reported a small decline in transfers in the 2005-06 academic year, after two years of growth, and the number is likely to slip further this year.

Transfers were meant as an exit strategy for parents at chronically low-performing schools in low-income communities. The option is limited to schools that receive federal Title I funds, reserved for high-poverty areas. But the choice program is "swimming upstream" in many communities, said Ann Chafin, a Maryland assistant superintendent of education who oversees school improvement.

The difficulty lies in persuading parents to leave a neighborhood school, even for a better one. "The neighborhood school concept is a very, very big deal," Chafin said.

Two years ago, Beacon Heights Elementary was the toast of Prince George's, the only school in the county to receive a 2004 Blue Ribbon, the highest honor that can be bestowed upon a school by the U.S. Department of Education.

Now, the school sits on the state's watch list, and parents are entitled to transfers. Weak reading scores in two programs -- special education and students of limited English proficiency -- caused Beacon Heights to miss its performance targets in 2005 and 2006. If just three more special education students had passed the state test this spring, the school would have averted transfers.

Letters went home over the summer to all parents, alerting them that they were free to leave and inviting them to a July 18 meeting.

Sherina Garner attended.

"I wanted to listen to what they had to say," she said. "But I already had a presumption inside of me" that Carlisha, entering sixth grade, would remain where she was.

The school choice option allowed Carlisha to attend any of three other schools, all of which had made adequate yearly progress. One, Bond Mill, is the fourth-best elementary in Prince George's, in terms of advanced performance on the statewide test.

But Garner knew about Beacon Heights's Blue Ribbon. She knew that test scores had not changed much since then and that the school's curriculum remained fundamentally sound. And Carlisha could walk to the school.

Three dozen parents attended the meeting. Some were Spanish speakers under the misimpression that they had to leave the school. School system officials explained how the transfer worked. Then they made their pitch.

They told parents that a transfer would not necessarily deliver students to a better school. One of the three transfer options, Carrollton Elementary, actually had a slightly lower percentage of students rated advanced on the 2006 Maryland School Assessment, and only Bond Mill had significantly higher scores. Beacon Heights was getting a brand-new after-school program and a pair of faculty support specialists, not to mention the army of extra help already provided under various state and federal programs targeting poverty and language needs.

DOJ_NMG_0085922

"We pretty much have most of our children in this building covered for extended learning opportunities in grade 2 to grade 6," said Lynne Stuewe, the Beacon Heights principal.

At Bond Mill, a receiving school for Beacon Heights and several other schools under the choice program, Principal Justin FitzGerald has watched transfer activity taper off this fall. Just seven new students entered the school on transfers this year, the smallest number since the program began, leaving the transfer population at 25 in a school of 575 students.

Some falloff is natural, he said, after the explosion of transfers in the first years of the federal program. But he also notes that not one student has transferred in from Beacon Heights.

Five adults joined the 25 students in Carlisha's Beacon Heights classroom on a recent morning: a faculty support specialist, funded by school improvement money; a teacher and assistant, funded by special education; an English for Speakers of Other Languages teacher; and the regular teacher, left with just a handful of students to supervise in a group exercise.

"In fourth grade, I was pleased," Garner said. "Fifth grade, I was pleased. And sixth grade, I'm hoping, will wind up the same way."

Prince George's accounted for 955 of the 1,590 school choice transfers approved in the 2005-06 academic year in Maryland, according to state data. The volume of transfer activity shows both a strength and a weakness of the school system, experts say: The county has a large number of schools performing poorly enough to trigger transfers but enough high-scoring schools to make transfers an appealing option to parents.

The ailing Baltimore school system, in contrast, had twice as many schools eligible for transfers last year but far fewer parents requesting them. In D.C. schools, tens of thousands of students at 81 schools were eligible for transfers last year. But only a few hundred students transferred. The problem, in both of those systems, is finding a school that is meeting its performance goals. One D.C. parent activist likened the transfer option there to shifting "the chairs on the deck of the Titanic."

National Medicaid Transport Probed (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

Federal auditors are examining the skyrocketing costs of providing transportation to Medicaid patients across the country, a problem that D.C. officials are struggling to control.

The Office of Inspector General for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services said it "will determine whether state Medicaid agencies make erroneous payments for transportation services," according to its recently released 2007 work plan.

Medicaid transportation costs across the nation rose by 48 percent from 1999 to 2003, reaching $1.5 billion, according to the work plan.

The District has seen its Medicaid transportation costs rise to more than $20 million overall last year. More than $16 million was spent on van rides alone, according to a report last month by the D.C. Office of the Inspector General.

But the city's Medicaid transportation program, which also pays for public transit and taxis, cost taxpayers $14.3 million in fiscal 2004, according to the D.C. inspector general's 2006 work plan.

The program was also the subject of recent reports by the city's inspector general and the D.C. Council Committee on Health.

The Washington Times on Monday reported that the District last year spent $22.3 million for nonemergency transportation of Medicaid patients -- slightly more than what the city paid for patients to see individual doctors, according to city records.

In the federal work plan, the inspector general does not single out the District or any state in outlining a review of Medicaid transportation services.

Medicaid, which provides health insurance for the poor, is funded by the federal government and the states, which also manage their programs.

Reimbursement rates and rules for Medicaid transportation vary by state.

"Since so much money is involved here, the federal government certainly has a very keen interest in how it is spent," Donald White, spokesman for the HHS inspector general, said yesterday of the nationwide look at Medicaid transportation costs.

DOJ_NMG_0085923

Health care consultant Robin Mathias said that it's not uncommon for Medicaid programs to lose 30 percent to 50 percent of nonemergency transportation spending to fraud and abuse.

"States may identify likely fraud months or years after payment by analyzing claims data, but the effort is often too little, too late," she said.

A few states, such as Illinois, are moving toward contracting with a limited number of companies through competitive bidding, instead of having an unlimited number of providers, Miss Mathias said.

"Transportation fraud is very common," she said. "One of the reasons is that there's no professional certification. You don't have to be a nurse or a physician or a medical practitioner. That opens it up to a much wider range of people."

Last month, D.C. Inspector General Charles J. Willoughby issued a report that uncovered "a serious breach of basic internal controls" in which the city's Medical Assistance Administration failed to document millions of dollars in Medicaid transportation expenditures.

In response, Dr. Gregg A. Pane, director of the D.C. Department of Health, which oversees the MAA, wrote that the current transportation system has "profound management and operational challenges to overcome."

Dr. Pane said that city health officials are "deeply committed to working to resolve these issues as soon as possible."

The Times found that gaining entry into the Medicaid transportation industry in the District has required little more than a driver's license, an inspected van, auto insurance and valid rates on file. The city has more than 200 Medicaid transportation providers.

Neither the city's Department of Health, which oversees Medicaid, nor the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Commission, which licenses motor carriers, has conducted background checks of company officials in recent years.

The review by The Times of court records and other official documents of transportation companies on the D.C. Medicaid provider directory found company officials with criminal histories and others with numerous driving violations.

The Washington-based Community Transportation Association of America says the District trailed only Alaska in how much it has paid for transporting Medicaid patients, according to D.C. Council documents.

Alaska encompasses more than 581,000 square miles; the District, 63 square miles. Commercial airfares account for more than 90 percent of Alaska's Medicaid transportation costs, while the District relies mostly on a fleet of private van carriers, according to records.

The District pays companies up to $140 per trip. By comparison, a cab ride across the city could cost as much as $40, plus tip.

Panel Plans Ways To Narrow Tax Gap (WSJ)

By Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Congress, in a perpetual hunt to raise revenue without appearing to raise taxes, has a new list of ways to fatten the federal Treasury.

One proposal would force brokers to track historical price-basis information on stock sales, which could mean a stiffer capital-gains hit for investors who, intentionally or not, misstate the original purchase price. Another proposal would tighten the interest deduction for some mortgage refinancings. Still another would remove a key tax advantage for many family-owned businesses.

The proposals, released to little fanfare last week by Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation, are viable options for lawmakers looking to offset the cost of future tax cuts, tax experts say. The nonpartisan joint committee estimates the revenue costs of tax measures and is an influential behind-the-scenes player in tax bills.

This list of revenue-boosting options was produced at the request of Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.), who asked the joint committee to pinpoint ways to close the estimated $290 billion tax gap, a measure of uncollected taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0085924

Tax experts believe closing the gap will remain a significant goal of Congress regardless of which party prevails in next month's elections. "Over the long term, a number of the options will get looked at pretty hard because we will need revenues," says C. Clinton Stretch, partner at Deloitte & Touche LLP in Washington.

Brokerage firms are nervous about a recommendation to force brokers to report to the Internal Revenue Service the adjusted basis of publicly-traded securities sold during the preceding taxable year. Adjusted basis measures the original cost of a security for tax purposes.

While brokers foresee major record-keeping problems, many investors could end up paying higher taxes because the new records could document significant capital gains. The IRS estimates that underreporting of all capital gains resulted in $11 billion in uncollected taxes in 2001.

Some tax experts predict problems tracking records with older stock portfolios, inherited securities or portfolios recently transferred to a new firm. They urge that the requirement be applied to future stock transactions instead.

Ken Busey, a partner at PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP in Washington, says brokerage firms might report a basis figure to the IRS in conflict with a taxpayer's records, he says. Still, Sens. Grassley and Baucus have been examining a bill to require such basis reporting. Sen. Evan Bayh (D., Ind.) introduced a basis reporting bill earlier this year.

IRS taxpayer advocate Nina Olson made a similar recommendation in 2005. "For taxpayers, tracking basis can be extraordinarily complex and many taxpayers seeking to comply with the law find that they simply cannot do so with accuracy, leaving them exposed if audited," Ms. Olson wrote then.

The report also seeks to clear up confusion over timing of a homeowner's interest deduction when they refinance their home. Mortgage interest generally is deductible but there are important qualifications. Points paid on a refinancing generally must be claimed on a prorated basis over the life of the loan. Interest can be deducted on home-equity loans of as much as $100,000. The joint committee said homeowners are confused about mortgage-deduction rules, suggesting some are claiming more generous deductions. The committee is urging clearer details about these limits and timing restrictions for taxpayers.

The scope of erroneous mortgage deductions isn't clear. But since taxpayers are expected to deduct $69.4 billion in interest on homes in 2006, even low levels of avoidance "would involve significant dollar amounts," the report said. And many of such interest-deduction errors likely occurred during the recent mortgage-refinancing boom, says Bill Smith, national tax office director at CBIZ Inc., a Cleveland consulting firm. "I think the vast majority of people out there have no idea there are limits on deductibility on mortgage interest," he says.

The report proposes a significant tax-law change for law firms and family-owned personal-service firms, which may face new self-employment tax obligations. Typically, an executive in a "subchapter S corporation," used by many family businesses, takes a salary and distributes the remaining profit in a dividend that isn't subject to self-employment taxes, Mr. Smith says. The report suggests a new uniform rule to have these entities covered by the same self-employment tax regime as partnerships or sole proprietors.

Not having a uniform rule is a sizable problem: $39 billion of the tax gap was attributable to the self-employment tax and an estimated $15 billion of the tax gap attributable to unemployment taxes. Yet Mr. Smith says in his experience, most people using an S corporation don't pay themselves "ridiculously low" salaries and take the rest in a tax-advantaged dividend distribution. * * *

SOME 39 MILLION TAXPAYERS became ineligible this year for free electronic filing due to new income limits.

The IRS "Free File Alliance," launched in 2003, directs taxpayers from the agency's Web page to free taxfiling services of private-sector tax preparers such as H&R Block.

The firms restricted their free services in 2006 to taxpayers earning $50,000 or less. This limit arose after some tax preparers complained competing firms had lifted all income caps in a bid to boost market share. Some companies threatened to drop out of the alliance unless the IRS agreed to an income limit, negotiated in October 2005.

As a result, Treasury's Inspector General for Tax Administration or TIGTA, said the income limit cut program participation by 23%. It also made 39 million people ineligible for free tax filing and pointed to another problem: Only 38% of taxpayers with incomes less than $25,000 have access to the Internet, TIGTA said.

"Free File Alliance" had nearly four million participants in 2006, down from five million in 2005. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0085925

BRIEFS: IRS announces a $15,500 limit for 401(k) contributions in 2007, up from $15,000 the prior year, thanks to a cost-of-living boost...U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last week praised the Justice Department's pursuit of tax crooks, citing 250 injunctions against tax-fraud promoters since 2001.

Where It's Always Christmas (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Harry Reid probably didn't give it much thought. When Christmas rolled around and it was time to contribute to the holiday fund for employees at the Ritz-Carlton condominium where he lives while in Washington, the Senate minority leader did what comes naturally to politicians these days: He dipped into his campaign account.

As recent ethical transgressions go, the Nevada Democrat's actions aren't the biggest deal around. Election rules bar candidates from using campaign funds for personal expenses, but Reid contends that the tips were to thank the staff for the hassle of dealing with a resident dignitary. That's arguable, and after the Associated Press reported on Reid's donor-funded generosity, he repaid the three years of campaign-funded tips, $3,300.

Reid's actions are more important, though, as an illustration of the entrenched, bipartisan congressional mind-set of entitlement. Republicans and Democrats may not agree on much, but their joint operating ethos too often boils down to an attitude of: "It's my due. Why shouldn't I?"

Lawmakers have steadfastly resisted clamping down on privately funded travel. They have refused to do away with free use of corporate jets. They eagerly take freebies such as skybox tickets and expensive meals under the prevailing "don't ask, don't pay" congressional culture in which someone else -- a company, a campaign committee -- is always picking up the tab.

Absolute power may corrupt absolutely, but it also corrupts trivially. What's striking about Congress (aside from flagrantly corrupt members such as former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham) is the nickel-and-dime nature of the benefits they feel entitled to take, from Reid's acceptance of free boxing tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to California Republican Rep. John Doolittle's use of campaign funds to pay the babysitter.

Certainly this attitude is not solely a congressional phenomenon. In a report studded with delicious morsels, the Justice Department's inspector general last week chronicled the exploits of Carl Truscott, former head of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives -- and the resources Truscott abused were taxpayer dollars, not private funds. While his agency was having to cut back on bulletproof vests for agents, Truscott was arranging for deluxe features in the director's suite of the agency's new building, including a flat-panel television in his private bathroom and a parquet floor modeled on those in the vice president's ceremonial office. Unlike his predecessors, he traveled with an extensive security entourage, and because the director "did not like to wait," security personnel met him at the airport to bypass lines. He violated government ethics rules by using "significant ATF resources" -- about 20 agency employees ended up being drafted to help -- on his nephew's high school project to produce a video about the ATF.

There's something about Congress, though, that may especially invite such grandiosity. As Truscott's escapades show, executive branch officials may be catered to by subservient staff, but there are at least civil service protections for those who dare to complain and inspectors general to expose the most egregious misbehavior. But where are the checks on Congress? In theory, the fear of being dinged by a campaign opponent might restrain lawmakers; in reality, given gerrymandered districts, that might not be much of a deterrent. Instead, lawmakers are surrounded by staff members, lobbyists and others whose only incentives are to satisfy their whims, not resist them.

Cunningham offers a case in point. A summary of his dealings with staffers at the House intelligence committee showed how their compliance enabled him to direct at least $70 million in contracts to corrupt defense contractors. Bullied and cowed by Cunningham, committee staff ignored "red flags" and dutifully satisfied his requests, the report found. After the report was released, I asked the committee spokesman whether any disciplinary action would be taken. He was thunderstruck. What, he asked, was the staff to do in the face of a lawmaker's demands? "Have you ever worked in Congress?" he asked. (No.)

Last week an NBC-Wall Street Journal poll reported the lowest public approval rating for Congress since 1992. What I wondered about was this: Who are the 16 percent who approve?

DOJ_NMG_0085926

Diplomacy Turns A Profit (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Ambassadorial wives are often hard-pressed to find something to do when overseas.

But it seemed Lisa Vershbow , wife of Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea, had found her niche, picking up on her abilities as a costume jewelry maker.

At diplomatic receptions, she handed out name cards that said "Lisa Vershbow Jewelry Design" and gave her address as the U.S. Embassy residence, according to the Korea Times.

Vershbow set up a workshop in the residence and sold her work through a Seoul gallery. Over a two-week period, the Times reported, the gallery sold $20,000 worth of her pieces and, after deducting sales taxes, split the net with her.

She told the Times that she'd gotten an okay with embassy staff to do the exhibit. But the Korean Immigration Bureau says she didn't get a required work permit, a violation of the Korean Immigration Control Act.

And, she said of her customers, "I always wonder, would people still come if I weren't the U.S. ambassador's wife?"

No.Sex, Lies and the White House

And now, a Loop public service item. This month's special cheesecake edition of Esquire magazine features actress Scarlett Johansson as "The Sexiest Woman Alive." It's part of a fine photo display of "The Women We Love" from various fields -- movies, news, television commercials. The section includes "Women We're Ashamed to Love," topped by White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino .

"Hotter than Tony Snow and Scott McClellan combined," Esquire says of Perino. "Plus, the executive branch seems so much more capable in her dulcet voice. Lie to us, Dana. Lie to us."

Oddly, there is no picture of Perino included. So for Loop fans who don't read Esquire:Forgive and Forget

Former president Bill Clinton , talking to Democratic contributors here last week, recounted how he had earlier chatted with Jim Webb , a Virginia former Republican who is running for the Senate as a Democrat.

"He said: 'I can't believe you're going to campaign for me after all the terrible things I said about you,' " Clinton said.

Clinton said he told Webb that "if that was my test, I'd have no one to campaign for."

No doubt. Not even Hillary.Smash-Mouth Politics

It's getting rough out there in Wyoming, where six-term Rep. Barbara Cubin (R) is heavily favored over Democrat Gary Trauner .

During Sunday's televised debate, Libertarian Party candidate Thomas Rankin criticized Cubin for taking contributions from former House majority leader Tom DeLay . Moments after the lights went down, an upset Cubin said to Rankin: "If you weren't sitting in that chair, I'd slap you across the face," the Casper Star-Tribune reported.

Rankin has multiple sclerosis and uses an electric wheelchair.

Cubin publicly apologized yesterday, saying, "It was person to person and it was not an attack on the disabled. In retrospect, I was wrong in what I said and I apologize."

The popular Cubin is a Class of '94 member who pledged to serve no more than six terms.There's a Fox Following the Ambassador

Famed Washington lobbyist Tom Korologos , a Nixon and Ford White House aide and former Senate confirmation guru, is said to be leaving his fine posting as ambassador to Belgium early next year. Korologos, 73, often known as the 101st senator, helped out in Iraq in 2003.

Word is the White House has tapped wealthy St. Louis developer Sam Fox , 77, to replace Korologos. Fox, a major GOP fundraiser, is national chairman of the Jewish Republican Coalition.Five Governments, One Crazy Guy

The press keeps badgering the Bush administration over why it won't negotiate one-on-one with the government of lunatic North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il over the latter's nuclear program.

The reasons are obvious, but reporters just don't get it. CNN's Zain Verjee , in an interview last week with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Beijing, asked: "What do you have to lose?"

DOJ_NMG_0085927

"Well, what we have to lose," Rice explained patiently, "is the power of five countries telling the North Koreans . . . that the program is unacceptable. The North Koreans would like nothing better than to divide us so that they can negotiate with each separately and they don't have to face the collective power of the five parties."

Ah, the indomitable power of five. Worked pretty well so far.

White House's Chief Usher Is Bowing Out (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Gary Walters, the longtime chief usher at the White House who has kept the secrets of seven first families, will retire at the end of the year after nearly four decades of service.

Walters, 60, who manages the 132-room mansion with a staff of 95 and a $10 million budget, said last night that he told first lady Laura Bush and the president last week of his decision.

"It's been nearly 40 years of not having an opportunity to set my own agenda and never knowing when I'd be home, " Walters said. "It's been wonderful but it just felt like it was time for me to go."

In a statement, President Bush and the first lady praised Walters, who also worked for the first Bush White House, and said that they were "grateful for making our family feel at home."

Walters arrived at the White House in 1970 as a uniformed Secret Service agent. He joined the usher's staff in 1976 and became chief usher in 1986 under President Ronald Reagan.

He has been charged with special diets and teenage parties, tending dogs and overseeing chefs. In addition, he oversees housekeepers, cooks, electricians and carpenters. And everyone knows that he knows. Walters was even called to testify during the Whitewater investigation in the mid-1990s, when billing records that had been subpoenaed two years earlier suddenly appeared at the White House.

"He's been pushing the buttons at the White House for 21 years, and he will not be an easy gentleman to replace," said Roland Mesnier, who retired as White House pastry chef in 2004. "It is a very difficult job. It's like a double-edged knife. You have to make sure everything is done properly at the institution, and you have to protect the first family. Sometimes it's a tough call."

Walters made one of those calls when the Clintons were departing in 2000. He approached the White House counsel's office to ask whether the family should be taking furnishings that he believed were government property. Although he was told that the items belonged to the Clintons, the items were returned. That was one instance when Walters was not shy about sharing a story with the media.

According to Susan Whitson, a spokeswoman for Laura Bush, Walters said his predecessor had once advised him to give his successor a couple of years to get ready for a new president. With the Bushes leaving the White House in 2009, now was his time to follow that advice.

Walters said he has given some thought to writing a book -- but certainly not a tell-all.

He said that he made suggestions to the Bushes about a process for succession, but he would not disclose whether he had recommended any specific replacement.

Trademark Office To Experiment With Telecommuting (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Want to work for a Washington area agency and live on the Florida coast, or in the Blue Ridge Mountains of North Carolina, or among the bluebonnets of Texas?

As fanciful as that may seem, it will be possible under a telecommuting pilot project developed by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office -- inside the Beltway in Alexandria -- and one of its unions.

Under the pilot, 10 experienced trademark lawyers with good job-performance ratings will be permitted to move anywhere in the continental United States and work from home.

"To my knowledge, there is no other program like this in the federal government," said Howard Friedman , president of National Treasury Employees Union Chapter 245.

DOJ_NMG_0085928

There is a catch. The lawyers must show up once a week at the Alexandria headquarters, at their own expense. That requirement will allow the PTO to keep the employees on the roster at agency headquarters and avoid triggering a law that mandates reimbursement for employee travel and per diems.

The "geographic expansion pilot," as the PTO calls the project, is scheduled to start next year and will be evaluated after six months. If the program is successful, the PTO plans to allow more lawyers to volunteer for it and to seek a waiver from Congress and the Bush administration so that the long-distance telecommuters do not have to report in person each workweek to headquarters.

"Ultimately, we'd like to get to a point where people come in the office less frequently than once a week," said Deborah Cohn , deputy commissioner for trademark operations. "We'll be trying to get to a point where, if they live in North Carolina or Florida, they don't have to come in except on rare occasions."

Cohn said the PTO decided to sponsor the pilot program after hearing from employees who want to be able to move away from the Washington area for family or lifestyle reasons. "Telework is a fabulous retention tool," she said. "We want to keep them; they are good employees."

Cohn and Friedman said the pilot builds on a nearly 10-year-old trademark office program that permits attorneys to work from their homes. About 220 trademark lawyers, out of 265 who are eligible, are telecommuters. Trademark lawyers typically can apply to telecommute after they have worked at the agency more than two years and show they can successfully meet rigorous productivity standards.

Program rules require the telecommuters to live within 110 miles of the PTO -- a limitation Cohn said was designed for an era when the agency installed desktop computers in employees' homes and arranged for cable companies to provide Internet service.

Today, most trademark lawyers work on laptops, and changes in technology have made it easier for them to connect to agency networks from their homes. The advent of Internet-based telephone service also makes it less expensive for trademark lawyers to provide services to companies and others who do business with the agency.

The PTO is in the vanguard of the government's work-at-home movement. In addition to trademark lawyers, about 500 senior patent examiners are telecommuting in a program that began in February. Over time, it could grow to as many as 3,000 examiners.

Telecommuting has been increasing in the federal government since 2000, but only 7.7 percent of the federal workforce telecommuted in 2004, according to the government's most recent report. The participation rate jumped to 19 percent when measured by the number of jobs that agencies have declared suitable for telecommuting.

Cohn noted that the trademark office has some experience with long-distance telecommuters. The agency has permitted at-home work by an employee in Harrisburg, Pa., and one in Long Island, N.Y., she said. A number of agency telecommuters live in the Annapolis and Baltimore areas, she noted.

The pilot, Friedman said, shows the value of telecommuting, especially for agencies updating contingency plans for redeploying employees if federal offices are closed because of pandemics or terrorist attacks.

Office chatter indicates that some trademark lawyers are interested in moving to Texas, Florida, North Carolina, Delaware and Illinois, Friedman said.

"Our people are chomping at the bit," he said. "I'll be curious to see how many people apply, and curious to see where they move."

Face Facts (NYT)

By Lawrence M. Wein

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Stanford, Calif.

DESPITE all the attention given to anthrax and smallpox and potential weapons of mass destruction, pandemic influenza is probably the world's most serious near-term public health threat. If a strain similar in effect to the 1918 Spanish flu (which killed tens of millions of people worldwide) emerges in the next several years, it is highly likely that an effective vaccine will not be available during the pandemic's first wave, that we won't have enough antiviral drugs for large-scale prophylactic use, and that hospitals will be too overwhelmed to treat most cases.

DOJ_NMG_0085929

Consequently, as in 1918, we will need to combine medical efforts with voluntary and forced social changes — closing schools and churches, canceling public gatherings, keeping workers at home — to hinder the flu's spread. Our government must draw up a plan for educating the public about effective nonpharmaceutical interventions like hand washing and face protection like masks.

A prerequisite for doing so is determining the biggest culprit in spreading influenza: droplet transmission, in which an infected person sneezes or coughs directly into the mouth, nose or eyes of someone who is susceptible); contact transmission, in which virus is transferred via hands either directly, say, through a handshake, or indirectly through an object like a doorknob; and aerosol transmission, in which evaporated virus-containing particles are inhaled.

Remarkably, this issue has not been resolved: the Department of Health and Human Services' Pandemic Influenza Plan states that "the relative clinical importance of each of these modes of transmission is not known." As a result, the government enthusiastically endorses frequent hand washing — which would reduce contact transmission, and costs nothing — but remains noncommittal about face protection. While the government says that it might be beneficial, it doesn't make respirators or masks available. Yet face protection would guard against aerosol and droplet transmission, and even reduce contact transmission by making it difficult to place fingers into one's mouth or nose.

A Stanford graduate student, Michael Atkinson, and I recently performed a detailed study of the routes of transmission, using data on influenza and on rhinovirus, which causes the common cold. Our findings suggest that the dominant mode of transmission for influenza is aerosol — implying that hand washing will make little difference. This is consistent with the views of leading researchers several decades ago, views that have somehow been forgotten by the public health community.

We found that ventilation, like placing a fan in an open window, and humidifiers (most influenza strains survive in the air for much less time when the humidity is raised to about 65 percent) can reduce transmission slightly. Sleeping in separate bedrooms (and working in separate offices) can help even more.

But the single most effective intervention is face protection. And because roughly one-third of influenza transmissions occur before an infected person exhibits symptoms, these precautions should be taken whenever people are in the same room throughout the pandemic period.

There are two kinds of face protection: N95 respirators, as worn by construction workers, for instance, and surgical masks of the sort worn by dental hygienists. (The respirators cost roughly a dollar apiece, the surgical masks 10 cents.) Their efficacy in preventing aerosol transmission depends on three factors: the extent to which the face filter prevents virus particles from passing through, how tightly the device fits and — most important — how long people can be coerced into wearing them.

To our surprise, we found that the filters in surgical masks, although not as good as the filters in N95 respirators, are still quite effective. And although a surgical mask fits much more loosely and allows more leakage, it's also more comfortable — and therefore likely to be effective because it's used more. Wearing nylon hosiery over a surgical mask essentially eliminates the face leakage, making this combination a practical, albeit macabre, alternative. The less comfortable N95 respirators would probably result in lower compliance.

The government doesn't stockpile masks and respirators, and the manufacturers aren't able to produce a huge number of them quickly. But the way forward seems clear: the government needs to build up a supply of respirators and masks just as it does with vaccines and antivirals. It should first hire a whiz-bang design company to create, within one month, a surgical mask that comfortably adheres to the face, and then decide on the appropriate mix of respirators and masks. Next, it needs to sign contracts with manufacturers to stockpile masks and respirators, relieving the manufacturers of liability issues.

Although there is very little technological risk involved (masks and respirators are easier to make and safer to use than vaccines), several issues need to be ironed out. First, the effectiveness of N95 respirators and masks varies widely. The government needs to educate the public (the brands are anonymous in the published studies) and should stockpile only the most effective brands.

Also, if respirators and masks are discarded daily, as they are in many hospitals, the national demand during a three-month pandemic could be 10 to 20 billion, and the cost for respirators for a family of four several hundred dollars. Such waste isn't necessary. The virus does not survive longer than a few hours on the material used for masks and respirators, so they should be re-used until they disintegrate.

DOJ_NMG_0085930

The government and the public health community must switch mindsets, from the current perspective of protecting workers paid to do a dangerous job everyday, to that of providing citizens with the tools to best protect themselves during a pandemic.

It may take 18 months to build a stockpile of respirators and masks, so there is no time to lose. The American people's faith in their government will be seriously undermined if, along with larger measures like school closings, it cannot provide effective face protection for its citizens during a deadly pandemic. Masks and respirators may be our main lines of defense during a pandemic.

OTHER NEWS:

US Stocks Quiet As Fed Meets (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

US stocks were caught in narrow ranges on Tuesday, as earnings continued flowing while unsettled investors were distracted by the two-day policy meeting of the Federal Reserve.

At the close, the S&P 500 was up 0.36 points, or 0.03 per cent, at 1,377.38 while the Nasdaq Composite was 10.72 points, or 0.5 per cent, lower at 2,344.84. The Dow Jones Industrial Average settled up 10.97 points at 12,127.88, marking its fourth record close in five days.

Some observers warn that the surge in equities since markets bottomed in July might not be sustainable. "The break-neck expansion of the past three months may give way to a needed short-term pause in the coming weeks," noted David Shairp, global strategist at JPMorgan Asset Management.

Among steel-makers Nucor was up $6.47, or 11.74 per cent, at $61.58 and US Steel up $3.61, or 5.4 per cent at $70.19. Carmaker General Motors hit a 52-week peak for the second successive day with investors expecting good earnings on Wednesday as GM executes its turnround plan. GM rose $1, or 2.8 per cent, to $36.19 and is up 86 per cent for the year.

Chemicals group DuPont, trimmed earlier gains, but closed 55 cents, or 1.2 per cent, higher at $46 after posting stronger than expected earnings and reiterating a solid outlook for 2006.

Hurting the Nasdaq was a decline in Qualcomm. Its shares fell $1.37, or 3.6 per cent, to $36.71 on reports that its patent case against Nokia might be reviewed by the courts.

Lucent rose 15 cents, or 6.4 per cent, at $2.49, on earnings of 7 cents per share, above consensus estimates of 4 cents. The telecomms equipment maker is being acquired by France's Alcatel. The deal is expected to close at the end of the year.

Taking a tumble was Tellabs, down 62 cents, or 5.6 per cent, at $10.40 after the company reported a 41 per cent rise in profits, but its broadband division saw sales growth rise just 3 per cent.

TD Ameritrade fell 79 cents, or 4.75 per cent to $15.84 while shares in Omnicom were up $6.23, or 6.6 per cent, at $101.11 after the advertising group delivered earnings of estimates.

Appliance maker Whirlpool cut its estimate for appliance industry unit shipment growth in North America. Its shares were down $2.63, or 2.9 per cent, at $86.70.

Reporting weaker than forecast results for the third quarter was Kraft Foods, which dropped 94 cents or 2.6 per cent, at $35.36.

Texas Instruments was down $1.36, or 4.3 per cent, at $30.52 after it missed estimates and lowered guidance for the fourth quarter.

First Data shares rose 54 cents, or 2.4 per cent, to $23.49 after the company announced a $700m share buy-back and first quarterly earnings since selling Western Union. Separately, Western Union rose 37 cents, or 1.9 per cent, at $19.95 after its earnings beat estimates.

DOJ_NMG_0085931

Dow Edges Higher To Another Record Despite Rising Oil Prices, Fed Concern (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Investors shied from making big bets ahead of the Federal Reserve's latest interest-rate decision, due out this afternoon.

On a day when major stock indicators ended mixed, the Dow Jones Industrial Average did close at another record, its 11th in the past 16 sessions. The Dow rose 10.97 points, or 0.09%, to end at a high of 12127.88, up 13.2% on the year.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index inched up 0.36 point, or 0.03%, to finish at 1377.38. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 10.72 points, or 0.46%, to 2344.84, up 6.3% on the year.

Fed officials are expected to leave their interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25%, although their written statement, expected at 2:15 p.m. EDT, may offer surprises for Wall Street.

Even without the central bankers' thoughts in hand, investors' hopes for a rate cut by the end of the year have been fading in recent days, amid a generally strong batch of strong third-quarter corporate earnings reports.

Drew Matus, economist at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., said there is some risk that the Fed could sound a "hawkish" note about inflation fears, meaning a signal that higher interest rates may yet be needed to stem a general rise in prices throughout the economy. With earnings strong and falling pump prices putting more money in consumers' pockets, Mr. Matus said he sees little chance that the Fed will go the other way and signal a cut anytime soon.

Mr. Matus said he anticipates the "secondary effects" of a slowing housing market, including reduced consumer spending via home-equity loans, won't become evident until sometime in early 2007. "Until we see that, I don't think the Fed is going to go out of its way to convince people to price a rate cut into the markets," he said.

Rising crude-oil prices damped the mood in the stock market. Cold weather in the Northeast drove crude-oil futures for December delivery up 54 cents, or 0.92%, to $59.35 a barrel, off 2.8% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Meanwhile, gasoline futures jumped 6.65 cents a gallon, or 4.5%, to $1.5380, though 41% off the Nymex record high of $2.6145, made in August 2005. Heating-oil futures rose 2.62 cents a gallon, or 1.6%, to $1.6952.

In addition to the Fed announcement, investors will watch for fresh data on existing home sales due out from the Commerce Department.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms, including a 5½-year high in London for the FTSE 100 index. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.09%, or 0.2 point, to 226.32.

In U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.78 billion shares, as 1,850 stocks advanced and 1,459 fell.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year note rose 1/32 point, or 31.25 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.824%, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond rose 3/32 to yield 4.946%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.30 yen, compared with 119.33. The euro rose to $1.2563, compared with 1.2550.

How Much Is Too Much? (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Behind the closed doors of the Federal Reserve's marble temple on Constitution Avenue, a fervent debate is underway this week. The subject might seem, at first glance, to reflect minor differences of opinion.

Should the Fed explicitly tell the public what level of inflation it wants to achieve? And if so, should that goal be in the 1 to 2 percent range, or "comfort zone," expressed by many central bankers in recent years, or should the upper limit be raised to as high as 3 percent?

Close as those numbers may sound, the implications for every American family are substantial. If the Fed enforces a low-inflation goal vs. one that is slightly higher, consider what a pair of pants or a loaf of bread would cost a decade from now, assuming they track the overall inflation rate.

DOJ_NMG_0085932

If inflation runs a modest 1.5 percent a year, typical of the level in the late 1990s, a $70 pair of pants would cost $81.24 in 10 years and a $2.79 loaf of bread would cost $3.24. But if inflation, running at more than 2 percent recently, is allowed to creep up to 3 percent a year, those pants would cost $94.07 in a decade, and the bread would cost $3.75.

How much people's paychecks will buy in the future, how far their retirement money will go, how many people might need to be thrown out of work to achieve a stated inflation goal -- all these outcomes could be influenced by a debate among the nation's central bankers at their meetings yesterday and today, to which the public has no access.

Among the main topics to be discussed is how the Fed might communicate more with the public about its private deliberations, economic forecasts, goals and strategies.

One option, long-advocated by Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, is for the Fed to adopt a formal, numerical inflation goal, a practice called inflation targeting and used by central banks in 25 countries. The Bank of England, for example, is one of several central banks that seeks to keep inflation at or near 2 percent.

Alan Greenspan, Bernanke's predecessor who retired in January, opposed inflation targeting, uneasy with rules that might limit his flexibility. He defined the Fed's goal of "price stability" more vaguely -- as inflation so low it does not influence consumers and businesses.

As long as Greenspan was chairman, inflation targeting was moot at the Fed. That changed overnight with President Bush's selection of Bernanke. His arrival has moved the issue to the top of the Fed's agenda.

The policymaking Federal Open Market Committee includes supporters and skeptics, making a quick decision unlikely. If committee members ultimately decide to adopt a target in principle, the next challenge would be setting the number.

Bernanke is among many Fed policymakers who have said in recent years they prefer to keep inflation in a range of 1 to 2 percent, using the central bank's preferred measure, which excludes volatile food and fuel prices. Such pronouncements about "core inflation" have led financial markets to view this range as the Fed's comfort zone, or informal target.

But some Fed committee and staff members believe the range of 1 to 2 percent may be too low. They think a better range might be 1 to 3 percent, or perhaps 1.5 to 2.5 percent.

Some financial analysts and investors say these views may help explain why Fed policymakers stopped raising interest rates after their June meeting, even though inflation has exceeded 2 percent for more than two years and is forecast to hover above that level through next year.

"Why are they so tolerant of inflation above 2 percent?" asked Laurence H. Meyer, a former member of the Fed Board of Governors. "Maybe because they aren't aiming for 1.5 percent. It's possible that in practice, the midpoint of the range we should infer from their actions is higher than 1.5 percent."

In contrast, Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, has said repeatedly that he wants to see inflation average about 1.5 percent over time, varying within the range of 1 to 2 percent. At each of the past two policymaking meetings, where the Fed left its benchmark short-term rate unchanged at 5.25 percent, he cast the sole dissenting vote.

The committee is widely expected to hold the benchmark rate steady today, while leaving the door open to more rate increases if inflation does not come down.

Gary H. Stern, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, said in an interview last week that "things are a little awkward now" because financial markets are not sure of the committee's inflation objective.

The difference between 1.5 and 3 percent inflation may sound small, but it can have big effects on investors, consumers and the economy. Consumer price inflation erodes the buying power of the dollar. That lowers returns on investments in stocks, bonds and other assets. It also eats away at savings and means a fixed income buys less every year.

High inflation disrupts economic growth by making it difficult for businesses, investors and families to plan, as did ruinous double-digit inflation during the 1970s.

Conversely, central bankers don't like to let inflation get near zero, fearing that prices could cross the line and actually start falling, a phenomenon known as deflation. Deflation discourages consumers and businesses from borrowing and spending, as happened during the Great Depression of the 1930s and in Japan for most of the past decade.

Fed policymakers were delighted in the late 1990s when the economy grew at a strong pace and inflation averaged 1 to 2 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0085933

But their thinking shifted after the stock bubble burst, leading to the 2001 recession and an initially weak economic recovery. Mindful of Japan's deflation, Greenspan and others grew worried as inflation drifted toward 1 percent. By May 2003, they announced they would prevent inflation from falling farther; Bernanke, then a member of the Fed Board of Governors, declared that summer that inflation below 1 percent was "undesirable."

By October 2003, Bernanke said in a speech that academic research suggested "something in the vicinity of 2 percent" would be the best long-term average.

More recently, many analysts and investors say Fed policymakers have already moved their informal inflation goal slightly higher than 1 to 2 percent, but will not say so publicly for fear financial markets will question their inflation-fighting resolve.

The Fed "is acting as if the comfort zone is somewhat higher, just not saying so," said Paul McCulley, managing director of Pacific Investment Management Co.

A recent survey of bond investors by Macroeconomic Advisers LLC found about half of them do not believe the Fed is setting interest rates as though it were trying to keep inflation within the range of 1 to 2 percent.

Financial markets would probably accept a Fed target of 1.5 to 2.5 percent, said David Shulman, a senior economist with the UCLA Anderson Forecast. But if policymakers said they would tolerate 3 percent inflation, he said, "you'll get a sell-off" in the stock and bond markets.

Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research Corp., said anything above 2 percent would be "a hard sell" on Wall Street.

"The markets are going to see this and say, 'Wait a sec -- you don't like what you see so you change the rules in the middle of the game?' " he said. "It absolutely crushes the inflation-fighting credibility of the Fed."

If Fed policymakers adopt a formal target, they would have many details to flesh out: Which inflation measure should they use? Should the target be a numerical point or a range? What would be the time frame for achieving the goal?

Stern, the Minneapolis Fed president, said last week he supports a numerical goal, but added, "I haven't decided on what it should be."

Winter-Heating Bills Are Tough To Forecast (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

A substantial drop in natural-gas prices won't help some U.S. consumers with their heating bills this winter. As a result, some utilities are waiting to see whether households dial back their thermostats -- and whether that could hurt their earnings.

Some utilities that raised rates significantly last year, in the aftermath of gas-production disruptions along the Gulf Coast, will offer substantial reductions this year because of the fall in gas prices. Others will have modest increases or decreases depending on whether they locked in gas supplies when prices were high or rolled the dice on the spot market. Gas-commodity costs make up 50% to 80% of a common residential bill, and gas heats more than half of all U.S. homes.

Many utilities sock away large quantities of gas in spring and summer so it can be consumed in the winter. The companies then make spot-market purchases, as needed. More utilities are making purchases in other months and are leaning more heavily on financial-hedging tools to protect their customers against price shocks. About 70% of gas utilities enter into financial hedges to protect their customers, according to the American Gas Association, a trade group in Washington, D.C.

The different approaches account for different consumer outcomes in different places. AGL Resources Inc., of Atlanta, said it will offer reductions of 5% to 28% this winter at the five utilities it owns in six states, with the largest decrease in Virginia. That is partly because Virginia is one of the few states that discourages hedging, so it relies more on current market prices.

That has worked out well this year because prices have dropped. In recent trading, a 12-month strip of gas -- a contract for a set supply monthly for a year -- could be purchased on the New York Mercantile Exchange for $7.97 a million British thermal units, compared with $11.67 a million BTUs a year earlier, a decline of 32%. U.S. gas inventories have swelled to 3.44 billion cubic feet, their highest level ever, according to the Energy Information Administration, of Washington, D.C.

PIPED IN FROM RUSSIA

• Energy Diary:1 Many European countries depend on natural gas brought in by pipeline from Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0085934

MORE ON ENERGY

• Entergy to Keep New Orleans Unit2

• BP's Net Falls 3.6% on Prudhoe Bay Shutdown3

At AGL's Chattanooga Gas Co. in Tennessee, a 24% reduction in the commodity portion of each bill will translate into savings of $29.50 in November and $56.60 in December for the average household. Although that is welcome news, it leaves prices relatively high because rates jumped 39% last winter.

Even though gas-commodity costs are a pass-through expense for utilities, the companies can suffer if their customers suffer. NiSource Inc., of Merrillville, Ind., said in August that it expects to lose 1.2% of its residential customers this year, most due to shutoffs for nonpayment. That is a 10% increase in customer losses from 2005 and is twice as great as what it expected. NiSource owns 10 gas utilities in nine states with 3.8 million metered customers.

Overall, residential-gas use at NiSource companies has fallen 5% this year, on top of a 4% drop last year, Chief Executive Bob Skaggs told investors. He said in August it is "highly unlikely" the company will meet its earnings targets for 2006, as a result of this growing conservation effect.

NiSource's experience suggests there may be more pain ahead -- both for utilities and customers -- than what the federal government expects. In its annual winter-fuels outlook, the EIA said it expects less conservation this year than last year, because of reduced prices.

Some utilities with successful buying strategies are raising rates. Customers of Northwest Natural Gas Co., of Portland, Ore., will pay 3.5% more for gas this winter. What consumers won't necessarily know is that it could have been far worse. Normally, Northwestern locks in prices for 90% of the gas its customers need, but "we really backed off this year," said Randy Friedman, gas-supply manager, because prices quoted early in the year for deliveries this winter "seemed nuts to us."

It held off on purchases and later was able to buy gas more cheaply. By deviating from its normal plan "we cut the amount of our price increase in half," said Mr. Friedman. This year's increase comes on top of a relatively modest 15% increase last year, when a larger hedging program protected customers against price increases late in the year. Its earnings aren't affected by conservation because the company revised its rate structure in 2002 so it can earn its authorized rate of return even if gas usage drops.

Many utilities are reluctant to change their buying programs, afraid they will be second-guessed by regulators. Consolidated Edison Inc. takes a "disciplined approach" to procurement, says Terry Agriss, vice president of energy management. "We didn't do anything substantially different this year than what we do in any year."

ConEd, of New York, expects the average household to pay about 5% less this year than last. That means a total gas expense of nearly $2,000 from November through March, compared with an average cost of $2,090, $1,658, and $1,415 the prior three years.

Judge Rules Against Boy's Circumcision (CHIT)

By Judy Peres

Chicago Tribune, October 25, 2006

In a case that has been closely watched by anti-circumcision groups nationwide, a Cook County judge ruled Tuesday that the medical benefits of the procedure are not clear enough to compel a 9-year-old Northbrook boy to be circumcised against his will.

The boy's mother and her new husband had claimed the operation was necessary to prevent recurrent episodes of redness and discomfort. The boy's father sought a court order barring the circumcision, which he called an "unnecessary amputation."

The mother has sole custody, but their 2003 parenting agreement gave her ex-husband a say in non-emergency medical decisions. The Tribune is not naming the parents in order to protect the boy's privacy.

In a written opinion handed down Tuesday, Circuit Court Judge Jordan Kaplan said, "The evidence was conflicting and inconclusive as to any past infections or irritations that may have been suffered by the child.

DOJ_NMG_0085935

"Moreover," he continued, "this court also finds that the medical evidence as provided by the testimony of the expert witnesses ... is inconclusive as to the medical benefits or non-benefits of circumcision as it relates to the 9-year-old child."

Kaplan said the boy, as a minor, cannot make his own medical decisions but had indicated in a written statement that he does not want to be circumcised.

"The injury to the child as a result of an unnecessary circumcision would be irreversible," Kaplan wrote, adding that his order would remain in effect until the boy turns 18 and can decide for himself whether or not he wants to undergo the procedure.

Because there are no U.S. precedents, other courts could look to this ruling in future cases, said George Hill of Doctors Opposing Circumcision.

Geoffrey Miller, a law professor at New York University, called the ruling a "significant victory" for the growing "intactivist" movement, which has argued circumcision is harmful and violates the rights of children, who can't give informed consent.

Miller conceded Tuesday's decision was "limited by the facts of the case," including the agreement that gives the father the right to be consulted on medical care. Nevertheless, he said, "The fact that a non-custodial parent was able to prevent a custodial parent from having this procedure done is a sign that courts are more receptive to arguments against circumcision than they were in past years."

The father, a 50-year-old building manager from Arlington Heights, said he was relieved by the decision and "so happy."

His lawyer, Alan Toback, said, "We always thought it was not in the child's best interest to have a circumcision at age 9 that was not medically necessary, and the judge agreed."

The mother was not in court Tuesday, and her lawyer, Tracy Rizzo, also was not there because of the death of her father, famed Chicago private investigator Ernie Rizzo. The mother was represented instead by Gail O'Connor, who said, "We're disappointed, of course, but we will abide by the injunction."

Circumcision, in which the foreskin of the penis is surgically removed, usually before a newborn leaves the hospital, was extremely common in the U.S. during the last century. But the percentage of U.S. babies being circumcised has gone from an estimated 90 percent in 1970 to about 55 percent today. In most other countries, circumcision is performed only for religious reasons.

The boy, who never appeared in court, was represented by attorney David Pasulka, who recommended against circumcision at this time.

The eight-month dispute took some nasty turns. Rizzo charged that the father did not care about the boy's health but feared his ex-wife and her new husband were trying to convert the boy to Judaism.

The father's attorneys hinted that the mother's aim was to spite her ex-husband and please her current husband, who is Jewish.

The boy's stepfather and stepbrother are both circumcised, while the biological parents are Catholic immigrants from Eastern European countries where circumcision is rare.

But Kaplan said he did not address "issues of ethnicity or religious beliefs relative to circumcision" because the parents did not raise them in their legal pleadings.

Dan Strandjord, a self-proclaimed "intactivist" who attended every hearing in the case, was elated Tuesday. "I believe this is a human rights issue," said Strandjord.

Hip-Hop Editor Wins Suit Over Her Firing (WP)

By Peter Carlson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

After a tumultuous two-week trial, Kimberly Osorio, a former editor in chief of the Source magazine, won a workplace lawsuit against the popular hip-hop monthly, and a Manhattan jury awarded her $15.5 million.

"This is a victory for women in hip-hop," Osorio told the hip-hop Web site SOHH.com after the verdict Monday night. "I stood up and I won."

Osorio, who was fired by the Source last year, sued the magazine and its founders, David Mays and Raymond Scott, alleging sexual harassment, gender discrimination, defamation, retaliatory discharge and maintaining a hostile work environment. The defendants responded that Osorio was fired in March 2005 for "poor performance," including her decision to publish a cover photo of rapper Nelly without his posse and running a negative review of a CD by rapper Fat Joe.

DOJ_NMG_0085936

Osorio, now an editor at BET.com, testified that Scott repeatedly begged her for sex, and that another editor threatened to "knock me upside my [expletive] head."

The jury of six men and two women threw out the discrimination and sexual harassment complaints but found that Osorio was fired in retaliation for complaining to her bosses about discrimination and sexual harassment. In addition, the jury ruled that Scott had defamed Osorio in an interview after her firing.

The defendants quickly announced that they would appeal the verdict.

"This will be knocked out on appeal," Mays said in a telephone interview yesterday. "She won't collect on any of this."

The eight-day trial was enlivened by testimony about life in the Source's offices in New York, which was said to include watching porn videos, graphic threats of violence, and the spreading of rumors that Osorio, Mays and Scott had sexual relations with various rappers.

During the trial in U.S. District Court, Osorio's attorney, Kenneth Thompson, told Judge Jed S. Rakoff that Scott -- who is also a professional rapper known as Benzino -- shouted "Coward! Chump! Uncle Tom!" at him as he walked to the men's room during a recess. Scott denied the charge. The judge gave Scott the choice of staying in the courtroom or being escorted out of the building by a marshal.

"I'll leave," Scott said, and a marshal took him out.

Scott has long been a controversial figure in the rap world. In 2003, he released a Benzino album that included a song attacking rapper Eminem, and the Source promoted it by publishing a cartoon that depicted Benzino holding the bloody severed head of Eminem. "That's all part of hip-hop," Mays explained yesterday. "That's part of the game of being a hip-hop artist."

Both Mays and Scott left the Source in January and recently started a new publication, HipHop Weekly, which published its first issue this week. According to its press release, the magazine includes "exclusive photos of DMX going after the sound man at a recent Long Island concert" and "an exclusive report on Jay Z stating, 'I'm out for dead president Bush' while performing."

Yesterday, Mays praised Scott as "a great man" who was unfairly maligned by Osorio's lawyers during the trial.

"They tried to assassinate his character because he didn't go to Harvard like me," Mays said.

Bush Campaigns On Pocketbook Issues (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 25, 2006

Look around the dinner table and add $500 to your tax bill for each child, President Bush said Tuesday as he sought to convince voters that Democrats would destroy the economy and the family budget if they took over Congress.

"When you go to the voting booth in two weeks, the lever you pull will determine the taxes you pay for years to come," Bush said on a fundraising swing through Florida aimed at adding nearly $1.4 million to GOP coffers. "You will feel the results every April 15."

Each one of the president's recent political speeches has offered new zingers aimed at making more ominous the specter of Democrats in charge of the House or Senate, either on the subject of tax cuts or fighting terrorism. On Tuesday, Bush singled out for special emphasis the gradual doubling of the child tax credit from $500 to $1,000, one of several cuts passed during his administration with expiration dates.

"If you're sitting around a dinner table and there's two children, your taxes just went up $1,000 if they take control," the president said, continuing to do the math for three children, or four.

But he didn't get it quite right. Bush skimmed past the fact that the child tax credit is not yet $1,000 and doesn't reach that level until 2010.

He also ignored that many Democrats now say they want to retain that tax cut. In 2001, when it originally passed by a 282-144 vote, most Democrats voted against it because they said it was part of an overall Bush-backed tax package that provided meager tax relief in the early years, was far more costly than GOP estimates and was tilted toward wealthy taxpayers.

DOJ_NMG_0085937

"The question is: Why hasn't the president and his rubber-stamp Republican Congress joined Democrats' efforts to expand the child tax credit?" said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., referring to Democrats' wishes to make low-income families eligible for the credit.

It was the president's second day in a row emphasizing economic good times — fallen gas prices, low unemployment, a record-setting stock market, rising consumer confidence — as the elections approach.

But polls show the public isn't prepared to give Bush's party the credit. When likely voters were asked earlier this month in an AP-Ipsos poll whom they trusted more to handle the economy, 51 percent said Democrats, 38 percent said Republicans.

Bush made his cash-raising visit for GOP congressional candidate Vern Buchanan cheaper for the Republican businessman's campaign by stopping briefly at Gyrocam Camera Systems. The rules governing how a campaign reimburses the government for an appearance by Bush or another official dictate that scheduling an official event alongside the political one reduces the share of the president's travel costs that must be funded by the candidate.

Gyrocam supplies the military with detectors for roadside bombs in Iraq and Afghanistan. In a company hangar, Bush repeated his argument that a Democratic-led Congress would raise taxes, and noted that the military's use of Gyrocam's detection product helps prove his administration's commitment to adapting the Iraq war to changing circumstances.

Buchanan is in a tight race against Democrat Christine Jennings for the south Florida seat being vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris, who is running an uphill race for the Senate, against her party's wishes. Later Tuesday, Bush raised $1 million for the Republican National Committee at a closed event in a Boca Raton mansion in the district of GOP Rep. Clay Shaw, who is running one of the nation's most difficult re-election races.

Bush has campaigned just two to three days a week throughout October, usually with only a couple of stops each day.

The White House had promised the pace of the president's campaigning would pick up significantly after September, with more events, more of them open to media coverage and the advent of rallies instead of only fundraisers. The White House contends Bush's campaign activity this year is as or more aggressive than before the 2002 midterm elections.

But by the same date in October 2002, a more popular Bush had appeared at eight huge candidate rallies and headlined six open fundraisers. This October, he has so far held 11 open fundraisers but has still, with two weeks left until the Nov. 7 voting, not attended a single rally.

"His campaign, in terms of the number of events, it's been very aggressive," said White House deputy press secretary Tony Fratto.

Fratto also said that any 2007 planning at the White House is not taking into account the possibility of having to work with a Congress at least partially controlled by Democrats.

"We're still in the game, and if you're in the game, you're in it to win," he said. "We're ready to work with a Republican Congress."

The president remained positive as well, even making light of the heightened pre-election speculation.

"The Democrats make a lot of predictions. As a matter of fact, I think they may be measuring the drapes," Bush said. "If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions, November 7th is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

In Sarasota, Bush Urges GOP Faithful To Get Out The Vote (HTRIB)

By Jeremy Wallace

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), October 25, 2006

MANATEE COUNTY - During a brief stopover, President George W. Bush exhorted Republicans to show up on election day, saying that a strong GOP turnout is critical to preserving his tax cut package and winning the War in Iraq.

“We’re going to do everything we can to protect you before the enemy attacks,” Bush told a crowd of about 1,500 supporters at the Sarasota-Bradenton International Convention Center.

Appearing at a $20 a person fundraiser for Republican congressional candidate Vern Buchanan, the president spent a good portion of his speech warning the audience that Democrats, if they gain control of Congress, will discontinue tax cuts and disrupt U.S. efforts in Iraq.

Bush also told voters not to believe Democrats who say they want a tax cut for the middle class.

DOJ_NMG_0085938

"You will feel the results every April 15" if Democrats win, Bush said. "Americans should not be fooled by their rhetoric."

After his speech, Bush's motorcade made a stop at Gyrocam Camera Systems, a local company with a $51 million contract to provide the Armed Forces with explosive-detecting cameras that can be mounted on personnel carriers and other military vehicles.

Bush then headed to the airport and boarded Air Force One, which left for Florida's East Coast about 2:45 p.m.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 8:11 pm

Worst seat in the house?

Jeremy Wallace

» Read blog: Political Insider

Could there be a worse seat for a United State Senator to have to sit next to me for an hour?

That's exactly what happened today, when U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez, a Republican, sat down to hear President Bush speak at the Sarasota Bradenton International Convention Center.

His reserved seat was next to where Secret Service agents had positioned the media. No press handlers. No staff. Just me and Martinez for an hour.

After reminiscing about his recent campaign stop for Buchanan at a Sarasota bowling alley, the first term senator and I talked about the war in Iraq.

Martinez said it's so difficult to talk about the war because the media is being so aggressive to determine if Republicans are supporting or opposing the president.

Virginia Republican Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, seemed to open the floodgates to Republican criticism of Iraq policy this month when he warned after a trip to Iraq that the war was "drifting sideways" and a course correction might soon be warranted.

Martinez said he's more than willing to sit down and explore the situation in Iraq in a thoughtful way, but is convinced the media will seize on one two-word statement like with Warner, and pit him against or with the President.

So, Martinez said he'd just as well prefer to wait until after election day.

Martinez has been hitting the campaign trail for Buchanan pretty hard. This is his third visit to Sarasota in the last 60 days. Prior to that, it had been almost two years since his last public visit.

Martinez told fellow reporter Doug Sword last week that he's in part paying back political IOUs. When Martinez ran for the Senate in 2004, Buchanan was chairman of his fundraising committee.

"It's a result of my gratitude for him, for what he did for me, and the fact that I believe he'd be a good congressman," Martinez said.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 6:19 pm

By ASSOCIATED PRESS

Cheney says Hillary Clinton could win presidency

WASHINGTON -- Vice President Dick Cheney said Tuesday he thinks Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton could win the presidency. He said Sen. Barack Obama might be viewed by voters as too inexperienced.

Cheney handicapped the Democratic field of potential candidates in an interview with conservative talk show host Sean Hannity.

"I think Hillary Clinton is a formidable candidate," Cheney said. "I think she could win. I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

Cheney said Obama, an Illinois Democrat, was an "attractive guy. Don't know him well, met him a few times. I think at this stage, my initial take on him was he's been two years as a senator. I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in. But certainly, he's an attractive candidate. If he decides to run, he'll be a player on the Democratic side."

DOJ_NMG_0085939

Obama said Sunday he was considering a run for president in 2008, backing off previous statements that he would not do so.

As for himself, Cheney said he would not budge from his oft-stated decision that he will not run for president. "It's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable," the vice president said. "I don't know how else I can say it. If nominated, I will not run; if elected, I will not serve."

Cheney also said he was optimistic about Republican hopes in the Nov. 7 elections.

"I think we'll hold both the House and the Senate." Last week, Cheney raised eyebrows when he sounded less sure about GOP prospects. "I think we'll hold the Senate and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House," he told Rush Limbaugh.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 6:00 pm

By SNN NEWS 6

(SNN NEWS 6)

Cooler temps to continue

SNN News 6's David Karnes says the mercury will dip a little lower overnight Tuesday.

Comments | Watch the video

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 5:25 pm

By STAFF REPORT

County to pay $15,000 for medical bills for woman hurt in crash with cop

BRADENTON — County commissioners Tuesday agreed to pay $15,000 to cover the medical expenses for a teenager injured when a Manatee County sheriff's patrol car struck her vehicle.

Andrea Malara was 15 years old when the deputy's car, with its lights flashing, ran a red light eastbound on State Road 70 at Tara Boulevard in June 2001.

Malara was a passenger. The driver of the vehicle was not injured. Authorities said the deputy's patrol car flipped several times after the crash.

Malara, county records show, refused to be taken to the hospital by ambulance. Her parents drove her to Manatee Memorial Hospital. Malara said she suffered injuries to her neck, head, shoulders, back and jaw.

The county's agreement to pay $15,000 terminates a lawsuit Malara's attorneys filed against the Sheriff's Office in November 2004. The settlement was reached last month through mediation, court records show.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 5:20 pm

By Staff Report

Bradenton man dies from injuries in Sunday wreck that resulted in a fire

BRADENTON — A 51-year-old Bradenton man was killed in a one-vehicle crash this week after his Jeep slammed into a trailer and caught fire, Florida Highway Patrol troopers said.

The man, John E. Geier, was eastbound on Whitfield Avenue on Sunday about 10:15 p.m. when his vehicle struck a trailer in a construction site, authorities said.

Troopers said Geier died Monday afternoon at Tampa General Hospital from injuries sustained in the crash, which happened near Prospect Road. Geier suffered burns to more than 80 percent of his body.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 5:09 pm

By : David Karnes, Chief Meteorologist SNN News 6

Cool again Wednesday

Weather First

» Read blog: Weather news

Tuesday morning saw a record low of 51 degrees at SRQ. The old record was 52 degrees back in 1982.

Wednesday morning will be another near record morning with lows dropping into the low 50s along the coast and mid to upper 40s inland.

DOJ_NMG_0085940

Wednesday afternoon will be a little warmer than Tuesday was. Highs will still be well below normal, however, in the mid to upper 70s.

We will start to warm back into the low 80s by Thursday, but another front will move through and bring us some showers and storms Friday with another shot of beautiful weather for the weekend.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 5:03 pm

By Steve Echeverria Jr.

WSLR Costume Party @ Khrome Cancelled

» Read blog: Entertainment

The Fogartyville Cafe and WSLR (96.5 FM) have cancelled the planned costume party at Club Khrome meant to celebrate the community radio station's Guiness World Record crown for having the "World's Youngest Radio DJ."

The party was planned for Sunday, Oct. 29.

The owner and manager of Khrome were recently arrested on durg possession and money laundering charges.

Instead, WSLR officials will present seven-year-old Joshua Rabow, who hosts "The Saturday Morning Cartoon Show," with an award at the Sarasota Blues Festival between 7-8 p.m.

For more information call (941)741-9755.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 4:26 pm

Kitson picked to build Murdock Village

In a bid to end months of frustation, County Commissioners Tuesday chose Kitson & Partners to develop the 1,100-acre Murdock Village site.

Unless the county hits another negotiation snag, Kitson & Partners -- the developers of Babcock Ranch -- will transform the land into a hopping downtown center, possibly anchored with a satellite campus for Florida Gulf Coast University.

A month ago, the county was in negotioation over the same project with Stock Development.

The developer backed down early this month, blaming a slow real estate market for its unwillingness to pay the $94 million it promised in its bid.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 4:11 pm

By Susan Rife

A full Book Review section

It's not that often that the New York Times Book Review section is packed with reviews of things I either have already glanced at (and set aside on my "get to right away" pile or have already begun to read), but such was the case on Oct. 15. Of nine fiction reviews, I'd actually already read "Abundance" by Sena Jeter Naslund and put aside "Human Traces" by Sebastian Faulks, "Black Girl/White Girl" by Joyce Carol Oates and "The Light of Evening" by Edna O'Brien.

Several books on the nonfiction list also had already piqued my interest, but at the top was Bill Bryson's memoir, "The Life and Times of the Thunderbolt Kid." Sadly, this book has yet to fall into my greedy little outstretched hands, but reading the review remnded me of how much I loved "A Walk in the Woods," Bryson's hysterically funny book about hiking the Appalachian Trail, and got to me to pull "A Short History of Nearly Everything" off my shelf and renew my interest in it, and also to read his 1989 memoir, "The Lost Continent: Travels in Small-Town America" (Harper Perennial).

Like "A Walk in the Woods," this is a deeply personalized travel journal as Bryson sets out from his native Des Moines in search of the perfect small town. He logs more than 13,000 miles onto his mother's Chevette as he crisscrosses the country, horrified by the strip-malling of America and how generally ugly many places are (this is after he had spent 20 years living in England, so there you have it).

As the reviewer in the Times notes, "The Lost Continent" is convulsively funny: "In fact, I remember reading it on the couch and disturbing my wife in her kitchen-table academic studies with my howls," he writes. "When she asked me what was so funny, I would, in reading the passage aloud to her, inevitably be reduced to body-racking, tear-inducing, de-couching laughter."

DOJ_NMG_0085941

That was my experience as well, both with "The Lost Continent" and with "A Walk in the Woods," which I read while flying across that very lost continent, trying to stifle my giggles in order to not overly alarm my seatmates. I highly recommend the book, especially to anyone who's experienced the joy and pain of backpacking.

In "The Lost Continent," Bryson loosely recreates the childhood vacations of his family, when Dad would drive and Mom would navigate and Billy and his sister would duke it out in the back seat. Dad of course would stop only at bona fide historical monuments and never at the kind of roadside attractions kids so dearly love. I can relate, since my dad was that same unhappy guy behind the wheel and I was among the kids crowded three across in the back seat of the station wagon cruising through the west and never once stopping at goofy roadside attractions. National parks, you bet. Anything with a side show, not so much.

Here's Bryson on visiting Gatlinburg, Tennessee.

"I loved it. When I was growing up, we never got to go to places like Gatlinburg. My father would rather have given himself brain surgery with a Black and Decker drill than spend an hour in such a place. He had just two criteria for gauging the worth of a holiday attraction: Was it educational and was it free? Gatlinburg was patently neither of these... So Gatlinburg to me was a heady experience. I felt like a priest let loose in Las Vegas with a sockful of quarters. All the noise and glitter, and above all the possibilities for running through irresponsible sums of money in a short period, made me giddy.

"I wandered through the crowds, and hesitated at the entrance to the Ripley's Believe It or Not Museum. I could sense my father, a thousand miles away, beginning to rotate slowly in his grave as I looked at the posters. They told me that inside I would see a man who could hold three billiard balls in his mouth at once, a two-headed calf, a human unicorn with a horn protruding from his forehead and hundreds of other riveting oddities from all over the globe collected by the tireless Robert Ripley and crated back to Gatlinburg for the edification of discerning tourists such as myself. The admission fee was five dollars. The pace of my father's rotating quickened as I looked into my wallet and then sped to a whirring blur as I fished out a five-dollar bill and guiltily handed it to the unsmiling woman in the ticket booth. 'What the hell,' I thought as I went inside, 'at least it will give the old man some exercise.'"

Bryson goes on to report that the museum was the ultimate guilty pleasure. As is reading any of his works, all of them subject to the highest levels of comic exaggeration. If you need a break from the grim realities of the world, Bryson's books certainly offer it. I can't wait to get his newest, "The Life and Times of the Thunderbolt Kid." In fact, I think I'll head to the bookstore right now. There's no better way to spend an evening than de-couching oneself with laughter.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 3:50 pm

By SNN NEWS 6

(SNN NEWS 6)

Bush, Buchanan speak at rally

Portions of speeches by Congressional Candidate Vern Buchanan and President George W. Bush in Sarasota this afternoon.

Comments | Watch the video

Advertisement

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 3:40 pm

By STAFF REPORT

Dropping fuel costs to be passed on to FPL customers

STAFF REPORT

There is even more good news on the petroleum front: dropping fuel costs have prompted Florida Power & Light to bolster the cut it plans to customer bills starting in January.

FPL forecast a 1.8 percent drop in September; now it is 5 percent.

That would take the average customer's bill from $108.61 per month to $103.51.

The Juno Beach-based power provider said that it expects a similar drop for business customers.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 3:21 pm

DOJ_NMG_0085942

By Jeremy Wallace

President Bush delivers remarks at a 'Vern Buchanan for Congress' event in Sarasota. (ASSOCIATED PRESS)

In Sarasota, Bush urges GOP faithful to get out the vote

MANATEE COUNTY - During a brief stopover, President George W. Bush exhorted Republicans to show up on election day, saying that a strong GOP turnout is critical to preserving his tax cut package and winning the War in Iraq.

"We're going to do everything we can to protect you before the enemy attacks," Bush told a crowd of about 1,500 supporters at the Sarasota-Bradenton International Convention Center.

Appearing at a $20 a person fundraiser for Republican congressional candidate Vern Buchanan, the president spent a good portion of his speech warning the audience that Democrats, if they gain control of Congress, will discontinue tax cuts and disrupt U.S. efforts in Iraq.

Bush also told voters not to believe Democrats who say they want a tax cut for the middle class.

"You will feel the results every April 15" if Democrats win, Bush said. "Americans should not be fooled by their rhetoric."

After his speech, Bush's motorcade made a stop at Gyrocam Camera Systems, a local company with a $51 million contract to provide the Armed Forces with explosive-detecting cameras that can be mounted on personnel carriers and other military vehicles.

Bush then headed to the airport and boarded Air Force One, which left for Florida's East Coast about 2:45 p.m.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 2:00 pm

By STAFF REPORT

President Bush, right, waves as he arrives with Florida congressional candidate Vern Buchanan on Tuesday at Sarasota-Bradenton International Airport. (ASSOCIATED PRESS)

Air Force One on the ground at SRQ

President George W. Bush has arrived in Sarasota. He disembarked from Air Force One at Sarasota-Bradenton International Airport a few minutes before 1 p.m.

Bush was joined on the tarmac by Pinellas County resident Tom Cooney. Bush presented Cooney with a Volunteer Service medal for Cooney's 20 years of teaching sign language.

Bush's motorcade then proceeded to the nearby Sarasota-Bradenton International Convention Center, where the President will appear at a fundraiser for Republican Congressional Candidate Vern Buchanan.

Come back to HeraldTribune.com for continuing coverage of the president's visit to Sarasota.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 2:00 pm

By SNN NEWS 6

(SNN NEWS 6)

President Bush arrives at SRQ

Herald-Tribune reporter Todd Ruger reports from the tarmac as the President arrives in Sarasota aboard Air Force One.

Comments | Watch the video

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 7:11 am

By STAFF REPORT

Daybook: What's ahead in the news today

There's nothing like a presidential visit to get a newsroom whipped into a frenzy. Air Force One will be landing at Sarasota-Bradenton International Airport today, and we will of course have reporters from the Herald-Tribune and SNN News 6 on the scene. SNN News 6 will bring you live coverage from the airport a little before 1 p.m., and we will also be reporting from the Vern Buchanan fundraiser President Bush is coming to Sarasota to attend. We'll have lots of picture and video here at HeraldTribune.com later in the day.

Tuberculosis testing begins at Nolan Middle School today, for the 200-plus people exposed to a case of TB there. Results are expected to be available later this week.

CFO candidates Alex Sink and Tom Lee and attorney general candidates Skip Campbell and Bill McCollum will debate later this morning in Key Biscayne.

And at 8 p.m. tonight, candidates for governor Charlie Crist, Jim Davis and Max Linn will debate at Nova Southeastern University in Davie. The debate will air live on public television stations around the state.

President Brings His Clout To Boost Florida Hopefuls (MH)

By Jennifer Mooney Piedra And Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA - This one should have been a cakewalk. Republicans have held the U.S. House seat here since before Rep. Katherine Harris, the former Florida secretary of state, parlayed her celebrity into winning the job.

But polls suggest Democrats are poised to seize control of the House -- in part by possibly picking up this seat and two others in South Florida. President Bush swooped into the cavernous convention center in Sarasota on Tuesday to raise money for the Republican candidate and to label Democrats as "genetically disposed" to increase taxes and weak on fighting terrorism.

Bush's visit to Florida -- in which he touted his record on the economy -- comes just two weeks before a critical midterm election in which Democrats need 15 seats to retake the House.

"The stakes in this election are high," Bush told a crowd of 2,000 at a reception for Republican Vern Buchanan, locked in an unexpectedly tight race to replace Harris, who is vying for Democrat Bill Nelson's U.S. Senate seat. Polls put Harris at least 20 points behind Nelson.

Democrats, Bush noted to laughter, ``have made a lot of predictions. Matter of fact, I think they may be measuring the drapes."

Buchanan promised that with Bush's help, "we will maintain a Republican majority in the House," and a defiant Bush predicted victory.

`A GOOD DAY'

"If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions," Bush said of the Democrats, ``Nov. 7 is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

Strategists, though, suggest Democratic prospects have been aided by bleak reports out of Iraq, mixed with distaste for corruption scandals -- topped by U.S. Rep. Mark Foley's resignation last month after graphic Internet exchanges with former House pages were made public.

Foley's Palm Beach-area district -- in which Republican Joe Negron will face Democrat Tim Mahoney -- is among three Florida seats Democrats hope will help their cause. Democrats also are gunning for the the seat long held by Fort Lauderdale Republican Rep. Clay Shaw. Independent polls show the race in a dead heat, as does polling done by Shaw and his Democratic opponent, state Sen. Ron Klein.

Some Democrats suggest it would be particularly satisfying to secure the Republican-leaning Sarasota seat vacated by Harris, who likely would have won a third term.

Buchanan has had trouble gaining traction since he limped out of a bitter primary with 32 percent of the vote amid attacks on his business practices. The millionaire auto dealer and major GOP donor has pumped nearly $4.5 million of his own cash into the campaign, making it one of the nation's costliest.

Internal polls are said to show him trailing Democrat Christine Jennings.

Bush called Buchanan a ``decent, honorable man who deserves to be elected to the United States Congress."

BIG NAMES

Republicans are clearly focused on the race: Vice President Dick Cheney attended a recent fundraiser; Gov. Jeb Bush, U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney campaigned for Buchanan last week; and first lady Laura Bush will speak at a Buchanan fundraiser on Friday.

As for Jennings, Bill Clinton will headline a fundraiser for her campaign next Tuesday in New York, and Sen. Hillary Clinton is to speak at a fundraiser today, also in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0085944

"We've got the wave, but it's also candidate recruitment," said Democratic donor Kirk Wagar, a Coconut Grove lawyer who has maintained for a year that the three Democratic candidates would be competitive.

Though the president's popularity ratings are low and Democrats have proven eager to nationalize the Sarasota race and make Bush the issue, Sally Tibbetts, a spokeswoman for Buchanan, said the campaign welcomed the president's support.

"They offered to do whatever they could to help, and we're honored to have the president," she said.

Shaw has worked to position himself as a moderate, in part by distancing himself from Bush. His campaign called a reporter Tuesday to underscore that a Republican National Committee fundraiser in Boca Raton that Bush attended Tuesday had "nothing to do" with Shaw's campaign.

Laura Bush, though, will headline a Shaw fundraiser on Friday.

The Republican faithful in Sarasota waved American flags and cheered Bush on as he spoke. Among the fans: 70-year-old Bob Spencer.

RED, WHITE & BLUE

Spencer, decked out head-to-toe in red white and blue, said he's optimistic the GOP will prevail and that the president's visit helps the cause.

"The president might take this race right over the edge," said Spencer, of Bradenton. ``President Bush is loved by the conservatives as much as Ronald Reagan was -- if not more."

Miami Herald staff writers Erika Bolstad and Beth Reinhard contributed to this report.

President Says Democrats Are 'Disposed' To Increase Taxes (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla., Oct. 24 -- President Bush accused Democrats on Tuesday of being "genetically disposed" to raise taxes, as he sharpened his rhetoric on the economy in an effort to rally Republicans to the polls next month.

Appearing here on behalf of GOP congressional hopeful Vern Buchanan, Bush mocked Democrats for what he described as their misplaced pessimism that tax cuts would not stimulate the economy. He said it was only one of many poor predictions by the Democrats and suggested they are making another mistake in their growing confidence that they might take the House next month.

"I think they may be measuring the drapes," Bush said to titters within the crowd of GOP partisans. "If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions, November 7th is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

"George Bush sure has a lot to say for a guy who added $3 trillion to the nation's debt," responded Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

While the president was in Florida, Vice President Cheney tried to rally the party faithful Tuesday on Sean Hannity's radio talk show. He warned of "some jeopardy, depending on how the election comes out, as to whether or not we'll be able to continue" the administration's national security policies.

Cheney also offered some political commentary, describing Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) as a potentially "formidable" candidate in the 2008 presidential sweepstakes. "I think she could win," Cheney said. "I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

And he described Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) as an "attractive guy" who will be "a player on the Democratic side" if he decides to run for president. But with only two years as a senator, he said, "I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in."

Bush Battles For GOP Dominance (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Using mocking language to belittle Democrats, President Bush launched a muscular political attack Tuesday in his campaign to preserve Republican majorities in the House and Senate, challenging the Democrats' economic record and their commitment to fighting terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0085945

Two weeks before an election that threatens to bring upheaval to Capitol Hill, the White House is yielding not a bit to the possibility that come January, Bush might have to deal for the first time with a Democratic majority.

"The Democrats make a lot of predictions. As a matter of fact, I think they may be measuring the drapes," he said.

"If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions," Bush said, recalling Democrats' grim projections after Congress enacted his tax cuts, "Nov. 7 is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

The president, who has made the Iraq war a central element in his stump speech as he seeks to convince voters that a Democratic-led Congress would weaken the effort, has also been trying to gain political traction from such upbeat economic news as falling energy prices and a rising stock market.

On Tuesday, he turned to taxes, seeking to raise the prospect that they would go up if Democrats took charge.

"When you go to the voting booth in two weeks, the lever you pull will determine the taxes you pay for years to come," Bush said. "Americans will cast their ballots on Nov. 7, but you will feel the results every April 15."

He cited, as he has in the past, a statement by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the likely speaker if her party wins a majority, expressing Democrats' "love" of tax cuts.

Citing Democratic opposition to tax cuts he had proposed, the president said: "If this is the Democrats' idea of love, I wouldn't want to see what hate looks like."

Democrats have argued that the tax cuts were responsible for the soaring budget deficit, which is now dropping, and have said that they oppose wholesale extension of some of the cuts as they expire in coming years and want to balance them more toward middle-class taxpayers.

"Democrats who have made fiscal responsibility a high ethical standard and middle-class tax cuts a priority must be a frightening prospect for President Bush and his rubber-stamp Congress' failed economic policies and ballooning budget deficits," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said.

The president spoke at a rally here that Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt said raised $375,000 for Vern Buchanan, a Republican House candidate in a tight race in a Republican-leaning district. Later, Bush spoke at a private party in Boca Raton that Schmitt said raised $1 million for the RNC.

The event here was Bush's first in Sarasota since Sept. 11, 2001. He was in a classroom with elementary school students when he was told a second plane had struck the World Trade Center.

Seeking to use Democrats' opposition to elements of the Patriot Act, which beefed up law enforcement intelligence operations after Sept. 11, and to legislation creating military tribunals to try alleged terrorists, Bush said: "The vast majority of Democrats opposed the right of this administration to have a tool necessary to protect you…. They must not think we're at war. They must think that the best way to protect you is to respond after the attack.

"The vast majority of Democrats voted against giving our professionals the right to interrogate to protect America. These are patriotic souls, but their vision of the world is wrong, and we want to make sure that we continue to control the House of Representatives to provide the protection necessary."

Critics of the measures questioned whether they abrogated defendants' rights and opened the door to unnecessary spying on Americans.

Minutes from the Sarasota airport, Bush made an unannounced stop at Gyrocam Systems, a company that makes cameras used to help soldiers spot roadside bombs in Iraq. The visit illustrated two of the president's themes: the role of small business in boosting the economy, and — as he moves away from the phrase "stay the course" to describe his policy in the war — the shifts taking place to counter insurgents.

"Our goal in Iraq has not changed…." he said to reporters. "Our tactics are adjusting."

President's Boca Visit Pulls In $1 Million (PALMBEACHP)

By George Bennett And Michael Laforgia

Palm Beach Post, October 25, 2006

BOCA RATON — President Bush raised more than $1 million for the Republican National Committee during a brief stop here as the costly battle over which party controls Congress entered its final two weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0085946

After campaigning in Sarasota with Republican congressional candidate Vern Buchanan earlier in the day, Bush attended a late-afternoon fund-raiser at the home of advertising executive Jordan Zimmerman in The Sanctuary neighborhood between Federal Highway and the Intracoastal Waterway.

The $25,000-a-head event raised more than $1 million for the party, a GOP spokeswoman said. Gov. Jeb Bush and U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez also attended.

Zimmerman is the 50-year-old founder and chairman of Fort Lauderdale-based Zimmerman Advertising, which lists the Miami Dolphins, Lennar Homes and Office Depot among its clients.

Zimmerman is a registered Republican who contributed to Democratic Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman's presidential and Senate campaigns and to Democrat Peter Deutsch's 2004 Senate bid in Florida, according to data compiled by the nonprofit Center for Responsive Politics.

Zimmerman also gave $500 apiece to Republican governor candidates Charlie Crist and Tom Gallagher before the September primary.

The president arrived at Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood International Airport around 3:30 p.m. and traveled by 20-vehicle motorcade to the fund-raiser. Bush returned to Fort Lauderdale and departed on Air Force One just before 6:30 p.m.

When Bush arrived in Fort Lauderdale, he presented a volunteer service award to Parkland resident David Greenberger, a mentor with Big Brothers Big Sisters. Bush spent about five minutes greeting supporters, including consultant and Republican money-raiser Tom DeRita of Palm Beach Gardens.

"I just told him to keep going the direction he's going. We love him and he's doing a great job," DeRita said.

"It's always important when the president comes down," he said. "He's going to boost the morale. He's going to get us on target, and the rest is up to us to get the voters out and make sure we win."

In Boca Raton, several onlookers and a handful of antiwar protesters gathered across the street from the entrance to The Sanctuary to watch the president's arrival.

Bush, who helped Republican U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw raise more than $800,000 at a May event in Fort Lauderdale, did not appear with or raise money for any candidates in South Florida on Tuesday.

Shaw's Democratic challenger, Boca Raton state Sen. Ron Klein, has accused Shaw of being too closely allied with Bush.

Shaw spokeswoman Gail Gitcho said there was no significance to the fact that Bush and Shaw didn't appear together Tuesday and noted that first lady Laura Bush is coming to Palm Beach to raise money for Shaw on Friday.

Bush Stops By Boca Raton, Raises A Cool Million For GOP (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 25, 2006

President Bush passed through Fort Lauderdale on Tuesday to raise last-minute cash in Boca Raton for Republican candidates fighting to hold onto the party's majority in Congress.

On his 44th trip to Florida since becoming president, Bush did not stop to shake hands or tout his administration's policies.

Instead, supporters who gathered at Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood International Airport to see Air Force One touch down received just a quick glimpse of the president before his motorcade sped off to a Boca Raton fundraiser.

The private event held at the mansion of advertising executive Jordan Zimmerman raised $1 million for the Republican National Committee.

The money likely will fuel advertising and get-out-the-vote efforts to motivate the Republican base in districts with close congressional races. That could help counter voter dissatisfaction with the party because of perceived congressional inaction, scandals and the war in Iraq.

On Friday, first lady Laura Bush is expected to attend a Palm Beach fundraiser for U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw, who is in a tight race against Democratic state senator Ron Klein for Florida's 22nd Congressional District.

Shaw, who has held the seat for 26 years, was notably absent from the small cadre of Republicans who greeted the president on the tarmac.

DOJ_NMG_0085947

Palm Beach Gardens Republican Tom DeRita, chairman of Shaw's fundraising efforts, said the candidate had a scheduling conflict.

U.S. Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, D-Weston, said she thought Shaw was keeping his distance for political reasons.

A key part of Klein's campaign strategy has been linking the veteran Republican legislator to Bush as the president's approval ratings dip in the polls, largely over his handling of the war.

"There's nowhere in the country where the president is more unpopular than South Florida," Wasserman Schultz said. "All he is at this point is a cash cow for them."

Democrats need to win 15 seats to gain control of the House, and Florida has three of the nation's most fiercely fought congressional races.

Larry Sabato, a political science professor at the University of Virginia, said the White House recognizes that candidates in politically divided districts like Shaw's may need to distance themselves from Bush to win.

"President Bush is not in high demand this election season, unlike 2002 and 2004," Sabato said.

Still, for Bush supporter Barbara Wing of Coral Springs, who turned out for the president's arrival, just seeing his plane land was "awesomely exciting."

"I don't care if you're a Democrat or a Republican, he's still the president," she said.

After stepping off Air Force One, Bush presented an award to David Greenberger, 42, of Plantation, for his volunteer work with Big Brothers Big Sisters of Broward County.

The president's 3:30 p.m. landing in Fort Lauderdale and 6:15 p.m. departure went smoothly. However, his visit disrupted evening rush hour traffic on Interstates 95 and 595 near the airport.

Earlier in the day, Bush campaigned in Sarasota, a traditional Republican stronghold, for GOP congressional candidate Vern Buchanan. He is in a fierce race for the seat of U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, who is running for the Senate.

In addition to the Shaw and Harris seats, Republicans are fighting to elect state Rep. Joe Negron to Mark Foley's House district. The disgraced Republican resigned and dropped out of the race after revelations that he sent inappropriate e-mails and text messages to boys who had served as congressional pages.

Bush's remarks in Sarasota focused on the economy and his administration's doubling of the child tax credit.

"When you go to the voting booth in two weeks, the lever you pull will determine the taxes you pay for years to come," Bush said.

It was the president's second consecutive day emphasizing a positive view of the nation's economy. Republicans cite falling gas prices, low unemployment, a record-setting stock market and rising consumer confidence as signs of growth.

Social Security Enters Elections (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

More than a year after Social Security reform faded from the political radar screen, the debate erupted anew yesterday, as Democrats seized on news that President Bush hopes to revive an unpopular proposal to make changes in the national retirement program.

In recent days, Bush has said Social Security remains one of the "big items" he wants to tackle next year and he continues to "believe that a worker, at his or her option, ought to be allowed to put some of their own money . . . in a private savings account, an account that they call their own."

The statement appeared to represent no substantive change for the White House, and it varied little from the president's previous remarks.

But with just two weeks to go until the Nov. 7 congressional elections, Democrats highlighted Bush's comments, seeing an opportunity to remind voters about a Republican proposal that polls have shown is highly unpopular with many voters.

"Just when you thought your Social Security was safe from privatization, George Bush is bringing back his plan to privatize Social Security and cut guaranteed benefits," declared a news release from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, the party's fundraising arm for Senate races.

DOJ_NMG_0085948

Democratic strategists were gleeful about the chance to draw a sharp distinction between the parties on Social Security, an explosive issue among elderly voters. "I couldn't believe it. What an opening," Democratic pollster Celinda Lake said. "I think he had an out-of-body experience."

Some Republicans were equally perplexed by Bush's timing.

"I guess you could argue if it gets Iraq off the front page, it was probably a good thing at this point," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), a top Republican strategist who opposed the president's Social Security plan. But a new White House push on the issue "is not going anywhere. This president never likes to back down. I think he's putting it on the table, but I don't think anybody's going to pick it up."

The administration is trying to mount a new, bipartisan effort to rein in the costs of Social Security, along with Medicare and Medicaid.

Though Bush's plan stalled in Congress last year, the new Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., has said he took the job in part to tackle the rising cost of government health-care and Social Security spending, which he has called "the biggest economic issue facing our country." And Bush regularly mentions his desire to take another stab at the issue.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto yesterday said that the president "is interested in addressing the long-term challenges our country faces, and he's not going to be shy about doing that."

Fratto was traveling with Bush in Florida, where last year's aborted attempt at Social Security reform has been an issue in competitive House races. In South Florida, where Bush attended a Republican National Committee fundraiser, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) has touted his opposition to Bush's push for private accounts in a television ad.

"I represent the state of Florida, not a political party," Shaw says in the ad. The 13-term incumbent is locked in a tight race with Democratic state senator Ron Klein.

Republicans elsewhere have also scrambled to distance themselves from the president on the issue. In Ohio, Rep. Deborah Pryce and Sen. Mike DeWine have struggled, under attack, to explain their positions on the president's plan.

DeWine said he opposes using tax dollars for private accounts, according to a candidate survey by AARP, the group formerly known as the American Association of Retired Persons.

And Pryce said in a debate last month that while she still agrees with the concept, she has heeded voter demands to drop the issue, according to news reports. Her campaign has called her strong backing of the Bush plan "ancient history."

AARP yesterday released candidate surveys from 35 competitive House races and 10 competitive Senate races in which Republican candidates overwhelmingly refused to take a definitive stand on private accounts -- or opposed them outright.

One of the few exceptions was Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), chairman of a Senate subcommittee on Social Security and an outspoken advocate of the president's plan. He is trailing Democrat Robert P. Casey Jr. in recent polls.

Santorum told AARP that he continues to support private accounts, so long as they are voluntary. On the campaign trail, he has lashed out at Casey -- and Democrats in general -- for failing to offer their own ideas for tackling the Social Security problem.

"He won't give you an -- he won't give you an answer on Social Security. He won't give you an answer on anything to make any changes," Santorum said in a television debate last month. "My question to Mr. Casey is: If you're not for personal retirement accounts, which he says he's not, how much are you going to raise their taxes? Or how much are you going to cut benefits to fix the Social Security problem?"

Bush Finding Welcome Mats As G.O.P. Looks For An Edge (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla. Oct. 24—President Bush cannot show up just anywhere in the waning days of this midterm campaign. But there is a certain class of Republicans who are somewhere between eager and willing to have him at their sides.

There are those facing ethical questions or struggling to recover from gaffes. There are those desperate for the cash Mr. Bush can bring in just by showing up for lunch. There are those who need the president to turn out a demoralized base. And there are those who, like Vern Buchanan, the Republican candidate for the House here, are a little bit of all three.

DOJ_NMG_0085949

In another year, with another candidate, a Republican would be a shoo-in in Sarasota. But Mr. Buchanan, a wealthy car dealer dogged by accusations of business improprieties, is lagging behind his Democratic opponent, even though the district — currently represented by Representative Katherine Harris, who is running for Senate — tilts Republican and the candidate has poured more than $4 million of his own money into his campaign.

So Mr. Buchanan did what a handful of other Republicans in trouble are doing. He called in Mr. Bush, who zipped through here Tuesday to raise a little money and, more importantly, fire up Republican voters.

"The Democrats have made a lot of predictions." Mr. Bush told cheering supporters who had gathered in a cavernous warehouse-turned-convention-hall, where tickets to hear him could be had as cheaply as $20. "Matter of fact, I think they may be measuring the drapes. If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions, Nov. 7 is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

The appearance, which Republican officials said raised $375,000, offers a hint of how White House strategists will use Mr. Bush in the final two weeks of the midterm campaign. With his public approval ratings hovering around 37 percent, Democrats making effective use of advertisements attacking the president and Republicans in many races distancing themselves from him, Mr. Bush is far more limited than he was four years ago in where he can appear.

One Republican strategist close to the White House, granted anonymity to speak candidly about campaign strategy, said some Republicans — among them Senate candidates in tight races in Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Tennessee — simply do not want their final campaign images to include Mr. Bush, and have spurned White House offers for help.

Instead, White House strategists are sending Mr. Bush to Republican-leaning districts like Sarasota, where he can help energize the base and increase voter turnout. The president will also appear in swing districts where the Republican candidate has calculated that the last-minute infusion of cash he can bring in is worth more than any bad publicity surrounding the visit.

"You probably won't see him too much in the Northeast or the areas where he has less popularity," said Charlie Black, a Republican strategist who consults regularly with Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's chief political adviser. "But we do have a number of races that are very close, where the president, as champion fund-raiser, can still get some extra money in there and allow us to outspend the opponent."

Then there are those whose campaigns took unfortunate turns. Over the past several weeks, Mr. Bush has come to the aid of Representative Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania, who admitted having an extramarital affair; Senator George Allen of Virginia, whose campaign has been plagued by accusations of racial and ethnic insensitivity; and Representatives Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle of California, both of whom have been touched by corruption scandals in Washington.

Mr. Bush is also still raising money for his party at private events. After his Sarasota appearance on Tuesday, he flew across the state to Boca Raton, where he scooped up $1 million at a private dinner for the Republican National Committee. The committee has been using money raised by Mr. Bush to help candidates around the country, especially in its effort to retain control of the Senate.

On Thursday, Mr. Bush is to campaign in Iowa with a House candidate, Jeff Lamberti, and in Michigan, with Mike Bouchard, who is trying to unseat Senator Debbie Stabenow. On Saturday, he will travel to Indiana to campaign with Representative Mike Sodrel. On Monday, he will attend Republican rallies in Georgia and Texas.

Presidents do not often make return trips during campaigns — ordinarily, it is a big deal to get the commander in chief to come just once — but Mr. Bush has already campaigned for both Mr. Sodrel and Mr. Bouchard. Mr. Sodrel won in 2004 thanks in part to a heavy turnout in his district for Mr. Bush. Republicans say Mr. Bouchard could pull ahead if he had more money.

How much the president can help these candidates is an open question — even among the candidates themselves. In a carefully worded statement, a spokesman for Mr. Bouchard, David All, refrained even from mentioning the president by name when asked why Mr. Bush was coming back.

"Any time we can bring decision makers to Michigan and have the opportunity to talk with them about Michigan's future, regardless of whether they are Republican or Democrat, we're going to take it," Mr. All said.

Here in Sarasota, Mr. Buchanan is running against Christine Jennings, a banker who is positioning herself as someone who will manage taxpayers' money wisely. Analysts of both parties say that message is going over well in this seaside community, where economic conservatives have been critical of deficit spending by the Republican-controlled Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0085950

With Democrats trying to make the election a referendum on Mr. Bush, the president is trying to turn the tables and make it a referendum on Democrats. He used his remarks on Tuesday to hit the opposition party hard, calling Democrats "genetically predisposed" to raising taxes and accusing them of thinking that "the best way to protect you is to respond after the attack."

The unstated message, analysts say, is, Vote Republican — no matter who the candidate.

Bush Welcome To Raise Cash, But No Pictures And No Press (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla. -- President Bush has become the Stealth Campaigner.

Candidates across the country, especially those in tight races where the president's power to draw cash is most valuable, want him to drop by for a fundraiser. They just don't want their picture taken with the head of the party -- mainly because they know it will end up in their opponents' television commercials.

So far this year, Mr. Bush has done 10 times as many closed-press fundraising events compared to 2002. He has also not appeared at a single major Republican rally, unlike four years ago, when he did 32.

"What a difference a few years makes," said Democratic National Committee spokesman Stacie Paxton. "Republicans are happy to take his cash, but when it comes to photo-ops and campaign stops, President Bush is persona non grata. ... Clearly, President Bush is toxic to many of the candidates across the country."

So far this campaign cycle, the president has followed a different path than he did in the last midterm congressional elections in 2002. While he has done about the same number of fundraising events -- 71 in 2002 and 67 so far this cycle -- just three events four years ago were deemed "closed press" by the White House, meaning that no reporters were allowed inside.

This year, the president has barred the press from 33 events, including a Republican National Committee dinner last night in Boca Raton, Fla.

While the White House plays down the marked rise in closed events, candidates are wary of being photographed with the president, whose approval rating has plummeted to record lows.

Democrats in 78 House races nationwide are using images of Mr. Bush and seeking to tie the unpopular president to the local Republican candidate, according to ABC News. In five of the seven Senate races on which the Democrats are making their strongest efforts -- Virginia, Tennessee, Ohio, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania -- Mr. Bush plays a leading role in campaign commercials.

With some projections having Republicans losing as many as 40 House seats this election, one prominent Republican strategist said yesterday that the White House is also wary of weighing in.

"Who wants to have their fingerprints on this mess," the strategist said on the condition of anonymity.

Mr. Bush has kept a very lean schedule of late. The president will attend just two open events this week, two weeks before the election. First lady Laura Bush has had a far more rigorous schedule, as has Vice President Dick Cheney.

By the numbers, from August to mid-October in 2002, Mr. Bush spoke at 29 events with candidates. This year's equivalent number is 15, according to Congress Daily. More incredible, Mr. Bush has yet to show up at a major political rally, although he plans to attend several starting this weekend. By contrast, on Oct. 24, 2002, he did two rallies in the same day -- one in Columbia, S.C., and one in Charlotte, N.C. -- his 11th and 12th rallies of the campaign season.

All told, in 2002 he would do some 32 voter rallies at airports and sports arenas, including three or four a day in the five days before the election.

The closest he has come to a mass rally this year was when thousands of people met him at Salt Lake City International Airport in August for a bipartisan rally to support the troops. It was not a political event, though, but one meant to counter an anti-war protest of Mr. Bush's visit to Utah to speak to the American Legion.

The president stopped yesterday in Sarasota for Vern Buchanan, the Republican who is running for the U.S. House seat currently held by Senate candidate Katherine Harris. Mr. Bush won the district in 2004 by 10 percentage points, but Mr. Buchanan is trailing by three in the latest polls. He decided to have Mr. Bush come down to help his cause -- despite the drawbacks.

DOJ_NMG_0085951

"It helps to solidify the base," he said, noting that the district has twice as many Republicans as Democrats. "We have to take the positive with the negative."

The White House notes that new fundraising laws have altered the landscape. In 2002, political rallies could be paid for with a mix of federal and state party cash known as "soft money," but this year, if a congressional candidate is involved in the rally, only "hard" money can be used.

Although many candidates this year prefer to keep a presidential visit under wraps, calls are still flooding into the White House requesting a drop-by by the fundraiser-in-chief. In 2002, Mr. Bush helped pull in $144 million, and so far this cycle, he's collected $124 million for candidates and the RNC.

For example, last night's Boca Raton fundraiser, at a massive stucco mansion in a gated community called the Sanctuary, collected more than $1 million for the RNC.

But most candidates have to make their last press buys Friday, so new money will likely not make it into this year's campaigns.

Top Republicans say the reason for the sparse schedule with just two weeks to go is simple: The party raised plenty of cash early, and is poised for a press blitz in the final days.

"The AP ran a story saying these Democrat congressional candidates outraised their Republican incumbents in the third quarter," senior Bush political adviser Karl Rove told The Washington Times last week. "What they didn't say is part of the reason they did is because we raised the money earlier so people would be able to deploy.

"If you look at the 31 top races ... we've got $31 million cash on hand, they have $15 [million]. That's odds I like. And it doesn't count what you see or what you don't yet see at the national committees," Mr. Rove said. "So you know: having incumbents, the structure, a plan, our financial advantage, all these things are going to come to play in the campaign."

Bush Should Focus On Korea (HILL)

The Hill, October 25, 2006

President George Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have succeeded beyond expectations in lining up China as a strong ally in forcing North Korea to abandon its nuclear ambitions. The New York Times reports that the Chinese are even threatening to ratchet back on their oil shipments to North Korea, which is totally dependent on Beijing for fuel.

But Bush is getting no credit for it and neither are the Republicans. All of the focus has been on the role that Rice and UN Ambassador John Bolton are playing in forcing North Korea back from membership of the nuclear club. President Bush needs to do much more to rivet popular attention on Korea, as opposed to Iraq.

No matter how Bush says that he is going to revise our Iraqi strategy, the war in and around Baghdad will always be a political loser for the Republican Party. But the president always has the power to change the subject. He must use that power to focus attention on a front that promises success as opposed to one that seems to offer only the prospect of more casualties.

There is increasing evidence that the Republican base is returning to the fold, just as Karl Rove, the president's close adviser and electoral strategist, predicted that they would. The state-by-state polls reflect GOP gains in Tennessee, New Jersey, Montana, Missouri, Virginia and in the national generic ballot tests. Since the Democrats must win two of the Senate seats in Tennessee, New Jersey, and Missouri and they are trailing in all three, there is a new possibility that the Republicans could pull out a midterm win. In John Zogby's generic ballot polling, the Democratic margin has collapsed from +9 two weeks ago to only +3 today. (Since America is not a democracy but chooses its House of Representatives in gerrymandered districts, a three-point Democratic win would not give the party control of the House, just as the popular vote win in 2000 failed to guarantee it the White House).

But, as Rove and Co. realize, almost every election features an endgame Democratic uptick as downscale voters, who normally pay no attention to politics, begin to focus on the election. Like non-baseball fans who only pay attention to the national pastime during the World Series, these downscale voters only enter the process in the end. Since downscale voters tend to vote Democrat, this usually gives the party an edge as the election approaches. It was this last-minute move that erased a Bush surge in 1992 and closed the Bush lead over Gore in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0085952

To guard against this Democratic close, Bush needs to distract the country from Iraq, and North Korea offers the best way to do so. Americans are justifiably scared by the prospect of a nuclear North Korea and Bush's efforts to assemble a global coalition to press Pyongyang have shown that Rice has learned how to play the game and win. But the president needs to bring the issue to public attention and use it to save himself from two years of subpoenas and hearings by making the next two weeks about Korea.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including "Rewriting History," a rebuttal to "Living History" by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Bush Advisers Blitz Radio Airwaves (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Associated Press, October 25, 2006

President Bush's political top gun Karl Rove gushes with optimism about Election Day. National security adviser Stephen Hadley says the Iraqis need to do more to secure their nation — and do it faster. Presidential confidant Dan Bartlett takes a few verbal punches at Democrats.

It was "Radio Day" at the White House where more than 30 talk show hosts were invited to set up shop in a heated white tent on the North Lawn to quiz senior administration officials. Beginning at 5:30 a.m., the broadcasters chatted live about everything from Iraq to homeland security to the Nov. 7 elections.

Rove predicted the Republicans would retain control of Congress, discounting polls that show the Democrats threatening to take over.

"You heard it here first," Rove declared in his interview with Fox News Radio.

Nearby, Charlie Sykes with WTMJ in Milwaukee, Wis., told White House counselor Bartlett, "I think we're about a minute out."

Bartlett, sitting with earphones hugging his head, also predicted a Republican victory. He said that while the Democrats attack the president, they don't articulate a different direction for America.

"They have yet to make the case about what they are for, and that's why I think they're going to come up short in this election," he said.

Talk about Iraq was buzzing in the tent.

"We are going to adapt," Bartlett said. "We are going to have a dynamic approach to the situation on the ground, but we're not going to throw up our hands and say, 'It's unwinnable.'"

Hadley said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the fledging government are starting to take steps to quell rising sectarian violence to help move Iraq toward prosperity and peace, but he added that they must do so more quickly.

"We're not making the progress we would like, and that's why we have to look at what we are doing and see what we need to change to get the kind of progress that we need," Hadley told Robert Siegel from National Public Radio.

"I think they've got to do more and they've got to do it faster, and I think if you talked to Prime Minister al-Maliki he would say, to you, the same thing."

Other officials who stopped by the tent or were interviewed at other spots at the White House included Vice President Dick Cheney, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Radio Hosts Get Closer To The White House -- If Only Physically (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

It sounded like the kind of friendly interview that administration officials expected when they invited 42 mostly conservative radio hosts to broadcast yesterday from beneath a long, heated white tent on the president's doorstep.

DOJ_NMG_0085953

"The American people, in my humble opinion, don't realize we're at war," Neal Boortz, an acerbic libertarian based in Atlanta, told presidential counselor Dan Bartlett. "How do you communicate to the American people that there is a grave threat that must be addressed?"

Moments after Bartlett moved down the rows of folding tables to the next interview, however, Boortz said during a break: "I've adopted the opinion that maybe I'd like to see the Republicans take it in the teeth in this election, lose the House and lick their wounds. They just haven't done enough to be rewarded with continued control in Washington."

For 15 years, the conservatives who dominate talk radio have served as shock troops for the GOP, bashing Democrats, hitting the hot buttons and rallying their listeners. Since the Republicans won back Congress in 1994, a feat in which Rush Limbaugh played a catalyzing role, through the disputed election of 2000 and President Bush's first term, the radio talkers have wielded a powerful megaphone for their ideological side.

But as Bartlett, Karl Rove, Tony Snow, Michael Chertoff and other top administration officials worked the tent during yesterday's day-long event, it became apparent that there are serious cracks in this once-solid wall of support.

"The corps of Bush supporters are just seething, angry and disappointed," said Jan Mickelson, a fixture in Des Moines radio. Iraq, he said, has become "ungovernable," voters are upset about "perceived corruption in the Republican Party," and "social conservatives feel like they've been used again." But in a point echoed by several of the hosts, Mickelson said that "immigration is the number one issue" fostering disgruntlement with the Republicans, because his listeners are "seeing the effects of lack of border control every single day."

Asked whether he wants the Democrats to win the midterm elections, Mickelson said: "I don't really give a rip. The conservatives would say, 'What's the worst that can happen? We're not getting anything we want now. We're getting nothing but frustration and ulcers.' " Charlie Sykes, a Milwaukee host, told Bartlett during an interview: "If the Republicans lose control of the House, they won't have anybody but themselves to blame."

Still, most of the conservative broadcasters are not rooting for a Democratic victory next month. Some say they are just reflecting the unease of their listeners. Others say they cannot abide the thought of a Democratic House or Senate.

"The Republicans certainly deserve to get spanked," said Steve Gill, a Nashville host. "The problem is, if you turn the Senate over to Hillary [Rodham Clinton] and Ted Kennedy, and Nancy Pelosi in the House, it's America that gets spanked."

Sykes said that "we've spent the last nine months being disappointed with the administration and being disillusioned." But now, he said, "people are getting more focused on the choice. . . . I don't think the Democrats have an alternative vision."

Administration officials have periodically blitzed the radio airwaves, where conservatives command big national or regional followings, as a way of circumventing the mainstream media. Progressive radio has made modest inroads in the past two years, but Air America, the fledgling liberal network, declared bankruptcy earlier this month.

Though a handful of liberals, such as Juan Williams of National Public Radio and Fox News, were allowed in the White House tent, others say they were shut out. Rachel Maddow, an Air America host, said the White House did not return her calls when she sought an invitation.

The talkathon enabled Rove, Bartlett and other officials to warn about the consequences of a Democratic takeover of Congress while being questioned in tones ranging from sympathetic to politely skeptical.

Martha Zoller, a host from Gainesville, Ga., said that "national security trumps everything," even though she does not like the administration's position on some domestic issues. "I don't think it does any good to say we're going to punish these guys by putting the other party in power, because it could be 10 to 15 years before we get conservatives back in power," she said.

The biggest star on the right yesterday was Sean Hannity, who is heard on 515 stations. He was granted interviews with Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, whom Hannity hailed as "a great American."

Even Hannity, who campaigns for GOP candidates, said he has disagreed with the White House on immigration and on the ill-fated Dubai ports deal, "and I think spending has been a little out of control." But he remains a fierce administration defender, calling the Democratic Party "pathetically weak" on defense and terrorism, and dismissing predictions that the House minority leader may soon move into the speaker's office.

"The Democrats and Nancy Pelosi picked out the drapes and carpet a little too early," Hannity said.

DOJ_NMG_0085954

White House Hosts Mass Talk Radio Event (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two weeks before a pivotal election, the Bush administration brought some of the Republican Party's conservative base to its front yard Tuesday by inviting talk radio hosts to broadcast from the North Lawn of the White House.

About three dozen radio hosts set up inside a huge tent, interviewing administration stars such as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and political guru Karl Rove. The hosts, both national and local, hailed from cities from New York to San Diego. They included a smattering of liberals.

"There are so many talking heads in one tent," joked Jan Mickelson, a "conservative-slash-libertarian" who hosts a morning show based in Des Moines. "It is not conducive to sound conversation."

Michael Harrison, publisher of the trade magazine Talkers, said the White House has held "radio days" before, including one President Clinton hosted in 1993 to promote his health care proposal. The Bush White House hosted a radio day less than a week before the elections in 2002.

Harrison said the difference this year is that some conservatives, such as economist Bruce Bartlett and blogger Andrew Sullivan, have been critical of Bush policies on the war in Iraq and federal spending as elections loom Nov. 7.

"Right now, the Bush administration is worried about its conservative base defecting," Harrison said.

Bush spokesman Tony Snow, himself a former radio talk show host, sat for at least 34 radio interviews in the big white tent. His list included national hosts Glenn Beck and Neal Boortz, as well as Inga Barks of Bakersfield, Calif., and Dave Jaconette of Kalamazoo, Mich.

"The chief objective is to make our case as clearly as possible, to as many people as possible," Snow said.

According to Talkers magazine, four of the five top talk radio audiences tune into conservatives: Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity, Michael Savage and Laura Ingraham. Of those, only Hannity showed up at the White House on Tuesday, and his day included an interview of Vice President Cheney to be run on both his radio and Fox News television programs Tuesday.

Cheney said the election could be decided on local issues. "I think sometimes we overestimate the extent to which these (midterm elections) are national in scope because we try to bring some order and understanding to it," he told Hannity.

Hannity, who also interviewed Rice, Rumsfeld, Rove and Snow, said the White House is appealing to "new media" because they have a "pretty significant audience."

Harrison, who reviewed a list of the 38 invited talk shows, said "a majority lean conservative" but noted there were others more moderate and liberal. Juan Williams, a senior correspondent with National Public Radio who has been critical of the administration, also interviewed Cheney.

The White House has used talk radio from time to time to get out its message. Last week, Cheney phoned in to Limbaugh's top-rated program to boast about the economy. In the midst of his campaign for changes to Social Security last year, President Bush gave an interview to Mickelson.

Bush was campaigning Tuesday, so Mickelson said he spoke with Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty and presidential counselor Dan Bartlett.

Mickelson said his listeners are particularly upset about "not controlling our borders" against illegal immigration.

Some of Bush's base "has abandoned ship, because they perceive he's abandoned them," Mickelson added. He didn't know if radio day would help Republicans on Election Day: "It's a little late in the game."

The GOP Leans On A Proven Strategy (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Beset by discouraging polls and division within ideological ranks, the White House is accelerating efforts to woo back disaffected conservatives and energize the Republican base in a reprise of a strategy that succeeded in the last two campaign cycles.

DOJ_NMG_0085955

President Bush and Vice President Cheney have given multiple interviews to conservative journalists, senior adviser Karl Rove has telephoned religious and social activists, and the White House has staged signing ceremonies for legislation cracking down on terrorism and illegal immigration. Two weeks before Election Day, Bush aides invited dozens of radio talk show hosts for a marathon broadcast from the White House yesterday to reach conservative listeners.

The message that Bush and others are sending to alienated supporters is that, no matter how upset they have been about various policies or political missteps over the past couple of years, life would be far worse under the Democrats. They name liberal lawmakers who would take charge of key committees and warn conservatives that taxes would go up and protection against terrorists would go down. And they cite, in particular, the confirmation of two conservative Supreme Court justices who might have been blocked by a Democratic Senate.

"The White House strategy is to remind us who would be in leadership in the House and Senate" if Democrats win, said Gary L. Bauer, president of a group called American Values and a Christian conservative who sends a daily e-mail to 100,000 supporters. "The idea is that that's going to be enough to get out most of this vote."

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a close Rove associate, said the White House team is blanketing the conservative circuit. "They're out there, they're talking to people, they're at our meetings," he said. "This is a full-court press." Norquist dismissed conservatives who are threatening to stay home on Election Day: "They're not doing anything other than whining."

Some conservatives said it is too late. "They honestly need a baseball bat against the head," said Republican pollster Frank Luntz, who helped Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) take over Congress in the 1990s. "Because if they don't change the lexicon immediately, as bad as this election is going to be, they're going to lose the presidency in 2008. I've given up on 2006. They've already made so many mistakes, there's no way they can fix it in two weeks. But I'm worried now they're going to lose all the marbles."

The White House courtship of the right paid enormous dividends in the past, but this year it is complicated by a far more skeptical audience than in 2002 and 2004. Conservatives who were key to those victories have grown frustrated with the Bush policies on federal spending, immigration, Iraq and foreign affairs, and uncertain of his commitment to issues such as preventing legalized same-sex marriage. The Mark Foley page scandal did not help reassure "values voters," as strategists call them, nor did the publication of a book by former White House official David Kuo saying that Bush aides dismissed Christian conservatives as "nuts."

Republicans in Washington Post-ABC News polls are unified behind GOP House candidates, but somewhat less so than Democrats are behind theirs. Ten percent of Republicans in the latest survey said they plan to vote Democratic this year, compared with 4 percent of Democrats who intend to cross over. One reason is that Democrats have made some headway among traditionally conservative groups.

In the most recent poll, 29 percent of self-identified conservatives said they plan to vote for Democrats for the House, compared with 17 percent in 2004. Among white evangelical Protestants, 30 percent favor Democrats, compared with 25 percent two years ago. At the same time, Republicans report being as enthusiastic as Democrats about voting this year, belying the assumption that they might stay home.

"This is going to be a very important part of the election," said White House political director Sara Taylor. "In a traditional midterm headwind, Republicans are going to have to make sure they turn out their base. In places where they do that, Republicans are going to win races they're supposed to win. In places where they don't do that, they're going to have a much harder time."

The White House has tried to rev up its base in various ways. Bush has given interviews to Fox News host Bill O'Reilly, the Wall Street Journal's Paul Gigot, and groups of conservative columnists and talk show hosts. Cheney appeared last week on Rush Limbaugh's radio show and yesterday gave an interview to conservative television and radio commentator Sean Hannity.

"Nancy is not in sync with the vast majority of the American people," Cheney said, referring to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who would become speaker if Democrats took over the House. "Nancy represents what I think is that side of the Democratic Party that has not been aggressive of and does not believe in a really robust, aggressive prosecution of the global war on terror."

DOJ_NMG_0085956

To maximize the blitz, the White House set up a tent on the North Lawn yesterday and let 42 radio hosts broadcast live during the day. Because it was on government property, "Radio Day" included outlets such as National Public Radio, but "it's mostly conservative talk," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "This is a chance to talk to people and get heard," said Snow, a former talk show host who did more than 20 interviews yesterday and has also been dispatched to talk to conservative Web sites such as the Power Line blog.

Rove wandered into the tent with a piece of paper guiding him to a dozen interviews yesterday. Others on hand included Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, presidential counselor Dan Bartlett, White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend, and budget director Rob Portman.

Iraq was a subject of discussion as officials tried to explain Bush's evolving rhetoric. Snow minimized the decision to no longer describe Bush's policy as "stay the course," telling Fox that he found only eight times when Bush used the phrase. The liberal Center for American Progress then quickly posted a list of 30 instances when Bush argued to "stay the course." And Rumsfeld told Hannity that it is "nonsense" to say Bush is "backing away from 'stay the course,' " saying he only wants to avoid confusion.

The White House has reached out in other ways, too. Rove hosted a conference call Monday with key conservative leaders, reminding them of the stakes of the elections. And the White House has staged events to highlight Bush's conservative positions. In Scottsdale, Ariz., Bush signed a spending bill that pays for more border patrol agents and the beginning of a new fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, a nod to conservatives who consider him soft on illegal immigration.

At times, though, the White House does not highlight actions that would help it with the right, leaving it to activists to do it themselves. In the same bill, unmentioned by Bush, is a provision banning authorities from confiscating lawfully owned guns during emergencies, a response to reports of firearms taken away in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

"I certainly didn't get a call about a signing ceremony," said National Rifle Association lobbyist Chris Cox. "But quite frankly, it was irrelevant as long as the bill was signed into law." The NRA notified its 4 million members and reminded them, as the group's Web site put it, that it "makes it clear why gun owners can never, ever sit on the sidelines during an election."

Paul M. Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, said the White House is not doing enough to repair relations with the base. "I'm not seeing anything," he said. "Maybe they're doing certain things with people who are closer to them. But in my case, I've not gotten any special treatment or invitations or whatever."

Still, Weyrich said the White House may yet benefit from conservatives coming home. "It'll all come down to conservatives," he said. "For a long time, I've heard nothing but 'I'm not going to vote for these jerks.' Now I'm hearing 'Well, I suppose we'll have to vote the jerks back in and see what we can do.' "

Polling director Jon Cohen contributed to this report.

Republican Base Loses Faith (CSM)

By Jane Lampman

The Christian Science Monitor, October 25, 2006

Ever since George W. Bush named Jesus as his favorite philosopher and positioned himself as a strong man of faith, Republicans have increasingly been viewed as the party sympathetic to religion - with the Democrats found seriously wanting.

That may be changing.

With the Congressional election less than two weeks away, recent surveys show signs of a shift among religious voters that could give Democrats a boost.

A Gallup poll earlier this month found white religious voters "equally as likely to say they will vote Democratic as Republican." And a Pew Research poll last week found just 57 percent of white Evangelicals planning to vote Republican, a drop from 68 percent in 2002 and 74 percent in 2004. Among white Catholics, the decline was even greater.

DOJ_NMG_0085957

"The GOP's problems with white Evangelicals are important, but they have even bigger problems with white Catholics," says John Green, senior fellow at Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life. "The survey shows a majority of white Catholics saying they'll vote for a Democratic congressional candidate; that's a return to where white Catholics would have been a decade or two ago."

The shift reflects plummeting support for the Republican administration and Congress over the war in Iraq and multiplying political scandals. But it appears that Democratic candidates' efforts to articulate their faith and values - and tie them to a broader range of issues - are also resonating with voters.

The party has initiated a serious effort to reach out to people of faith. For example, after a series of meetings with religious and lay leaders across the state, the Michigan Democratic Party has written language on the role of faith into its party platform.

Meanwhile, Christian conservatives are working hard to ramp up support for their priority social issues and get out the Republican vote, but they admit there is less enthusiasm this time around.

"Several factors play into a level of enthusiasm that is less than it was two years ago," says Tony Perkins, president of Family Research Council, a conservative religious group. "It's not a presidential election year, ... the threat [of same-sex marriage] has diminished in the minds of many, and you've had scandal in the Republican party.

"The Foley episode has caused some to step back and say, 'Wait a minute: What are the core values of the Republican party?' " he adds. "That's caused some to ask whether the big-tent strategy has led to the point where we've got a three-ring circus."

The buzzword after the 2004 election was the "values voter." Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John Kerry was criticized for not speaking convincingly in the language of faith, while the party was charged with being hostile to religion.

That opened the door wide for religious folk outside the conservative camp to begin to speak more openly. A host of books by progressive people of faith hit the market asserting that Christian values ranged far beyond what conservatives were promoting, particularly caring for the poor and environmental issues. A number of new organizations formed to galvanize moderate and liberal Christians. 'Christian' doesn't mean 'Republican'

Red Letter Christians - named for the teachings of Jesus printed in red letters in some Bible editions - advocate "an evangelicalism marked by compassion and justice," in the words of cofounder Tony Campolo, professor emeritus at Eastern University, a Baptist-affiliated university in St. David's, Pa.

The Catholic Alliance for the Common Good organized to inform Catholic voters on the "full range of issues" they should consider given Catholic social teachings. Last month the group distributed more than a million voter guides.

Christian Democrats established a new online community, Faithfuldemocrats.com, to engage religious and political leaders and ordinary Americans in discussions on putting faith into action. They aim to show that the Republican party doesn't have a monopoly on values or on being Christian.

"I don't know how many Tennesseans have told me that their pastor or Sunday School teacher told them you cannot be a Democrat and a Christian," says State Sen. Roy Herron, a Democratic leader in the Tennessee legislature and a co-founder of the online community.

He says Democrats bear some responsibility for such perceptions. "The charge that some Democrats have been insensitive to religion is a valid one, and others of us have been keeping our lights under a bushel," he explains. "Some of us have been reluctant to speak of our faith in the political arena ... because we can see a danger that people deeply rooted in faith will seek to use God rather than be used by God." But now it's imperative "to tell the truth about our faith." Democrats play up their faith

In the current campaign, a number of Democratic candidates are seeking to do just that. Prominent party leaders have led the way: Sen. Barack Obama's speech on faith and politics last June won wide play in the press and accolades from the public; Senator Kerry followed with a speech about his own religious convictions that many say he should have given in 2004.

Others in the political fray are opening up. In Ohio, Democratic gubernatorial candidate Ted Strickland has talked regularly about faith and values and is way out in front of his religious conservative opponent, Ken Blackwell. Ohio went for President Bush in 2004, but Republican scandals and a deteriorating economy have put the social issues promoted by conservatives on the back burner for many voters. Instead, raising the state minimum wage is garnering support from more than three-quarters of Ohioans, according to a recent poll.

DOJ_NMG_0085958

In Tennessee, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., who is running for the US Senate, filmed a TV ad from his home church explaining his values and has a faith statement on his website. Pennsylvania state treasurer Bob Casey Jr., an anti-abortion Democrat running against conservative Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, has given the Democrats a different face on the abortion issue.

Such efforts "may help particular Democratic candidates get Evangelical votes, but it might be even more effective with Roman Catholic and mainline Protestants, groups that have been voting Republican but aren't as strongly wedded to the GOP," suggests Dr. Green, a longtime political analyst from Ohio.

Two other innovations may also benefit Democrats as they try to bring religious voters into the fold. A number of Democratic candidates are advertising for the first time on Christian radio. And national and state Democratic parties are working hard on outreach to religious groups. The chief of staff of the Democratic National Committee, in fact, is a Pentecostal pastor. Strategies to change perceptions

Mark Brewer, chair of the Michigan Democratic Party, says their "listening meetings" with faith groups and rewriting of the platform have helped change perceptions. They also have policy initiatives involving faith groups, such as seeking common ground on abortion reduction.

"I want to make sure on an ongoing basis that people of faith feel comfortable participating in the party," Mr. Brewer says.

On a national level, however, this outreach is controversial among some secular party members. And the impact of such efforts remains to be proven.

Disillusionment among Christian conservatives may also be a factor. Along with the scandals, an explosive new book by David Kuo, former deputy in the White House office for the faith-based initiative, describes an administration that looked down on Christian leaders and chose not to deliver on promises while exploiting the Christian base for political advantage. In "Tempting Faith," Mr. Kuo calls on fellow Christians to go on "a fast" from politics for the next two years.

The religious right has been intensely active in recent weeks, holding a "values summit" and working to energize churches and voters. The Family Research Council sponsored a national TV broadcast from Boston Oct. 15, highlighting the same-sex marriage issue and its potential link to religious liberty.

Yet Mr. Perkins of the FRC is well aware of the changing environment. "The core of the Evangelical community sees voting not just as an opportunity, but as an obligation, so they'll vote," he says. "The real question is how many people they'll call and take to the polls with them."

He also acknowledges Democratic efforts. "It's going to have an impact, but to the degree of getting people to switch to the Democratic party, I doubt it at this point in time," he says. If Democrats begin to establish a track record on issues people care about, they could, he adds, "but it's going to take awhile."

Still, it's notable to hear a religious-right leader long wedded to the Republican camp then add: "I think competition is good for our economy, and it's good for our political environment as well."

Disillusioned Insider's Book Tests Bush's Image As 'Pastor-in-Chief' Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

LEBANON, Ohio -- On a recent evening, Lori Viars and Jim Winters sit at a table in a dining room, stuffing envelopes and chatting as if about a mutual friend.

Only the "friend" is President Bush. And the old house in the center of this historic town isn't a home any longer. It is undergoing renovations to become Republican Party headquarters for Warren County, north of Cincinnati--reflecting the population growth, and conservatism, of so many exurban counties where the Bush-era Republican Party has staked its fortune.

MIDTERM SURVIVAL GUIDE

• Chief Concerns: Who Heads Key Committees if Democrats Win the House?1

DOJ_NMG_0085959

• Review the results of the latest polls2 in hot Senate races, and see what the data could mean for the breakdown of seats in the chamber after Election Day. (Oct. 19)

• Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers3 (Oct. 19)

• Representative Races: Data on 15 key districts4 (Oct. 19)

WASHINGTON WIRE

5

See the expanded online version of Washington Wire6. The Journal's Washington bureau updates the Wire each weekday with analysis, news and buzz from inside and outside the Beltway. Plus, continuously updated campaign coverage7

Jim, the music minister at nearby Grace Baptist Church, wears a wrist band reading, "One Nation Under God." He asks Lori, a party official and mother of two, if she'd heard that the president lately is praying from a new daily devotional book. Lori says she hasn't; Jim can't remember which book it reportedly is. Yet both know that Mr. Bush had been using the long-popular prayer book, "My Utmost for His Highest," by the early 20th century Scottish minister Oswald Chambers.

Meanwhile, they go on stuffing envelopes for would-be voters with brochures for local, state and federal Republican candidates, their enthusiasm seemingly undiminished by persistent bad news and bad polls for the president's party. On a recent Saturday, volunteers—mostly Christian conservatives—made 3,556 calls to potential voters from this old house, urging them to come out on Election Day Nov. 7.

Another Book

The conversation between Mr. Wilson and Mrs. Viars comes amid publication of another book that perhaps should be required reading for evangelical conservatives: "Tempting Faith." Author David Kuo worked in the White House office for the faith-based social initiatives that were a foundation block of Mr. Bush's 2000 platform. The book recounts his disillusionment with officials, up to the president. On his promotional tour, Mr. Kuo is calling for Christians to "fast" from politics for two years.

From pages 229-230: At the White House, "They know 'the nuts' were politically invaluable, but that was the extent of their usefulness.....National Christian leaders received hugs and smiles in person and then were dismissed behind their backs and described as 'ridiculous,' 'out of control,' and just plain 'goofy.'"

When then-Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle called to give a green light to a faith bill, Bush aides, concerned about its cost, said "maybe next year." (p. 196) Privately, aides called the legislation "the f---g faith-based initiative" (p. 243), and the president "knew it was languishing and had no problem with that." (p. 257) The promised $8 billion a year, mostly in tax credits for helping the poor, didn't make it into the Bush tax-cut bills. The White House "was mocking the millions of faithful Christians who put their trust and hope in the president and his administration." (p. 253)

Perhaps understandably, Mr. Kuo's book hasn't gotten the attention of another, best-selling author Bob Woodward's "State of Denial" on the administration's mal-administration of the Iraq-Afghanistan war—the biggest issue on Americans' minds generally these days. Yet even among Christian conservatives, the reaction to the Kuo book—where there is any—is a shoot-the-messenger dismissal.

"David Kuo? Who is he?" asks Paul Weyrich, co-founder with Jerry Falwell of the Christian conservative political movement in the late '70s. "The person at the White House I talk to every week is Tim Goeglein"—a top liaison to Christian conservatives with a long history in evangelical political circles. "I know he does not ridicule us."

Faith in the President

But forget Mr. Goeglein. What's more important, as Mrs. Viars's and Mr. Wilson's chat suggests, is that the Christian conservatives seem to have faith that the president is sincere. And that's what the White House is counting on, as it looks to Christian conservative voters to come out next month and at least blunt the big losses the party almost certainly will suffer.

Not far from here in Ohio, the president of the statewide Christian conservative group Citizens for Community Values, Phil Burress, says, "I do not know the president and I've never to my knowledge been in the same room with him. But I do know a half-dozen people who have been in the room with him, and have been with him in prayer." Moreover, Mr. Burress adds, Mr. Bush's appointments of John Roberts and Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court were "huge" for conservatives dreaming that Roe vs. Wade will someday be overturned.

DOJ_NMG_0085960

As a sanguine Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's top strategist, puts it, "It's David Kuo and George W. Bush, and who do you think has greater credibility in the evangelical community?"

Calling from the road, Mr. Kuo (pronounced "kwo") resignedly acknowledges the slings and arrows from his former White House colleagues, and from among the leaders of the Christian conservative political groups. He says one conservative columnist has dubbed him "the axis of evil."

As for those leaders, he says, "Here's the bottom line: Christians have traded in the priceless gift of God for political hay." Going back over the 30 years that the national Republican Party has been making common cause with the religious right, Mr. Kuo says, "Christians have been utterly exploited," but "as long as the politician mentions Jesus, they are happy." He dismisses as not credible the White House's categorical denials that anyone there has ever spoken negatively about Christian conservatives. He will not answer the most frequently asked question: Who exactly called the religious leaders "nuts" and "goofy?"

Given the cynicism that pervaded White House deliberations, he says, "Who didn't say it? Who didn't, in some way or another, say it?"

Mr. Kuo will say that he never heard Mr. Bush say those exact words.

Meanwhile, Mr. Kuo says he isn't surprised that the president is accorded greater credibility than he is. After all, Mr. Kuo says, "the news in the book…is that everything about his public faith"—from the Bushes' church attendance to accounts of his readings—"has been the mostly closely guarded imagery of his presidency. Everything is done to preserve the Christian image—President Bush as pastor-in-chief. Because when he's pastor-in-chief, Christians don't have to think critically."

That said, Mr. Kuo says that Mr. Bush's "faith is real, his empathy is genuine and his compassion is astounding." But the president is, at bottom, "a political person in a political institution trying to achieve political ends." And those, it seems, too often are at odds with the ends that Christians were led to believe the president would seek.

Rove Upbeat About GOP Money, GOTV (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, October 25, 2006

Karl Rove told Republican supporters last Friday that the media was misreading the political environment — that the combination of money and mobilization of religious conservatives could keep the House in Republican hands after November.

Speaking at a fundraiser for Ohio GOP congressional candidate Joy Padgett at the Old Ebbitt Grill, Rove said polls showed that evangelical Protestant voters were still enthusiastic and suggested that Republicans started with a two- to three-point advantage because of their successful voter turnout operations in 2002 and 2004.

When asked if Rove remains as confident in private about the 2006 election, Padgett said, “Even more so.”

Despite evidence that voters could direct a barrage of negative public opinion against Republican officeholders on Election Day, Rove and President Bush have been upbeat, making some Democrats nervous about current predictions and worrying some Republicans.

“Even if you know the ship is sinking, you have to act like it’s a sunny day,” said former Democratic Party Chairman Terry McAuliffe. “You got to keep your folks motivated to get them out to vote.”

“Rule Number Six of politics: Don’t believe your own spin,” said Joe Gaylord, a Republican strategist and aide to former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who guided the Republicans to victory in 1994.

Nevertheless, Republicans believe their significant financial advantage and the Republican National Committee’s get-out-the-vote (GOTV) operation can protect them against the anti-Republican trends reflected in opinion polls.

“Republicans are building on their record,” Rove said at the event, referring to the GOP’s successful voter turnout efforts in 2002 and 2004. “Democrats are building on theirs.”

The RNC’s vaunted 72-Hour GOTV program has been in the works for months, taking hundreds of steps to help endangered incumbents, said a GOP lawmaker familiar with the efforts. The RNC even has set aside money and volunteers to dispatch to problem areas.

The party committee spent $350,000 for a GOTV effort in New Hampshire where the state party has been ravaged by scandal and helped register more than 3,000 new voters in GOP Rep. Heather Wilson’s congressional district in New Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0085961

In regards to turnout, Rove said a question in a recent New York Times-CBS poll skewed findings that religious conservatives were discouraged. Instead, he pointed to a survey conducted by the Pew Research Center showing that 54 percent of white evangelical Protestants viewed Bush favorably (still, a 20-point drop from 2004) and 57 percent said they supported GOP candidates (a nine-point decline from 2002).

Moreover, a Gallup poll released this month found that the GOP's 22-point advantage among white frequent churchgoers in September had evaporated.

"The situation is exactly the opposite and under-appreciates just how catastrophically bad the situation is for Republicans among independent voters," said David Rhode, a political scientist at Duke University.

Rhode pointed to polls showing that independent voters are breaking toward Republicans. A Washington Post-ABC poll released Tuesday showed that they favored Democrats by a 2-to-1 margin.

Former Rep. Tony Coelho (D-Calif.) said that Rove was speaking in absolutes in order to excite Republican voters. He added that he expected that religious Republicans would turn out to vote, but they would not do so in the numbers they did in 2004.

In 2000, Rove overestimated Bush's showing in the election, predicting Bush would win 320 electoral votes; he won just 271. Four years later, Rove predicted Republicans would pick up seven House seats, but the GOP gained just three.

Democrats Won't Count Votes Before They're Cast (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

Democrats, stung by unexpected defeats in the past two national elections, are trying to fend off poll-generated overconfidence by staying on the offensive and focusing on get-out-the-vote efforts.

"We've learned our lessons. The last two elections we thought we'd do better. Nobody's taking their foot off the gas," said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network.

"There's a cautious optimism that's broken out. I don't think anyone's overconfident right now," said Mr. Rosenberg, whose group works on Democratic message and voter turnout.

Danny Briscoe, a campaign media consultant and former Kentucky state Democratic Party chairman, says from party leaders and pundits to grass-roots Democrats, feelings swing between disbelief and superconfidence -- at least when it comes to House control.

"Mostly, our people are afraid to believe it," he said of favorable polling.

"They think [Karl] Rove may have something up his sleeve, they remember exit polls said Kerry beat Bush, they remember Republicans not losing seats in 2002 and 2004 under Bush when history said they should have."

Fighting those feelings of disbelief, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi has emphasized that a Democratic takeover of the House isn't definite and that there's still work to be done.

"While the indicators look good, it drives us to work harder," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for the California Democrat.

But Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, recently told the New York Times that some Democrats are in "somersault land" already, a luxury he said he doesn't have.

With polls showing a notable lead for their party, some Democrats have clearly found it impossible to temper their extreme confidence.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, predicted at a recent party event that Democrats will exceed the 15-seat net gain they need to retake the House.

"Democrats will take 40 seats in the House, and if the election were held today, we'd take control of the Senate too," he said, according to the Pittsburgh Tribune Review.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, recently told New Hampshire's Union Leader that he's "very confident" of a House victory for Democrats and "hopeful" of one in the Senate, where Democrats need a net gain of six seats.

DOJ_NMG_0085962

And even Mrs. Pelosi laughed and told the Associated Press this month: "I'll have any suite I want" when asked where her office would be if she becomes speaker of the House.

Polls in the past few days have indicated that Democrats lead Republicans by an average of 16.8 percentage points in generic party-preference polls. The latest nonpartisan Cook Political Report poll reported that most likely voters prefer a Democrat-controlled Congress by 22 percentage points.

"Waves come crashing in; they also pull you out," cautioned Chris Redfern, chairman of the Ohio Democratic Party.

"We have to focus on our efforts between now and election night and spend less time focusing on ... the drapes we'll pick out."

There is some evidence that Democrats' confidence may be premature.

Dick Morris, a former strategist for President Clinton, yesterday wrote that the Republican base "seems to be coming back home," according to vague emerging trends in polls.

In the Tennessee Senate race for instance, Republican Bob Corker has taken a lead over Democrat Harold E. Ford Jr., according to Zogby and Rasmussen polls. In New Jersey's Senate race, Republican Tom Kean Jr. now leads Democratic incumbent Robert Menendez in the latest Zogby poll.

The generic Democratic edge is down from nine points a few weeks ago to four points now, according to the Zogby survey -- all of which prompt the two strategists to say control of Congress has shifted from "lean Democrat" to a "tossup."

A Gallup poll over the weekend also found 54 percent think their own representative deserves to be re-elected.

Still, both parties know the ultimate outcome largely hangs on voter turnout.

"You don't count polls; you count heads," Mr. Redfern said.

He said his get-out-the-vote operation is shunning "the unbridled enthusiasm" for Democrats that he sees coming from Washington pundits and pollsters.

In Ohio and elsewhere, Democrats are working this year to match the successful voter turnout program Republicans put in place.

"I've seen no signs of Democratic overconfidence as I travel the country, because overconfidence is when you believe something will happen but don't have a lot of good reasons," said Merrill Matthews, a political analyst for the Texas-based think tank Institute for Policy Innovation.

Democrats May Be Poised To Win, But They're Still Lost (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

There are lots of reasons why businesses run into trouble, but a few pop up with remarkable regularity.

Misreading or ignoring market signals.

Focusing more on competitors than customers.

Confusing management with leadership, tactics with strategy.

Promoting leaders who misunderstand their jobs and surround themselves with blind loyalists.

It should be no surprise that these business missteps are also common in politics.

They are the key mistakes that led Republicans to overplay their hand and perhaps throw away the chance to renew their political lease on Congress and the White House.

Though the election is still two weeks away, there are signs the Democrats, if they win, are determined to make the same mistakes.

Let's start with the "Six for '06" plan that Democrats promise to ram through the House in the first 100 hours, or 100 days -- I'm a bit confused as to which. The very premise of the document represents a fundamental misreading of the political marketplace.

First, there is no mandate for a Democratic agenda because until last week, there wasn't one. Like most political turning points, including the one in 1994, this election is fundamentally a referendum on the party in power rather than on the promises of the opposition. The voters are angry at Republicans, dissatisfied with their programs and disenchanted with their governance. It's less that Democrats will have won this election than Republicans will have lost it.

DOJ_NMG_0085963

Second, if Democrats want to show they are different from Republicans in how they would govern, it inspires little confidence that they want to push a Democratic version of former House speaker Newt Gingrich's "Contract with America" through the House without consulting the Senate, the White House or the other party. That's precisely how the House has been run for the past four years, with little to show for it.

Worse still, the Democrats' six-point program is more a compendium of political slogans and ideological hot buttons than a serious policy agenda -- again, the very thing the customers say they don't want.

It may be fun to talk of ending "tax giveaways" to big oil companies and big drug companies and corporations that send U.S. jobs overseas, but people serious about governing know those are complicated issues involving powerful interest groups that can't be resolved in isolation.

Or take rising college tuition, which everyone would agree is a problem. Unfortunately, if Democrats had bothered to consult any good Democratic economist, they would have found that creating an expensive new tax deduction for tuition payments is not only lousy and regressive tax policy but will drive tuitions even higher.

You'll be relieved to know that once the Democrats take power, there will be "no privatization of Social Security, in whole or in part." But don't bother looking for how they plan to make this bedrock social program solvent again. It ain't there.

Certainly, I feel much safer knowing that Democrats plan to "require the Iraqis to take responsibility for their country" -- no details on that one quite yet. And I'll be fascinated to learn how Democrats plan to "double the size of special forces," "re build a state-of-the-art military" and screen every car, truck, airplane and cargo container crossing the border while "restoring fiscal discipline." And all that before the Easter recess!

Indeed, reading through the "Six for '06" document, it's pretty clear Democrats have followed Republicans into the trap of thinking more about competition (winning elections) than consumers (voters). Instead of offering a credible strategy for extricating us from the horrible mess in Iraq, confronting difficult fiscal trade-offs and reversing the powerful market forces that are leading us toward economic insecurity and inequality, they offer nothing more than political tactics.

One House member told me this week not to pay much attention to the "Six for '06" plan, that it was just some "easy stuff" designed to build momentum by gaining quick passage in the House. What he and his colleagues seem to miss is that the voters have become disillusioned with the focus on the easy stuff. They're ready to follow politicians with the guts and creativity and honesty to tackle the tough stuff.

The chief architect of Democrats' strategy has been House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, who would be the first female speaker of the House if the Democrats win control. Pelosi comes honestly to the role of political boss and manag er: Her father was a Baltimore mayor and congressman who taught her the art of ward politics, the effective use of the "favor bank" and the bedrock importance of party and personal loyalty.

But it's an open question whether Pelosi can make the transition from being a tough, effective manager of the opposition to leader of the whole House in what will remain a divided government. The times call for a speaker who can stand above the partisan fray, who is wise enough to hold her enemies as close as her friends, and trusted and respected enough by the other party and the other chamber to broker deals and get things done.

For Pelosi, those skills would be a stretch. Even now, she has trouble with Democrats who once opposed her election as majority leader, let alone those who defied her by cooperating with Republicans. And she has surrounded herself with loyal colleagues and staffers who reflect her weaknesses more than compensate for them. She has turned down compromises that might have won half a loaf for her side and refused to stand behind President Bush when national unity was called for. But she has rarely missed an opportunity to pile on when Republicans were down. It's telling that despite a lifetime in politics and six years as opposition leader, Pelosi has never mastered the art of losing gracefully.

In politics as in business, the way to create enduring advantage is not by beating the competition at its game but changing the nature of the game. Up to this point, all Democrats have been doing is beating the Republicans at their game.

Democrat Waxman Could Give The Bush Administration Fits (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0085964

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - He's not as high profile or as flamboyant as Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who would become the first female speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives if Democrats win control on Election Day.

He doesn't promise the drama of Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., who would take over the House Judiciary Committee and has talked since 2003 of impeaching President Bush.

Yet if you want to watch a Democrat who could give the Bush White House hell for the next two years, keep an eye on Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.

You might cheer him on. You might hate him. But you won't be bored.

A stranger to many Americans, the 67-year-old Waxman would become chairman of the House Government Reform Committee if the Democrats take over the House. He's one of the shrewdest, most effective inside players in Congress. And armed with the committee's subpoena power, he'd force the Bush administration to spend much of its last two years in office answering questions about its first six.

For one, he'd haul in the vice president's staff and energy industry executives to find out what went on behind closed doors when Dick Cheney and the industry wrote the administration's energy policy in 2001.

For another, he'd summon the Commerce Department brass to answer reports that they manipulate media coverage of global warming, including steering an MSNBC reporter away from a climate expert who believed the problem is worsening.

And he's certain to probe into abuses by contractors in Iraq, for he has criticized Halliburton and other such firms continually since 2003 for various schemes that he says ripped off U.S. taxpayers.

Giving Waxman the gavel would be a dramatic shift for the House, which all but dropped congressional oversight of the executive branch when a Republican administration was sworn in on Jan. 20, 2001.

It would also be a shift for Waxman, who spent the 1990s largely defending the Clinton administration and accusing the Republican House of overreaching in its investigations.

"When President Clinton was in office, congressional committees were themselves on steroids and investigated every possible allegation of wrongdoing, no matter how small," Waxman said at a recent panel sponsored by the Center for American Progress, a Democratic think tank.

"But when President Bush took over, oversight virtually ceased. No matter how big the issue, Congress now often looks away."

Since then, he said, "we've had an imperial presidency and a subservient Congress for the last five years, and the costs to the nation have been enormous."

Waxman is a veteran of three decades in the House, a member of the large Democratic class elected in 1974 in the wake of the Watergate scandal. A liberal's liberal whose wealthy district includes Beverly Hills, he managed to win expansion of Medicaid health coverage for poor children between 1984 and 1990 - as an unfunded mandate to state governments, which consumed ever-larger chunks of state budgets.

He spent years on the Energy and Commerce Committee, fighting to preserve and then expand clean-air laws so important to his Los Angeles constituents. For years one of the best shows in town was watching Waxman wrangle with Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who fought against clean-air laws on behalf of his Detroit hometown's interest, the auto industry.

In the end, Waxman and other environmentalists prevailed and Congress passed a new Clean Air Act - with major help from the first President Bush.

Voters' Doubts About Sharing In Prosperity Send A Danger Signal (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

You don't have to be a political pundit to know that next month's elections aren't about the economy. They're about Iraq, mostly; congressional scandals, secondarily; and a host of regional and local issues after that.

DOJ_NMG_0085965

Still, there's something unnerving about watching an anti-incumbent tidal wave roll in at a time when the economy, by most macro measures, is cruising. Unemployment is at a historic low -- 4.6% -- and inflation remains under 3%. The big economic bugaboos of earlier this year -- rising interest rates and soaring oil prices -- have both eased off. Even the Dow Jones Industrial Average is hitting historic highs. Yet a majority of voters who responded to last week's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll say they disapprove of President Bush's handling of the economy.

Some of this may be the normal noise of midterm elections, when national economic performance is less important than other things. Republicans took control of Congress in 1994 in the midst of an economic expansion. Unemployment that September clocked in at 5.9% and inflation at about 4% -- not as good as today, but not bad.

TALKING BUSINESS

Email business@wsj.com1 and read reader comments Saturday at WSJ.com/TalkingBusiness2.

Still, the economic backdrop for election 2006 should raise a warning flag about the future. Large numbers of Americans seem to have lost their belief in John F. Kennedy's famous aphorism that a rising tide lifts all boats. "They know the economy is white hot," says political analyst Charlie Cook, "but they also know they aren't in it....There's a feeling that some people are getting theirs, but we aren't getting ours."

There's a well-known litany of reasons for that. Median earnings have been growing at a disturbingly slow pace, even as profits and high-end pay have soared. Health-care costs are not only increasing, they increasingly are being paid by consumers, not by employers or the government. Pensions are disappearing, as is job security -- and any sense of long-term loyalty from employers. As pollster Peter Hart puts it, "there's no gold watch" waiting at the end of a career these days. He cites a cartoon in which the boss says: "Mr. Jones, the reason we are letting you go is because you've given us the best years of your life."

Meanwhile, a thin slice of America is enjoying unprecedented prosperity. CEO pay is one of the most visible manifestations, rising in the past decade at triple the rate of the median worker's pay. In my home town of Greenwich, Conn., skilled financiers bring home eight- and nine-digit paychecks, unimaginable in the not-so-distant past. Americans have never been big on the politics of envy, in part because they hoped someday they would join those at the top. But increasingly, they wonder whether the economic game is rigged, and whether all these riches are the result of backdated options or insider trading or some other trickery that doesn't benefit them.

The danger for business is that the broad social support for pro-business and pro-market policies that has characterized American politics for a quarter century or more could be breaking down. You see tame hints of that in popular Democratic proposals for a minimum-wage increase or for government negotiations to push down drug prices.

A much stronger dose comes from Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown -- who is given good odds of winning his challenge against Ohio Senator Mike Dewine. He calls for renegotiating the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Permanent Normal Trade Relations agreement with China. "This election's a referendum on the special-interest stranglehold in our government," Rep. Brown said in an interview with NBC's "Meet the Press."

"The drug industry always gets its way, the HMOs always get their way, the oil industry always gets their way, the big companies that outsource jobs always get their way. Who's fighting for the middle class?"

A Democratic wise man told me recently that if he were asked what economic platform would offer a Democratic presidential contender the best chances of success in 2008, he would have to say it's an antitrade, antiglobalization, anti-immigration platform. For now, none of the best-known possible Democratic candidates -- Hillary Clinton, John Kerry, Al Gore or, the latest fad, Barack Obama -- are taking that tack. But the problem here isn't Democratic leaders. It's Democratic followers. If the reservoir of dissatisfaction grows strong enough, it's only a matter of time before some candidate figures out how to tap in.

NRCC Targets 33 Districts (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, October 25, 2006

With Democratic momentum mounting and control of the House at stake, senior Republican strategists are urging donors to contribute to 33 GOP members and candidates who are “most in need of support right now.”

DOJ_NMG_0085966

The National Republican Congressional Committee's (NRCC) "Final Push List" consists of 29 Republican seats and only four Democratic seats, indicating that the GOP is playing defense.

The list, obtained by The Hill, provides a rare glimpse of the races that congressional strategists are concentrating on close to Election Day.

NRCC focuses on most but not all toss-up House races in its Final Push roster, dated Oct. 19.

In an e-mail to congressional officials, NRCC PAC Director Jenny Sheffield states, "…it's crucial at this point to send in some late money to some [of] our campaigns. The funds our candidates receive now will allow them to increase their TV buys and will make the difference on Nov. 7.

"I have attached our Final Push list for those Members and candidates most in need of support right now. If your boss has not maxed out to those on the attached list, please ask him or her to consider sending a check from a leadership PAC and/or reelection account … IMMEDIATELY!"

Republicans have also sent the list to lobbyists, seeking donations. The NRCC list (see chart) has many endangered Republicans, including four each from Ohio and New York, and three from Pennsylvania. It also contains some surprises, such as Rep. Cathy McMorris (R-Wash.), whose seat was considered safe earlier this month.

Conservative GOP candidate Tim Walberg, who defeated centrist Rep. Joe Schwarz (R-Mich.) in a bitter primary earlier this year, is also on the Final Push roster. Even though he has significantly outspent his Democratic opponent, Sharon Renier, Walberg leads the race by just eight points, according to a recent poll.

Renier has $1,379 cash on hand while Walberg has over $85,000 in the bank. President Bush won the district in 2004 with 54 percent of the vote.

Republican incumbents who did not make the Final Push cut include Reps. Chris Chocola (Ind.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.), John Hostettler (Ind.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Jon Porter (Nev.), Clay Shaw (Fla.), Christopher Shays (Conn.), and Charles Taylor (N.C.).

These Republicans are in highly competitive races, but several have major fundraising advantages over their opponents and are not in dire need of NRCC assistance.

But Fitzpatrick, Hostettler, and Taylor have less cash on hand than their Democratic opponents.

Hostettler is in serious jeopardy of losing his seat. The sixth-term incumbent is a lackluster fundraiser and trailed Democratic candidate Joe Donnelly by 23 points in a recent poll.

Taylor is behind in his race against former pro quarterback Health Shuler by single digits, while Fitzpatrick's race is expected to go down to the wire.

NRCC spokesman Ed Patru said the Final Push List "is fluid," suggesting it has been revised since late last week. He noted that Hostettler does not accept PAC money and that Fitzpatrick's opponent, Patrick Murphy, has "greatly underperformed." However, the nonpartisan Cook Political Report recently moved the Fitzpatrick-Murphy race from lean Republican to toss-up.

Asked about Taylor's exclusion from the list, Patru said, "Taylor has always written his own check."

Spokespersons for Fitzpatrick, Hostettler, and Taylor did not comment for this article.

In her e-mail to congressional officials, NRCC's Sheffield suggests she can "tier" the list of 33, adding, "We very much need your help as our most endangered Members and candidates go into the final stretch!!! Your support now could make or break a Republican majority next cycle!!!"

The NRCC seems willing to concede former Rep. Tom DeLay's (R-Texas) seat. Former Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas) has $1.7 million cash on hand and Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, the GOP nominee, is not on the ballot, running an uphill write-in campaign.

Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who heads the NRCC and is in a tight race with Democrat Jack Davis, is not on the Final Push list.

Reynolds has repeatedly said there will be three dozen hotly contested House races this fall, but polls suggest the universe of competitive contests is closer to 50. Most political experts anticipate Democrats will win the necessary 15 seats to gain control of the lower chamber, with some predicting they could gain a net of 30 seats.

DOJ_NMG_0085967

Some Republicans who made the NRCC cut already enjoy significant cash advantages over their opponents. Rep. Geoff Davis (R-Ky.) has $1.65 million in the bank compared to his adversary, former Rep. Ken Lucas (D-Ky.), with over $380,000 cash on hand. Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R-Colo.), also on the list, has a three-to-one cash advantage over her opponent.

Peter Roskam, the GOP nominee to replace retiring Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) is on the list, even though he has $1.5 million to play with while Democrat Tammy Duckworth has just over $200,000.

These numbers do not include the infusion of cash to candidates from the NRCC and DCCC.

Joe Negron, who is seeking to fill ex-Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) seat, needs 16th district voters to punch in Foley's name in order for him to win. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) publicly conceded that Republicans are unlikely to win this race, but the NRCC nonetheless has Negron on its list.

The four Democrats that the NRCC is targeting in its Final Push are Reps. John Barrow (Ga.), Melissa Bean (Ill.), Leonard Boswell (Iowa), and Jim Marshall (Ga.). Independent political analysts say Republicans will be fortunate to win one of these races.

Earlier this year, NRCC was targeting Reps. John Spratt (D-S.C.) and Alan Mollohan (D-W. Va.). Republicans now appear to be throwing in the towel on those races by pulling back ads on these two Democrats and not targeting them in their Oct. 19 document.

Open seats that the NRCC is not making a final push for include the competitive contests for retiring Reps. Bob Beauprez (R-Colo.) and Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) as well as Rep. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who is running for the Senate. Peter Welch, the Democrat seeking to win Sanders' seat, enjoys a major cash-on-hand advantage over Republican Martha Rainville.

Patru said Rainville is "where she needs to be in fundraising." Rainville's campaign did not return a phone call seeking comment.

The NRCC is concerned about the open seat of retiring Rep. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.). Even though Bush won the district with 66 percent in 2004, GOP candidate Doug Lamborn is struggling and trails the money race to Democrat Jay Fawcett. Hefley has refused to endorse Lamborn, criticizing how Lamborn ran his campaign in the GOP primary. Lamborn was included on the Final Push list.

Similarly, Bush won 68 percent in Idaho's first district, but NRCC wants more resources put into the race. Retiring Rep. Butch Otter (R-Idaho) is running for governor and GOP nominee Bill Sali has struggled to gain traction against political neophyte Larry Grant.

Political observers say that House Republicans are headed for a long election night if they have to worry about seats in these two conservative districts.

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokesman Bill Burton said, "This list makes clear they have finally caught up with the reality that even in places so Republican that George Bush received 60-70 percent of the vote, their candidates are deeply endangered."

Of the 33 races on the GOP list, nine are open-seat contests.

A leadership aide familiar with the NRCC Final Push initiative said it has raised $2 million.

Upping The Dosage Fearing A Democratic Victory, Drug Makers Fund Key Races (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

HERSHEY, Pa. -- Few businesses have more at stake in next month's congressional elections than pharmaceutical makers. Assailed by Democrats, drug companies are pouring millions of dollars into close races, giving some Republicans a financial edge. In the process, the industry is becoming not just a campaign backer, but also a campaign issue.

Pennsylvania Republican Rick Santorum is a big beneficiary of the industry's push. He was a leading proponent of the 2003 law that gave seniors Medicare coverage for prescription drugs, and helped shape the law in ways that benefited the industry. Battling to keep his seat in a crucial Senate race, Mr. Santorum's campaign has received almost $500,000 from pharmaceutical interests and their employees, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan research group. The industry has also helped fund television advertisements and aided get-out-the-vote efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0085968

Mr. Santorum's opponent, state treasurer Bob Casey Jr., regularly attacks the Medicare program as "a giveaway to Big Pharma," in part because it bars the government from negotiating prices. He and many fellow Democrats say they will overhaul the benefit if they win control of Congress on Nov. 7. Not surprisingly, Mr. Casey counts just $11,850 in contributions from pharmaceutical interests.

Companies and business groups have long thrown money at candidates to further their interests. But with a Democratic victory increasingly likely, few recent elections have been so critical, particularly for the drug industry. On the campaign trail, Democrats frequently lump "Big Pharma" with "Big Oil" in attacking Republican ties to industry. Within the first 100 hours of taking over the House, promises House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, Democrats will rewrite the prescription-drug benefit to take away most of the advantages it handed to pharmaceutical companies.

HOUSE PAYMENTS

1

Businesses are pouring unprecedented sums into this year's midterm congressional elections. Take a look at several key donors2. • Center for Responsive Politics3

"It'll take five minutes" to make the biggest change of all -- the proposal to let the government negotiate prices, Ms. Pelosi told a group of about 100 retirees in Sunrise, Fla., earlier this month. She said the benefit was a product of "corruption, putting pharmaceutical companies and HMOs first at the expense of America's seniors."

Congressional Democrats propose lifting a ban on the broad-scale reimporting of inexpensive drugs and could toughen the drug-approval process. They've talked, too, of holding hearings into conflicts of interest among Republicans now working for the industry.

"All elections are important, but this one is probably more important than most, because of the threats to the Medicare drug benefit," says Ken Johnson, senior vice president of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the industry's trade group.

Through early September, drug-company political action committees had given about $8.7 million to campaigns, compared with $7 million for all of 2002, the last midterm election, according to CRP. Employee contributions are up, too, rising to about $5 million from $3.3 million four years ago. About 69% of the industry's campaign contributions are going to Republicans.

Other industries are also pouring money into races in the hopes of protecting their favored candidates. Oil and gas interests worry about a Democratic Congress axing subsidies and have spent $13.6 million on the campaign so far, of which 83% has gone to Republicans. For all of 2002, they and their employees contributed $14.8 million in hard-money donations. Montana's troubled Republican Sen. Conrad Burns is the second-biggest recipient of oil money, according to CRP. He supports drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and sits on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

His opponent, state Sen. Jon Tester, hammers on the theme in debates and speeches. He opposes drilling in ANWR and advocates more government support for alternative energy sources, such as biofuels, as well as a greater use of coal, which is abundant in his state.

Electric utilities, fearing tougher environmental rules, have contributed $11.9 million, with 66% going to Republicans, compared with $12.8 million in 2002. Commercial banks, bracing for tighter lending standards, account for $19.2 million, 63% of which is going to Republicans. That's already more than 2002's $16.5 million.

Despite campaign-finance laws designed to limit the influence of big business and unions, the 2006 midterm elections are on track to be the most expensive ever, costing about $2.6 billion, according to a new study by CRP. That compares with about $2.2 billion in 2002. Business interests account for about three-quarters of this year's contributions.

The Republican-controlled Congress has been kind to drug makers. As the prescription-drugs benefit was crafted, Republicans battled not just Democratic critics but also fiscal conservatives in their own party who opposed creating the expensive government program.

Congressional Republican leaders prevented Medicare from negotiating prices with the industry. They also killed a proposal that would have allowed the government to offer its own coverage in competition with those sold by private companies. The industry successfully argued that the government's clout would mess up prices and stifle innovation.

DOJ_NMG_0085969

Sen. Jim Talent of Missouri benefited from $900,000 in ads this year touting his role in the prescription-drug benefit, according to a tally by Americans United for Change, a liberal advocacy group with close ties to congressional Democrats. Mr. Talent made a similar pitch in two TV ads as well as in a recent debate with his Democratic challenger, Claire McCaskill.

Ms. McCaskill attacked the drug companies -- and by extension Mr. Talent -- in a recent ad, saying, "it's a senator's job to always put our seniors before big drug companies and Washington special interests."

In previous years, PhRMA, the industry's trade group, has come under fire for its political activities. In 2002, it was criticized for funding TV ad campaigns run by relatively small and little-known nonprofit groups.

PhRMA's president, former Louisiana Republican Rep. Billy Tauzin, says he wants the group to become less confrontational to increase its effectiveness. This year, the industry is working through the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The chamber's TV ads cost about $10 million, according to chamber officials. While the drug industry hasn't disclosed its share, Mr. Tauzin says it has contributed to the effort. The chamber's last-minute get-out-the-vote effort, which will include emails, fliers and phone banks, will focus on the drug benefit, among other issues, and will cost another $10 million or so.

Pennsylvania is one of the biggest battlegrounds in this year's political drug wars. It has a large concentration of seniors -- second only to Florida -- so Medicare could play an outsized role in the state's campaigns. Seniors are also the most reliable voters and carry extra clout. While people 65 years and older make up 16% of the state's population, they cast more than a quarter of the ballots in 2002.

Pennsylvania is home to a number of pivotal races for both houses of Congress. Democrats need 15 seats to take control of the House and four of their most promising pickups are in Pennsylvania. In late July and early August, drug companies helped pay for the Chamber of Commerce's TV ads on behalf of the four endangered Republicans, thanking them for supporting the Medicare drug bill, even though one, Mike Fitzpatrick, wasn't serving when Congress passed the benefit.

In the Senate, a swing of six seats would tip the balance of who's in charge. Strategists from both parties consider Mr. Santorum one of the Democrats' best targets.

In the campaign, both Mr. Santorum and his opponent are playing up the senator's central role in crafting the Medicare drug benefit. He's the biggest recipient of pharmaceutical money, according to CRP, up from 15th last time he ran in 2000.

"We support folks who agree with us on the issues, and he's been a strong and good supporter," PhRMA's Mr. Tauzin says of Mr. Santorum.

Mr. Casey and his backers have tried hard to use that against Mr. Santorum in the race. Speaking on the sunny front porch of a Clarion, Pa., bed-and-breakfast in August, Mr. Casey lashed out at one of the benefit's most-criticized features -- the "donut hole." The basic plan requires people whose drug costs reach $2,250 to start paying their own bills for the year, until they've spent a total of $3,600, although in practice many of the private-sector insurers providing the benefit have reduced or eliminated the donut hole.

Democrats want to fill the gap with savings earned from allowing the government to negotiate prices with the industry. Many Republicans oppose that move.

Mr. Casey told the crowd of about 100 that the donut hole is "a symbol of the White House and the Congress' failure to enact a real prescription-drug plan for older Americans."

An anti-Santorum advocacy group called the Lantern Project -- with funding from big Pennsylvania Democratic donors -- ran $800,000 of ads over the past year criticizing Mr. Santorum, including one that sniffed: "No wonder the drug lobby gave Santorum committees half a million dollars."

A spokeswoman for Mr. Santorum, Virginia Davis, says the senator supports the drug industry for policy reasons, not political ones. She says he opposes drug importation on safety grounds, for example, and also notes that Pennsylvania is home to about 200,000 pharmaceutical-industry jobs.

On the stump, Mr. Santorum cites the drug benefit as one of his leading accomplishments. At a Harrisburg luncheon in August, he noted that Pennsylvania's Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell had said the senator "delivers." Mr. Santorum ticked off the reasons why, starting with "the Medicare bill that we passed that [includes] language in there that saves Pennsylvania almost $200 million a year."

DOJ_NMG_0085970

At a September appearance before the Pennsylvania Chamber of Business and Industry in Hershey, Mr. Santorum argued that the program is helping not only retirees, but also businesses dealing with rising health-care costs. It also provides "a very generous benefit" for seniors, especially in combination with state aid, he said in an interview. "I wrote it to do that."

Drug companies helped fund the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's TV ad campaign, which featured gauzy images of happy, active seniors, as well as photos of Mr. Santorum and luminous blue pills in a pharmacist's tray.

Under new federal campaign-finance restrictions, those TV ads had to stop by early September. The chamber's get-out-the-vote mail pieces aren't covered by that law and in the campaign's final days they will tout the prescription-drug benefit. One shows a gray-haired woman in a sweater chatting with her smiling pharmacist. On the other side, a picture of Mr. Santorum is superimposed on a spreading oak tree in full autumn glory. The text urges recipients to "vote for Rick Santorum November 7th."

Polling by the Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonprofit research group focused on health care, showed a sharp turnaround in seniors' views of the program between late 2005 and mid-2006. In December 2005, 50% of seniors said they had an unfavorable impression of the program while just 28% viewed it favorably. By June, after the signup period ended, the unfavorable rating had fallen to 30% and the favorable rating had risen to 32%.

By midsummer, the Kaiser poll showed, about eight out of every 10 seniors who had signed up said they were satisfied with their plans. That result has been confirmed by other polls.

Whether or not this will help Mr. Santorum is far from clear. Recent polls show that while the chamber ads helped Mr. Santorum close the gap with Mr. Casey, he continues to trail by anywhere from five to 13 percentage points.

Trio Of Linked Districts Could Make Florida Pivotal To House Takeover (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla. – Republican House candidate Vern Buchanan laced up his rented hot pink and yellow shoes, straightened his ailing back and rolled the heavy ball down the lane. Veering too far left, it caromed off a bumper, and an otherwise-gutterball knocked over seven of 10 pins.

Just as he had intended, Buchanan joked: “That’s that turn I had on the end.”

This campaign season, Buchanan and fellow Florida Republicans are facing another late turn of events on which they had no designs. What have been the top two battleground districts in the state – Buchanan’s 13th and Rep. Clay Shaw’s (R) 22nd – both border former Rep. Mark Foley’s (R) south Florida district, and the month-old scandal surrounding Foley’s communications with House pages has thrown a wrench in the final month of the campaign, Buchanan said.

Foley’s 16th District, now a tight battle between Democrat Tim Mahoney and Republican Joe Negron, lies in south Florida between the Sarasota-based 13th on the west coast and the Fort Lauderdale-based 22nd on the east coast. The Democrats hope to turn the three of them into a blue belt across the peninsula, chipping away at the Republicans’ 18-7 House advantage in this very purple battleground state.

The three would go a long way toward a possible Democratic majority in Congress, and Florida could rival states like Indiana and Ohio, which have long been considered prime pickup territory for the Democrats, as an impact state in 2006.

Two years ago, no race in Florida was decided by fewer than double digits. This year, as many as five seats could be in play, including long shots in Rep. Ric Keller’s (R) 8th District and retiring Rep. Michael Bilirakis’s (R) 9th.

According to a poll released yesterday by Buchanan’s Democratic opponent, Christine Jennings, the 13th is likely to flip in two weeks. Jennings leads Buchanan 52-41 in the poll, which mirrors a previous Jennings poll that had her up 50-38.

Both polls came out since the Foley scandal broke in late September. Buchanan actually broaches the Foley issue unsolicited while talking with reporters, saying it makes things tougher for him with the story frequently in the local media.

The same day he bowled alongside Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) at Sarasota Lanes here last week, the Sarasota Herald-Tribune broke the story about the clergyman who allegedly abused Foley.

“It’s more local because I share a county with him,” said Buchanan, adding that the Foley scandal killed the momentum he felt coming out of the House Republican Conference in Washington in late September: “I thought we had a positive session, and unfortunately instead of talking about that, we end up talking about the Mark Foley thing.”

DOJ_NMG_0085971

While Buchanan faces Jennings in an open-seat battle to replace Senate candidate Rep. Katherine Harris (R), Shaw has been ensconced in his seat for 26 years. And while Buchanan calls his race vital to Republicans maintaining control of the House, Shaw shrugs at the notion that Republicans need a strong showing in Florida to stay in power.

In fact, Shaw said he doesn't even understand why there is such a fuss about this race. After he won by 600 votes in 2000, redistricting bolstered the Republican advantage in his district. He beat a well-funded challenger 61-38 the following election and won by 28 points in 2004.

Still, a Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel poll released Saturday shows Shaw ahead of Democrat Ron Klein by a slim margin, 48-43, with a 4 percent margin of error. And despite the redistricting, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) won by the same 52-48 margin then-Vice President Al Gore carried in the 2000 presidential election.

"I'm delighted to think that national politics is going to be determined by this district, because I'm going to win," Shaw said. "It's closer than I'd like it to be, but we're not going to have to stay up till 1 o'clock in the morning to find out who won."

One shouldn't mistake Shaw's verbal confidence for over-confidence, however. Klein has raised the third-most money among House challengers at $3.2 million, and Shaw has been a step ahead of him almost every quarter, bringing in $3.9 million.

Shaw has also grown fond of invoking his work with former President Clinton in the 1990s to illustrate his bipartisan credentials.

With Clinton in town for a Klein fundraiser on Friday, Shaw ran a radio ad noting his work with the ex-president. In a debate Friday in Palm Beach, Shaw seemed to be almost longing for Clinton's tenure, repeatedly bringing up the bills he passed and Clinton signed.

"Tonight, President Clinton is coming to town to help his political party," Shaw said at the debate, turning to Klein. "Ron, give him my best."

Klein said Shaw can say what he wants about the former president but that it's simply an effort to "minimize the nasty partisan environment" currently in Washington. He said he mentioned Shaw's strategy to Clinton at a rally several hours after the debate.

"He said, 'Well tell him that's all fine and good, but look what happens when Republicans get in total control: they run the country off the edge,'" Klein said. "So I don't exactly consider that to be a badge of honor."

The 13th District isn't as evenly split, with President Bush winning 56-43 in 2004. Harris has won by 10 points each of the past two elections, but neither included a Democratic opponent who could compete with her financially.

Jennings, for that matter, isn't close to competing financially with Buchanan either. With a net worth reported at more than $50 million, he has plugged nearly $4.5 million of his own money into the campaign. With $4.9 million in receipts, his was the richest House campaign in the country, including incumbents, after the third quarter.

Buchanan's self-funding has made the race to replace Harris is the second-most expensive in the country, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, with Shaw's race third.

Jennings raised a comparatively paltry $1.3 million by the end of the third quarter. But with the support of groups like Emily's List and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, she said she is more than able to compete in the current environment.

"If the incumbents don't know it and if the people running this country don't realize how distressed the American people are with a do-nothing Congress, I don't know what it would take," Jennings said.

GOP Incumbents Use Tough Underdog Tactics (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, October 25, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio – Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) mounted a flatbed truck outside a downtown office building last week with a bullhorn in hand and Van Halen blaring to challenge her Democratic opponent to a debate.

Her opponent, Mary Jo Kilroy, was miles away at the time, but the stunt is another example of the guerrilla tactics Pryce has embraced this fall as she fights for her political life. Such campaign tactics are usually employed by challengers, not senior leadership officials.

DOJ_NMG_0085972

The fourth-ranking Republican in the House is one of the many veteran lawmakers running like an underdog this campaign season. In this environment, Pryce's biggest asset – her leadership post chairing the Republican Conference – has also become a liability.

"For me, it's been a double-edged sword," Pryce said from her campaign headquarters during halftime of the Ohio State-Indiana football game last Saturday. "It's really helped me be able to deliver for this community, but it's also made it easier for the moniker of Bush Rubber Stamp to stick."

Pryce joins National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) and a number of other senior GOP lawmakers who face serious challenges for the first time in years.

Meanwhile, freshman Reps. Geoff Davis (R-Ky.), Mike Fitzpatrick (R-Pa.) and Mike Sodrel (R-Ind.) are performing well in their own tight reelection fights because of the battles they fought just two years ago.

The expanding field of veteran Republicans in serious danger this October is further evidence of a national wave that appears to be cresting this fall, imperiling the GOP's majorities in both chambers. In some cases, this eroding political landscape has made seniority a millstone rather than an advantage.

The Wave – Both National and Statewide

In Cincinnati, about 100 miles down I-71 from Columbus, Rep. Steve Chabot (R), who came to Congress as part of the historic class of 1994, is one of the many members trying to avoid a similar wave this year in his closely contested rematch with Democrat John Cranley.

On a gray, blustery afternoon outside Paul Brown Stadium on the north bank of the Ohio River, Chabot shook hands with Bengals fans heading into Cincinnati's game with the Carolina Panthers. Wearing a blue blazer over a white Bengals jersey, the six-term incumbent stood with a lone volunteer who hoisted a red, white and blue Chabot-for-Congress sign and another who passed out stickers.

A few yards away, closer to the stadium, Cranley, who also wore a white Bengals jersey over his blue oxford shirt, gleefully shook hands with fans as a team of volunteers flanked him on either side holding blue and neon-yellow Cranley-for-Congress signs.

"This has been the best reaction yet," Cranley said as he bounced from one foot to the other and blew on his hands to warm them against the cold wind. "Now I get a lot of people coming up to shake my hand instead of me approaching them."

Later that day, during a Lions Club pig roast in rural Butler County, Chabot dismissed the effects of a national wave on his own campaign.

"We're not focused on the overall national environment," Chabot said in the smoky assembly hall, surrounded by predominantly Republican voters.

Whatever the drag President Bush and Congress have become this election cycle, incumbent Republicans in Indiana, Kentucky and Ohio have felt the effect of unpopular governors.

In Ohio, Chabot, Pryce and other Republican lawmakers must also overcome the flagging campaigns of gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell and Sen. Mike DeWine (R), who both appear to be losing ground against more popular Democratic opponents.

Similarly, Pennsylvania Rep. Melissa Hart (R) seems to be struggling against the strength of campaigns by Ed Rendell, the popular Democratic governor, and Bob Casey Jr., the Democratic state treasurer who looks poised to knock off Republican Sen. Rick Santorum.

The NRCC surprised many observers last week by dropping $170,000 on TV ads in Hart's Pittsburgh-area district criticizing her Democratic opponent, Jason Altmire, an administrator for a local hospital chain. The buy was viewed as a clear sign that the race is much closer than it was expected to be, and Hart's opponent believes the incumbent's perceived inactivity is a big reason the race is competitive.

"I think she made a tactical error by not going up [on television] earlier," Altmire said last week from the booth of an Eat N' Park just off the Pennsylvania Turnpike.

The Freshman

DOJ_NMG_0085973

In the struggle to raise money, Davis, Fitzpatrick and Sodrel have become the most prolific fundraisers in their class, thanks in large part to competitive seats.

Davis has raised over $3.2 million for the cycle as compared with the over $1.1 million former Rep. Ken Lucas (D-Ky.) raised in his bid to bounce the Kentucky freshman after a single term.

In the rematch – Lucas narrowly survived a challenge by Davis in 2002 – the Republican Davis had more than $1.2 million in cash-on-hand as of the Sept. 30 filing deadline, and his campaign expects to report in excess of $475,000 from the period between Sept. 30 and Oct. 18, which should allow him to maintain a much stronger television presence in each of the district's four media markets.

Beyond fundraising, incumbency also has its disadvantages.

"Time management is one of the biggest challenges," Sodrel said over his breakfast of biscuits and gravy at the recently opened Big Daddy's Bar-B-Q in Aurora, Ind. "There is an advantage to being a challenger because you can be a candidate 100 percent of the time."

Leader on the ropes

In these final stages of the campaign, Pryce is relying on the fruits of incumbency by highlighting money she has appropriated for the district and using her connections in Washington and the district to help turnout the vote.

Her volunteers back in the Beltway work a phone bank from the Republican National Committee (RNC) every Wednesday night on her behalf, and many of her conference staffers are expected to travel to Ohio for the last weeks of the campaign.

Pryce volunteers canvassed her upscale Columbus neighborhood last Saturday, passing out absentee ballots using micro-targeted data compiled by the RNC.

The challenge for GOP organizers is to ensure that these likely supporters actually vote. The negative environment, particularly the spate of negative ads, could undermine those efforts.

Kilroy, whose campaign has agreed to a single debate that occurred earlier this month, said she has been "amused" by the incumbent's guerrilla campaigning. "It's a big switch from the game she was talking about the in the beginning when she was talking about my campaign as a nuisance."

Pryce, meanwhile, said she has been frustrated by Kilroy's perceived unwillingness to debate more frequently and attributes the tight contest to the national mood rather than the strength of her opponent.

The conference chairwoman laments not running television commercials in previous cycles, but she did not say she would bow out of the leadership if she hangs on this fall.

"I think this [reelection campaign] will be the biggest challenge," Pryce said. "We'll cross that bridge when we come to it."

Jackie Kucinich contributed to this article.

Hayworth Goads Mr. Nice Guy Into Fight In Arizona-5 (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, October 25, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. – When Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.) took the podium from Newt Gingrich at a fundraiser here last week, the decibel level doubled.

"Tell your friends! Tell your neighbors! Get them to the polls!" the 6-foot-5 former sportscaster bellowed into the microphone, employing the high-octane imperatives that have been his trademark in Congress.

At the same time, a dozen miles south, the Democratic candidate Harry Mitchell was also speaking to voters, but he used a decidedly different style. The avuncular former high school civics teacher and Tempe mayor was projecting a softer image to the Kiwanis Club of Tempe, making the race for Arizona's 5th Congressional District a contrast in styles. The contest pits a tough, boisterous Republican from upscale Scottsdale against an easygoing Democratic native son from a university town.

"I'm more low-key. I believe in building consensus and working toward compromise," Mitchell said Monday between fundraising calls. "J.D. is very aggressive, very loud. He's big. He'll invade your private space and I think that's how people view him."

Hayworth countered that Mitchell was too laidback to be effective.

DOJ_NMG_0085974

"It's fine to try to project a quiet personality, [but] I walk to the talk and I get things done. If Harry were to go, he would go along to get along. He would be conspicuously inconspicuous."

In television ads and on the stump, the pair carve out stark differences in personality.

Mitchell, 66, sports an ear-to-ear smile, glasses and a grandfatherly gray comb-over. He portrays himself as friendly and accessible in campaign ads, appearing with children and senior citizens amid soft lighting and cheerful hues, a deliberate strategy, said one Democratic aide. He has pushed to make his support of embryonic stem-cell research a key distinction in the race. He welcomed Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) to a press conference on the issue last week.

He stresses his homegrown roots. His grandfather was a local developer for whom Mitchell Drive, Mitchell Park and the old Mitchell elementary school were named. He has lived in the same house in Tempe for over 40 years. He went to school at Tempe High, went to college just blocks away at Arizona State University (ASU), married his high-school sweetheart, then returned to his high school to teach. He spent 28 years there, simultaneously running for local offices. He served as mayor of Tempe for 16 years and earned such admiration that the town erected a 35-foot steel statue of him outside City Hall, which was renamed the Harry E. Mitchell Government Center. A local bar, Harry's Place, sits across the street.

"I think of him as your neighbor, the every-guy, the beloved ordinary guy," said Richard Herrera, associate professor of political science at ASU. "He's been a mayor but he's also a high school teacher. He's approachable and friendly. He's the opposite of J.D. Hayworth in that he's not bombastic. He's not somebody you would fear."

Hayworth, 48, with his buzz-cut, broad shoulders and booming voice, welcomes the tough-guy image, arguing that he delivers for his constituents. He is a vigorous campaigner with an uncanny memory for names and personal details that is rare even among seasoned politicians. His ads focus on cracking down on illegal immigration, showing him at a cattle ranch talking with worried residents. Images of border patrol vehicles, migrants slipping across the border and a high-speed dirt-road chase appear between jarring flashes of white and orange. One television ad, entitled "Gonna hurt," asserts that Mitchell favors allowing illegal immigrants to collect social security benefits.

That ad, coupled with other negative salvoes, aims to tarnish Mitchell's image as a popular Democratic mayor and "wonderful guy," said Bruce Merrill, a pollster and communications professor at ASU.

"J.D.'s been very successful in the district. He's not a buffoon. He's really an intelligent guy and he's running pretty vicious attack ads against Harry," Merrill said.

In a district that leans Republican, that strategy can work. Outside of Tempe, Mitchell is less well-known.

The ads prompted Mitchell to retaliate with his own negative ads, pulling him away from his purely positive message. One Mitchell ad showed Hayworth apparently in the crosshairs of a firearm, prompting outrage from the Hayworth camp. Mitchell said he is not afraid of a brawl.

"J.D. is doing everything I expected because I was warned about the way he campaigns beforehand," Mitchell said. "But I am not taking it sitting down."

Recent independent polls show Mitchell gaining on Hayworth. A SurveyUSA poll commissioned by TV station KPNX showed Hayworth leading Mitchell 46 to 43 percent in mid-October, within the survey's margin of error. A similar survey by the same pollster a month earlier had Hayworth ahead by 12 points. During that time, however, Republicans across the country suffered political damage from the teenage page scandal involving former Florida congressman Mark Foley (R).

A Democratic poll conducted in mid-October showed Mitchell trailing by one point.

But Hayworth enjoys an ample lead in fundraising. According to recent disclosure reports, he raised $480,000 in the third quarter and ended with $1.35 million in the bank. Mitchell raised $320,000 and $570,000 in cash. National parties have been active on both sides.

And Hayworth could still use Mitchell's easygoing persona against him.

"Harry is the nicest man you'll ever meet but no one would ever accuse him of being very dynamic," Merrill, the communications professor, said.

Chatting after the Gingrich fundraiser, Hayworth suggested that Mitchell, in the twilight of his career, would not care enough to deliver results.

DOJ_NMG_0085975

"The voters will have a choice of who in his mind's eye views this seat in Congress as a reward for a long time in office or someone who says what he means and means what he says and will continue to make things happen," Hayworth said.

Mitchell called that charge "absolutely wrong."

"My whole concern is to represent this district. I'm not going to run for speaker or Senate," he said. Hayworth launched an unsuccessful campaign in 2002 to lead the House Republican conference. He has been mentioned as a contender for statewide office.

"My heart is in this very much, let me tell you, because I think it would not be good to return J.D. to Washington," Mitchell said. "I think he underestimates my desire to run."

Whether Hayworth has underestimated Mitchell is an open question. He sent surrogates to speak at an Oct. 17 forum before the National Council of Jewish Women. Jonathan and Irit Tratt, Jewish friends of Hayworth, struck a sour note with the elderly Jewish crowd, which booed and hissed when the Tratts first appeared, when they mentioned slain journalist Daniel Pearl to underscore the ongoing threat to Jews and when they suggested that Mitchell apologize for putting crosshairs in his ad. At one point, an exasperated Jonathan Tratt gave up.

"I don't have to speak on his behalf if you don't want me to."

"Good!" "Get off the stage!" the hecklers responded.

Though Weakened, New Orleans Lawmaker Is Ebullient And Defiant (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 24 — With a publicized federal bribery investigation bearing down on him and facing a tight race for the first time in 16 years, Representative William J. Jefferson might be expected to show signs of strain in his re-election campaign here.

Yet the elephant in the room is not crowding out Mr. Jefferson, a veteran Democratic politician who still maneuvers with relative ease in the world of New Orleans politics, which he has partly owned since his opponents in the Nov. 7 primary election were barely in high school.

Attracted by the congressman's new vulnerability, 12 challengers have crowded in. Mr. Jefferson dismisses them as "these people" who "think they have an opportunity."

Spurned by House colleagues in Washington and the butt of jokes over $90,000 that the F.B.I. says it found in his freezer, Mr. Jefferson is outwardly projecting confidence in the biggest challenge of a career that stretches over nearly 30 years.

Unlike other incumbents in trouble this year, though, his difficulties have nothing to do with national politics and everything to do with cascading accounts of chicanery that have made local headlines for months.

Over the congressman's protests, the state Democratic Party endorsed his leading challenger, Karen R. Carter, a state representative with a reputation for seriousness.

Experts reckon that he and Ms. Carter are the likeliest in the field to wind up in a runoff in December, to be held if no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote, under the state's idiosyncratic election rules.

Though Mr. Jefferson may be unwanted by fellow Democrats, a warm reception is always just around the corner on his home turf, where a web of relatives and associates has extended for years into many corners of public life.

Questionable financial dealings are rarely a bar to high office in Louisiana. The culture of tolerance means that Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term congressman, cannot be counted out on Election Day, experts say. Even Mayor C. Ray Nagin has endorsed him for re-election.

"I'm praying for you, brother," a woman said to him recently in a coin laundry in a desolate shopping strip in the Gentilly section, throwing her arms around the congressman, as do others.

"I'm on your side!" Paula Felton, shopping at a grocery store, cried out. "Hang in there. Not to worry."

Angrily dismissing the cash in the freezer, a woman at the Guste Home housing project said, "If I want to carry them in a sock, that's my business."

DOJ_NMG_0085976

Helen Lang, an activist who introduced Mr. Jefferson to a friendly audience at the project, said: "Let's not get bogged down in all this foolishness. I've been bumping in politics a long time. He's not one who's abused us."

Buoyed by this grass-roots support, Mr. Jefferson is waging an aggressive campaign, strongly criticizing Ms. Carter for having the backing of establishment financial powerhouses like the developer Joseph Canizaro and angrily deflecting questions about the federal inquiry.

"I don't talk about that stuff," he snapped in an interview. "That's for the lawyers."

In court documents, the Federal Bureau of Investigation says Mr. Jefferson took bribes, including the $90,000, in exchange for helping an obscure technology company obtain government contracts here and in Africa.

Documents and interviews have painted an unflattering portrait of a public figure assiduously working for financial advantage for himself and his family through his contacts.

In June, House Democrats voted to strip him of his assignment on the House Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Jefferson, promising a yet-to-be-given "honorable explanation," has denied all wrongdoing and, comparing himself to other accused African-American congressmen, predicted legal vindication and political victory.

His visit to the semiabandoned Gentilly shopping area, once a heartland of the black middle class, now severely diminished here, illustrated the promise and the problems of his struggle. On the one hand the reception was friendly.

"I'm going to vote for you, I'm going to vote for you, I'm going to vote for you," a barber in the strip repeated.

On the other hand, most of the stores were closed, 14 months after Hurricane Katrina, and not many shoppers were there at a prime time, Saturday morning.

"Working against him are the changed demographics," said Susan Howell, a political scientist at the University of New Orleans.

Mr. Jefferson is unlikely to win many white votes. A recent survey found that blacks in New Orleans have fallen to 46 percent of the population, from 67 percent before the hurricane.

Indeed, a white motorist yelled a derisive comment out her window at Mr. Jefferson's campaign workers as they waved signs while awaiting him on Saturday on Elysian Fields Avenue.

Mr. Jefferson may advance to the runoff, experts say, but beyond that his prospects are dim.

"He can't play the race card the way Nagin could," Ms. Howell said, referring to the mayor's re-election in May, "because he'll be in a runoff with an African-American, Karen Carter, who is a very respectable person and has a good reputation. He's going to have a whiter electorate than Nagin, and that's going to work totally for Karen Carter."

Mr. Nagin ran for re-election against a white candidate, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, in a racially charged contest that drew many black voters who continue to live out of town. The Congressional race is unlikely to draw a similar turnout.

Mr. Jefferson is hardly giving up. To the audience in the housing project, he identified their struggle to return to the city with his own.

"There's some folks who don't want to see us come back home," he said, and he infused his message with themes of faith, suffering and persecution.

At a candidates' forum in the French Quarter, he sharply criticized his opponents, insinuating that they had their own ethics problems while denying his.

"This business about electing ethical people," he said. "In this country, one is presumed innocent. I have not been charged with anything. I am, in fact, an innocent person."

Ms. Carter responded, "There is only one candidate in this race who is under federal investigation, and it's not Karen Carter."

A Congressional Endorsement (NYT)

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

The most fundamental rule of democracy is that when elected officials fail repeatedly, voters throw them out of office. If the polls are anywhere near accurate, most Americans have concluded that the Republican Party — particularly the Republican majority in the House of Representatives — has failed egregiously. On Iraq. On ethics. On oversight of a reckless White House.

DOJ_NMG_0085977

But that conviction sometimes comes into conflict with the feeling that a good representative should be rewarded with re-election, without regard to party.

All of that brings us to Representative Christopher Shays, a Republican from Connecticut's Fourth District. Mr. Shays has been in office for nearly 20 years, during which his state has grown increasingly Democratic. This year his race with Diane Farrell, a former first selectwoman of Westport, is regarded as one of the tightest in the nation.

The Times has endorsed Mr. Shays in every race in which he has faced a serious opponent. While this page has disagreed with him on many issues — from tax cuts for the wealthy to warrantless wiretapping — we have admired his independence and respected his leadership on issues like campaign finance reform.

Still, as his party has moved to the right, Mr. Shays has taken more and more stands with which we have profound disagreement. His position on immigration reform is far closer to the crabbed, xenophobic stance of the House Republicans than the fairer, bipartisan approach of the Senate. During the campaign, his remarks about the treatment of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison — which he minimized as "something less than torture" — were disturbing.

Ms. Farrell, Mr. Shays's opponent, is an excellent candidate. After eight years as first selectwoman, she has a better understanding than most legislators of the impact of federal mandates and tax policy on local government. She is smart and articulate, and her positions on the issues are extremely well thought-out.

When Ms. Farrell first challenged Mr. Shays two years ago, The Times chose to endorse him as a rare voice for moderation within a Republican caucus that seemed bent on distracting the electorate with assaults on gay marriage, flag burning and abortion while running up the deficit, encouraging a ruinous war in Iraq and supporting a White House bent on exalting the power of the president at the expense of the Constitution.

Now it is time to draw the line. Mr. Shays may be a beacon of integrity, but if he is re-elected, he will vote to continue House control by a party that has repeatedly sold out the country to special-interest lobbyists. His position on Iraq, which has gone through tortuous re-evaluations, now seems basically sensible. But if he is re-elected, he will support a Republican leadership that has refused to question even the most ruinous decisions by George Bush, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld about the conduct of American foreign policy.

Mr. Shays has been a good congressman, but not good enough to overcome the fact that his re-election would help empower a party that is long overdue for a shakeup. This decision is painful, but not difficult, given the high caliber of his opponent. With due respect for Mr. Shays's service, we strongly endorse Diane Farrell for Congress.

Taylor Still Holds Land (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 25, 2006

Public land records in Haywood County, N.C., show that a company registered to Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) owns 17 plots of land in the mountain community of Maggie Valley, an interest that tax records indicate is worth more than $500,000.

The records raise questions about an assertion Taylor made in an Oct. 12 statement, part of a strong public defense mounted by the House Appropriations "cardinal" after a Wall Street Journal report alleged this month that Taylor steered federal funds to projects that would benefit businesses in which he has an interest.

Taylor's statement was accompanied by a letter from his North Carolina attorneys that called for an apology and retraction from the Journal. Taylor is facing a well-funded Democratic election challenge from former pro football quarterback Heath Shuler.

Singling out 15 elements of the article that Taylor characterized as "innuendos and false statements," the lawmaker wrote that he owns no holdings in two residential subdivisions located in his district's picturesque Maggie Valley area.

"There is no development called Maggie Valley Leisure Estates," Taylor wrote, referring to a subdivision mentioned in the article. "A large development in Maggie Valley is called Wild Acres," Taylor added, where he held land 36 years ago but sold it "over 20 years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0085978

Haywood County land records still list a company called Maggie Valley Leisure Estates, Inc., founded 36 years ago by Taylor and two partners, as the owner of 17 land parcels. Fourteen of those plots are situated in the Wild Acres development and one is situated in a development named Maggie Valley Leisure Estates, according to land maps posted by the county.

Two area Realtors also use the MVLE name to offer online listings for homes in that development.

The North Carolina Secretary of State's office, which records business registrations, has no record of any sale of Taylor's interest in Maggie Valley Leisure Estates Inc., according to its website. The company's registered address with that office and Haywood County is a post office box used by Taylor in county board of elections and Federal Elections Commission filings.

Taylor attorney Robert Long Jr., who drafted the letter to the Journal, said Maggie Valley Leisure Estates' holdings in the Wild Acres area were unfit for residential development. Long referred to the 17 plots as "worthless" and "remnants," adding, "You couldn't build on it even if you tried."

Long said Maggie Valley Leisure Estates had sold the majority of its land in the area by 1990 and that the business was now defunct. Asked whether a development existed with the MVLE name, Long said "they may have called it that" in ensuing years.

The state's Department of Revenue suspended Maggie Valley Leisure Estates' charter in 2003, according to records, for failing to file annual corporate and franchise tax reports. The notification of that decision was sent to the same post office box used by Taylor that appears in county land records.

North Carolina revenue officials said suspended companies are not absolved of outstanding tax obligations, which could be as low as $35 a year if the business had no activity. Haywood County employees confirmed that the business is still a valid landholder despite its state corporate status.

The state keeps no records on the frequency of corporate suspensions. Two other companies incorporated by Taylor in the 1980s with his wife as director, Financial Guaranty Securities and Financial Guaranty Credit Life Corps., also were suspended in 2005 for failing to file tax reports.

"The acreage I have is not even close to [U.S. Highway] 19," which crosses through Maggie Valley, Taylor wrote later in his statement to the Journal.

Haywood County maps show that several of the land parcels owned by Maggie Valley Leisure Estates are within three miles of that highway. Another company, Gaybo, in which the lawmaker owns an interest worth as much as $250,000, according to his latest financial disclosure filing, maintains a 15-acre parcel of land located next to the highway, according to maps posted on the county's website.

Taylor's strongly worded defense comes in the thick of a hard-fought race between the wealthy lawmaker, whose estimated personal assets topped $50 million last year, and Shuler.

Taylor has spent heavily to keep his powerful perch as a senior appropriator, helping Shuler take the lead in cash on hand as of third-quarter fundraising reports. In addition to several ads bought by the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) – one of which assailed Shuler for a company bearing his name that was late in its tax payments – Taylor has taken out $1.6 million in personal loans to help his campaign.

Taylor also used the statement sent alongside his attorney's letter to blast Taxpayers for Common Sense (TCS), a nonpartisan watchdog group known for its exhaustive research into lawmakers' earmarks, for providing the Journal with corroborating information for its article.

TCS, Taylor wrote, "is neither an organization for taxpayers nor for common sense. It is a partisan, ultra-liberal organization whose report is produced in conjunction with the environmental extremist groups Friends of the Earth and U.S. PIRG."

TCS vice president Steve Ellis pointed out that the group has partnered with groups from both sides of the ideological spectrum, including the conservative-leaning Club for Growth and National Taxpayers Union, for previous efforts.

"Like an illusionist, [Taylor] is trying to divert public attention to his parade of irrelevant facts instead of concentrating on and answering to his dubious record," Ellis said in an Oct. 16 statement. "It's not too shocking that a senior appropriator is lashing out at a budget watchdog group. In fact, that is a good indication we are doing our job."

My Friend, Bob Ney (HILL)

By Ellen Ratner

DOJ_NMG_0085979

The Hill, October 25, 2006

I happen to be a proud liberal, one who gets to spout off on 300 radio stations every day. I also represent the liberal point of view as a commentator on the Fox News Channel. I oppose the policies of the Bush administration and the Republican congressional leadership (give me at least a full afternoon, and I could begin to share some of the reasons why).

Yet even in the rancid atmosphere that passes for political interaction in Washington these days, one can occasionally reach across the partisan and ideological divide to form genuine friendships with those on the other side. Thankfully, that's what happened with me and my friend, Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio.

As Republicans distance themselves from him and Democrats use him as a campaign tactic, let me say that I'm heartbroken over what's happened to him.

I got to know Bob when, as a freshman congressman, he used to appear opposite me on radio programs in the Ohio River Valley. Most people know the region only from flying overhead or speeding through on Interstate 70, so the place bears description.

Bob grew up in Belmont County, along the Ohio-West Virginia border, in the area close to Wheeling that used to be called the "Steel Belt." Times were better then, as his dad, a TV cameraman, and his mother, a buyer for a local department store, raised him and his sister in a solidly working-class neighborhood. Today, 14 percent of Belmont County's residents live in poverty, 40 percent more than Ohioans as a whole. Incomes average 30 percent below the nation's, and homes sell for about 40 percent less than those statewide.

What first struck me about Bob was how much the poverty in his home region tore at him. This wasn't your typical Republican, nor did my reporter's nose pick up the cynical, "I-feel-your-pain" shallowness you often see in politicians on both sides of the aisle.

No, here was a guy who really did remember where he came from. He knew that the kids he'd grown up with couldn't afford to raise their children in quality housing, and he went to Washington determined to do something about it.

In the four years that he chaired the Subcommittee on Housing, he was relentless: 63 hearings, 22 housing bills signed into law. One bill he spearheaded helped 40,000 lower-income families buy their first homes; another renovated public housing units that had become badly dilapidated after decades of neglect.

The day he lost his House chairmanship he was conducting Katrina housing hearings in New Orleans. I called him to ask how he was feeling about losing the gavel. His reply: "I'm fine, I have a roof over my head and my family. These people in the Gulf have lost everything."

You probably won't read anywhere that Bob Ney spent his youth teaching English as a second language in pre-Khomeini Iran. He's a multi-faceted guy, the only member of Congress fluent in Farsi.

His politics were similarly nuanced and complex. He was one of only three Republicans to vote against the President's Patriot Act when it was first proposed in 2001, and he supported its curtailment five years later. "Everybody's against terrorism, but there has to be reason in the way that we fight it," he told reporters at the time. It was bold, courageous stuff from somebody whose district went 55 percent for Bush in 2000 and 57 percent for the president in 2004. I only wish some Democrats shared his courage.

Now, of course, he's pleaded guilty to corruption in office, but the Bob Ney I know refused even to use his title to get a good table at a local restaurant when the line was out the door. I only wish he'd had a chance to tell his side in a court of law — and, take it from me, there is another side to this.

Today's Justice Department, however, tries its evidence in the public press, not a courtroom, so it can't be challenged or cross-examined. Those accused of high-profile wrongdoing nowadays are put through a grueling and costly ordeal where they are held upside-down by overpriced criminal defense lawyers, who drop them on their heads once all the money has been shaken out of their pockets.

While I'm heartbroken about Bob and angry as hell about the Justice Department's slimy tactics, I don't worry about him. I know my friend will look at incarceration not as the end of the road, but as a detour, a long-overdue chance to seek help for the alcoholism that has taken over more and more of his life these past few years.

He'll be strong, and when all this is over, he'll be a better man, a better husband and father — and he'll still be my friend.

DOJ_NMG_0085980

Ellen Ratner is Washington bureau chief for the Talk Radio News Service, and is a commentator on the Fox News Channel. All proceeds of her book,"Ready, Set , Talk!" co-authored by Kathie Scarrah, go to Hurricane Katrina relief.

Poll: Senate Within Dems' Grasp, But Pitfalls Remain (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Washington — Democrats are within range of capturing a Senate majority, but face potentially decisive resistance from rural voters in three critical Republican-leaning states, a series of Times/Bloomberg polls have found.

If Democrats can't break through to win the Senate races in at least two of those three states — Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia — they are unlikely to control the chamber.

The surveys show Democrats leading in bids to claim hotly contested Republican-held seats in Ohio and Virginia. Republicans lead in Missouri and Tennessee, both also held by the GOP.

In the fifth race surveyed, Democrats maintain a slim advantage in New Jersey, where Republicans are pressing their strongest bid in this year's campaign to gain a Democratic seat.

Underscoring the election's volatility, the candidate leads in all of these contests fall within the margin of error for the polling.

Democrats need a net gain of six seats for a Senate majority. Polls in the other key Senate races show Democratic challengers holding consistent — though in some cases narrow — leads against GOP incumbents in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Montana.

If Democrats captured those three seats, won Ohio and held New Jersey, Senate control would hinge on the outcomes in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia.

If Democrats win two of these three races, they would have a 51-49 Senate majority. If they win just one, the Senate would be split 50-50 between the parties and Vice President Dick Cheney would provide the tie-breaking vote to organize the chamber for Republicans.

The new surveys underscore the trends creating opportunities for Democrats, particularly anxiety about the Iraq war and erosion of support for the GOP among centrists. But the poll findings also highlight the obstacles the Democrats face in converting the national current of discontent into gains in conservative-leaning states.

Especially challenging for Democrats is breaking the GOP grip on socially conservative voters in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. In each state, the surveys found that despite extensive doubts about the country's direction, the Republicans are still amassing strong margins among rural voters and whites who regularly attend church.

The Times/Bloomberg polls found that among likely voters:

. In Ohio, the Democratic challenger, Rep. Sherrod Brown, led Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, 47% to 39%.

. In New Jersey, Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez held an edge, 45% to 41%, over his GOP challenger, Tom Kean Jr.

. In Virginia, Democrat James Webb led Republican Sen. George Allen, 47% to 44%.

. In Missouri, Republican Sen. James Talent was ahead of Democrat Claire McCaskill, 48% to 45%.

. In Tennessee, Republican Bob Corker, the former mayor of Chattanooga, led Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., 49% to 44%, for the seat being vacated by a Republican, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

The polls, supervised by Times polling director Susan Pinkus, were conducted Friday through Monday. The surveys have a margin of error of plus or minus four percentage points in Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee, five percentage points in Virginia and 5.5 points in New Jersey.

In most of the states, the results were generally in line with other recent surveys. But in Virginia, this is the first major poll to show Webb leading Allen.

Democrats enjoy many of the same advantages across the five battlegrounds. Top among them are consistent strains of dissatisfaction with the country's direction and the war in Iraq.

In each of the states, three-fifths of the voters or more said they believe the country is on the wrong track. In each state, more voters said they preferred that Democrats rather than Republicans control a majority in Congress after the election.

DOJ_NMG_0085981

These attitudes have created several openings for the Democratic Senate candidates.

For instance, each Democrat led among women voters (although the one woman candidate in the group, Missouri's McCaskill, held only a statistically insignificant one percentage point advantage over Talent).

All of the Democrats except Menendez enjoyed comfortable leads among urban voters. Ford, Menendez and Brown also had big advantages among suburban voters, while McCaskill and Webb ran about even with this key voting bloc.

The Democrats also polled well among those in the center of the electorate. Except for Menendez, each of the Democrats attracted support from three-fifths of those categorizing themselves as moderates.

But the polls found that enduring Republican strengths remain a huge barrier for Democrats, especially in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. In these states, the Republican coalition is somewhat chipping around the edges: in each, the GOP nominee is capturing a smaller share of support among conservatives than the Democrat is among liberals.

Even so, the surveys point toward substantial stability in the socially conservative electoral coalition that allowed Bush to carry each state in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections.

Among white men in Missouri, Talent led by 11 percentage points. In Virginia, Allen was ahead by 22 percentage points among this slice of the electorate and in Tennessee, Corker led by 24 points.

Among whites in Missouri who attend church once a week or more, Talent led McCaskill, 65% to 30%. In Tennessee, Ford has stressed his religious faith, but Corker also easily led among whites who regularly attend church, 62% to 29%. Webb in Virginia made a stronger showing among this voting group, trailing Allen 55% to 40%.

Among rural voters in Virginia, Talent led McCaskill, 56% to 37%. Allen topped Webb, 60% to 33%, and Corker dwarfed Ford, 62% to 27%.

The large suburban population in northern Virginia places Webb in a better position to overcome these disadvantages than his Democratic counterparts in Tennessee and Missouri. But all three face a tough climb to victory if they do not improve their performance among these voting blocs by election day.

One of the most consistent trends in the surveys was the link between attitudes toward Bush and preferences in the Senate contests.

In each state, at least 80% of those who approve of Bush's job performance said they would support the GOP Senate candidate. Meanwhile, those who disapprove of Bush's performance preferred the Democratic candidates at rates ranging from 67% for Menendez to 81% for Ford and Webb.

These findings suggest one imperative for Democrats: especially in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia, they need to run as well among voters who disapprove of Bush's job in office as their Republican opponents do with those who approve of it.

Other poll results illustrated the long shadow Bush casts over the election. Democratic candidates enjoy their largest Senate leads in the two states where Bush's approval ratings are the lowest — 34% in New Jersey and 39% in Ohio.

Bush is in relatively better shape in the three states looming as the likely pivot of Senate control: his approval rating stands at 44% in Virginia, 47% in Missouri and 49% in Tennessee.

These numbers are weaker than the ones for Bush in the states as election day neared in 2004. In this campaign's final two weeks, perhaps the critical question is whether the president retains enough strength on terrain he once dominated to help Republicans hold back a tide that could end their control of the Senate.

GOP Pumps Money Into Mo., Va. Races (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 25, 2006

Republicans pumped money into Missouri and Virginia Senate races this week, part of a GOP strategy to cling to their Senate majority by fending off strong Democratic challenges in Republican-leaning states.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee purchased $1.4 million of television time to air an ad that portrays Democratic candidate Jim Webb as insensitive to women. The ad is the first investment by the Republican Party in the state, reflecting concern among Republican officials that incumbent Sen. George Allen is in a closer contest than they expected.

DOJ_NMG_0085982

In Missouri, the Republican National Committee spent $1.78 million on Monday on ads opposing Missouri Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill, who is running against Republican Sen. James Talent. Missouri has been a target for both parties. Democrats have poured $6.37 million into the Senate race and Republicans have spent $5.39 million.

Flush from record September contributions, the parties are entering the final two-week stretch of the campaign with an election map in one hand and a checkbook in the other. Each party is countering the other's moves, putting ads on television, running phone banks and conducting polls.

Last week, Republicans spent $500,000 to run an ad in New Jersey against Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee responded by purchasing $2 million worth of air time to attack Menendez' challenger, Republican Tom Kean Jr.

The Republican ad against Webb in Virginia comes after the DSCC had already spent $1.72 million in the state.

The anti-Webb ad selects quotes from a 1979 article that Webb wrote for Washingtonian magazine where he said women are not fit to lead male soldiers and that the Naval Academy was a "horny woman's dream." During the campaign, Webb has said he now believes women can lead in combat.

"It looks like Chuck Schumer and Howard Dean have directed a lot of resources to Virginia to attack Senator Allen," said National Republican Senatorial Committee spokesman Dan Ronayne, referring to the chairman of the DSCC and the head of the Democratic National Committee. "We aren't going to stand idly by."

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer responded: "It clearly underscores the degree to which they are playing defense going into the final stretch of the campaign."

The party spending reflects some robust fundraising despite 2002 changes in campaign finance law that banned the collection of unlimited amounts of so-called "soft money" from unions corporations and wealthy individuals.

Campaign finance experts say the ability of the parties to exceed their previous fund raising levels is largely due to increased contribution limits in the 2002 law, commonly named after its two Senate sponsors, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis.

"There is no question that the political parties are raising far more contributions than most analysts thought would be possible under the McCain-Feingold law," Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner said.

Toner said the higher contribution limits have permitted the "ultrawealthy" to donate a total of $100,000 to candidates and parties. The Internet has also allowed the parties to reach first-time givers at a fraction of the cost of direct mail or phone calls.

"Both parties have seen a steady climb of small donors," said Trevor Potter, a former FEC chairman who has defended the McCain-Feingold law in court.

Senate Could Be Evenly Split Once Again (AP)

By Jim Abrams

The Associated Press, October 25, 2006

Expected Democratic gains in the election raise the possibility that the Senate, for the second time in six years, will end up in a 50-50 tie.

If that happens, Democrats would like to revive a power-sharing deal that was struck in 2001. But partisan passions on Capitol Hill are stronger now than when President Bush took office promising to be "a uniter, not a divider."

Republicans would officially still be the majority party in an evenly divided Senate because Vice President Dick Cheney, in his role as president of the Senate, would give the GOP a tie-breaking vote. But Democrats would surely demand a greater role in determining how the Senate treated Bush's legislative agenda in his final two years in the White House.

Currently Republicans hold 55 seats and the Democrats 44. Sen. James Jeffords, an independent from Vermont who usually votes with the Democrats, is retiring at the end of this session.

The 2000 election resulted in a Senate split down the middle. Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota became majority leader for just 17 days, between Jan. 3, 2001, when the new Senate was sworn in and Al Gore was still vice president, and the Jan. 20 inauguration of Bush and Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0085983

In returning to the majority leader position, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., negotiated with Daschle a power-sharing arrangement under which the two parties got equal numbers of seats and staff positions on committees. Republicans chose committee chairmen and controlled the agenda on the Senate floor.

Lott took some heat from his Republican colleagues at the time for being overly generous to Democrats, but it paid off four months later when Jeffords bolted from the GOP and became an independent allied with the Democrats. That put the Democrats back in control with Daschle as majority leader.

The Lott-Daschle deal stayed intact until November 2002, when Republican James Talent defeated Missouri's appointed senator, Jean Carnahan, in a special election and Republicans regained power. They've held majorities on Senate committees since then.

This time, Democrats may need the help of two independents to reach parity with the Republicans.

Rep. Bernie Sanders, another Vermont independent, is the front-runner in the race to succeed Jeffords. Sanders has always been a member of the Democratic caucus in the House and his office said he would continue to support the Democrats in the Senate.

Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut appears likely to return to Congress as an independent after his loss to a Democratic challenger in the primaries. Lieberman, in line to become chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee if Democrats capture the Senate, is also committed to staying with the Democratic caucus, his office said.

Jim Manley, press spokesman for Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, said that in the event of a 50-50 breakdown the 2001 Lott-Daschle deal "should serve as a useful guidepost for any negotiations" on power-sharing between Reid and Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

But McConnell, the favorite to succeed retiring Sen. Bill Frist, R-Tenn., as Republican leader, and Reid would be negotiating in a far more partisan atmosphere than in 2001, when the new president and the Democrats were talking of cooperation and the idea of senatorial harmony wasn't quite so unattainable.

Much longer ago, the Senate was also deadlocked at 38-38 in 1881 when Republicans, in control of the White House, won the allegiance of a wavering independent by promising him the Agriculture Committee chairmanship. Republicans took over control of the major committees, while Democrats took advantage of GOP disarray to hold onto staff positions such as sergeant at arms and secretary of the Senate.

State legislatures have at times found more congenial ways to deal with ties. The Indiana House in 1988 created co-speakers who presided on alternate days. The Wyoming Senate in 1974 resolved a tie by flipping a coin.

All Eyes On South's Big Race (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 25, 2006

LOUDON, TENN.

In a normal election year, Bob Corker would be the favorite to win the Tennessee Senate seat being vacated by the retiring Republican leader, Bill Frist. Mr. Corker is successful in business, experienced in government - most recently as mayor of Chattanooga - and affable in demeanor.

But this is not a normal year. The GOP's national image is in the tank over Iraq, scandals, and economic insecurity. A majority of Americans want the Democrats to take the reins of Congress. And Corker's opponent is Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) - the poster boy for dynamic, young politicians who are taking the national stage by storm.

History could be in the making. If he wins, Mr. Ford would be the first African-American from the South to take a Senate seat since Reconstruction - a victory that could nudge another ambitious black politician, Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois, toward running for president by showing him how to win in the South. As a Democrat comfortable talking about his faith, Ford could show Democrats of all colors how it's done.

A Ford victory could also provide the final seat the Democrats need to win control of the Senate, in a quest that seemed nearly impossible just a few months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0085984

It's no wonder "you've got ... press from all over the country, right here on the courthouse steps in Loudon County," Mr. Corker marveled before a crowd of supporters last Sunday afternoon in this small town south of Knoxville, the leaves overhead turning a brilliant shade of Volunteer orange.

Corker knows he can't compete with the 36-year-old Ford on looks or charisma. He says so. But after falling behind in the polls and replacing his campaign manager late in September, he has now settled on his final argument to the people of Tennessee: Vote for me because of my experience and my maturity and because I'm the "real Tennessean."

Corker, his campaign, and national Republicans have also worked hard to drive up Ford's negatives, highlighting some of his relatives' legal troubles, a life spent mostly away from Tennessee, a career in politics, and his bachelor, designer-suit lifestyle.

Ford was elected to represent Tennessee's Ninth Congressional District 10 years ago, following his father, Harold Ford Sr., who held the seat for 22 years.

Now both campaigns say the race is a statistical tie. The sprint to the finish has begun. Ford's message on the stump

Ford's stump speech follows many paths. He has been chiding Corker for saying the US should "stay the course" in Iraq, and on healthcare, and on education, even though Corker distanced himself from "stay the course" months ago, long before President Bush himself did. He calls for the partitioning of Iraq into three areas. He calls for energy independence. He promises, "I won't be 100 percent Democrat; I'm for what's right."

He praises Presidents Truman and Reagan for establishing an American moral authority that was "unquestioned, unassailed." And he makes the pitch for change. "I say it's time for a new direction, a new generation," he says.

Before and after each event, he dispenses hugs easily and poses for countless photographs, pushing his schedule hopelessly behind - like the Democrats' last great campaigner, Bill Clinton.

Ford speaks in the cadence of a Southern preacher, starting slow and building to a crescendo. The references to God and the Bible flow naturally. "When people ask me around this state and around the country, 'How are you guys doing so well?' I say there's a couple reasons - one, we got a big God that we serve...." he says. Voices in the crowd shout back, "All right!" before he can get to point No. 2.

On this Saturday of campaigning around the Nashville area, with popular Democratic Gov. Phil Bredesen at his side, the crowd at each stop is enthusiastic and diverse.

In Gallatin, Tenn., with his largest African-American crowd of the day, he gives the most expansive excursion that day into his religious life. "I learned to go to church the old-fashioned way - I was forced to," he quips, a line he uses in the campaign ad he filmed in his childhood Baptist church in Memphis.

He talks about driving by the Little Rebel Bar and Grill in Jackson, Tenn., one day and how "my God is telling me to stop by" - despite the Confederate flags on the trucks outside. He recalls the words of the pastor he had just met: "There are more answers than problems, and there are more Davids than Goliaths." Ford and his driver walk in and, he says, "a lady got off the stool and gave me a big hug and said, 'Baby, we've been waitin' on you to come by.' "

The racial dimension of the Ford-Corker contest looms large. Pollsters speak of a race effect on surveys- that is, shave off a few percentage points from the black candidate's total, since some white voters tell pollsters what they think they want to hear, that they're willing to vote for a black candidate when in reality they're not.

One Republican activist in Tennessee, who asked not to be identified, says he believes the racial aspect will be a wash in this race: Some whites won't vote for a black man, but turnout in the black community, 16 percent of the electorate, will be higher than usual.

Furthermore, says the activist, "this is a Southern state, but it's not a deep South state, so everything that applies to the South, you can cut a little bit."

Linda Boyd, a computer assistant in the Clarksville, Tenn., schools who is African-American, says she's been out canvassing for Ford and had people tell her they would never vote for him. "I know what they mean," she says.

Ford's big, political family - some of whom have been prosecuted for corruption - may also hurt him. At the Corker event in Loudon, some of those attending said that even if Ford himself isn't corrupt, he benefits from his family's activities. But among Ford fans, his big, political family is a plus. "The Fords are fighters," says Mary Hoskins of Clarksville. And she's not concerned about some Fords' legal troubles. "Everyone's got someone in their family," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0085985

And what about Ford's life outside Tennessee? After his father's first term in Congress, he moved the family to Washington, where Harold Jr. was enrolled at the same elite prep school, St. Albans, that another son of Tennessee, Al Gore, had attended. Ford then attended the University of Pennsylvania and University of Michigan Law School, and at age 26 was elected to Congress. Corker's profile

Corker, in contrast, was born in South Carolina, moved to Tennessee at age 11, and has lived here ever since. In an interview, Corker calls Ford "a nice young man," but adds that "I just know that I more fully represent the values of this state."

After Corker won the primary, against two more-conservative Republicans, he set out to portray Ford as a liberal, but it didn't work. Ford is one of the most conservative members of the Congressional Black Caucus. He opposes gay marriage, so-called partial birth abortion, and what he calls "amnesty for illegals."

Corker, a moderate Republican who at one time supported abortion rights, may have trouble inspiring Christian conservatives to turn out for him. Even though the National Right to Life Committee has endorsed Corker, Tennessee Right to Life has refused.

"That sends a signal to some people," says the Republican activist. "Tennessee Right to Life isn't huge, but in a close election, every vote counts." An expensive contest

And in a close election, with control of the Senate on the line, both parties are spending millions of dollars on ads, some of them suggestive and nasty, leading the candidates to call on their parties to take them down. In a preemptive move, Ford showed up at the Memphis airport last Friday and confronted Corker right before the Republican was due to give a press conference. The Corker campaign has been publicizing the dustup ever since, saying it shows Ford's lack of maturity.

The wealthy Corker also has the option of writing another large check to his campaign. If he does so in the final days, that would make it difficult for Ford to invoke the federal "millionaire's clause," which allows Ford to raise more money from his donors.

Still, the larger forces at play in the campaign haven't changed. "The combination of facing a strong Democrat who's moderate and a year that isn't particularly kind to Republicans - Corker may just lose this thing," says John Geer, a political scientist at Vanderbilt University in Nashville. "But I'm not prepared to make any predictions."

A Contentious Campaign In A Battleground State (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

COALMONT, Tenn. -- John Layne is a 57-year-old white Republican with a long gray beard, no job and advancing emphysema. He arrived an hour early to hear Harold Ford Jr. speak in this struggling mountain town.

"Oh, sure, there's some prejudice," Layne said as he contemplated casting a ballot for a black man. "I wouldn't want my daughter marrying one." But he's more concerned about rising medical costs: When it comes to voting, "you gotta look at the person, not the color."

Ford announced his Senate campaign 18 months ago with three strikes against him: He was a Democrat, he was black, and he carried family baggage. The five-term congressman was wildly popular in his Memphis House district and was viewed as a rising star in the Democratic Party. But statewide office seemed beyond reach in Tennessee, a state with a history of racially divided voting where Republicans had won recent Senate races.

Now this political curiosity has become one of the most intense and bitter contests of the season. With the Nov. 7 elections two weeks away, Ford is locked in a surprisingly close battle with Republican Bob Corker. The latest poll -- released yesterday by Mason-Dixon -- showed the charismatic Ford trailing 45 percent to 43 percent.A Senate Battleground

Tennessee is one of the four remaining Senate battlegrounds, along with Virginia, Missouri and Rhode Island, that operatives in both parties believe are most likely to determine whether Republicans maintain control of the Senate in January. But this race is in a different category because of Ford's profile.

Corker and Ford tangle over all the usual issues, including the war in Iraq, education and energy independence, with both candidates holding mainstream views on most topics. Yet every speech, slogan and campaign ad seems to echo with double meaning.

DOJ_NMG_0085986

"I'm a believer that this moment is a big one," Ford, 36, told the Coalmont crowd, as Layne nodded approvingly from his seat in front of the podium. "I'll make you a good senator. I just want to go up there and do right."

Corker depicts himself as more "senatorial" than Ford but is running an almost entirely negative campaign at this point. He depicts Ford as a smooth-talking city slicker who has deeper roots in Washington, D.C. -- where Ford lived for part of his childhood -- compared with Corker, the self-described "real Tennessean" in the race.

The hardest blows have come from the national GOP. The National Republican Senatorial Committee ridicules Ford's expensive tastes on a "Fancy Ford" Web site, and the Republican National Committee is airing a controversial new ad that features a scantily clad blonde who says she met Ford at a Playboy party. "Harold, call me!" the woman chirps.

The former Chattanooga mayor often appears to be tiptoeing through a rhetorical minefield, eager to discredit his Democratic opponent with the sharpest weapons he can find but wary about accusations of playing racial politics. "Our life experiences could not be more different," Corker said in an interview. "For him, politics is a way of life."

Does the race factor influence his campaign decisions? "I understand the point of your question," Corker responded carefully in a recent interview. Then he shook his head and looked away.A Symbolic Victory?

If Ford pulls it off, he will become the first black senator to represent the South since Reconstruction. Victory in Tennessee also would be particularly symbolic for the Democratic Party, a bookend of sorts to the 1994 "Republican Revolution." That historic election, which gave the GOP control of both chambers of Congress, was tilted by races in the same Upper South states where Democrats are seeking to wrest power from Republicans this year.

One 1994 milestone was the defeat of veteran Senate Democrat Jim Sasser by political newcomer Bill Frist, who rose to become Senate majority leader. In 2000, Vice President Al Gore lost his home state in the general election, costing him the presidency.

But two years later, Tennessee elected a Democratic governor, Phil Bredesen, a pragmatic, low-key former businessman and Nashville mayor. The House delegation flipped to five Democrats and four Republicans. Bredesen is also on the ballot in November, and recent polls show him far ahead of his Republican opponent.

The governor is starring in a Ford campaign ad, and the two are barnstorming around the state. Ford credits him with creating a new Democratic brand. "He's our closer," Ford said. "We're in a position to win, and he's going to push us over the edge."

On May 25, 2005, when the brash young Democrat announced his Senate candidacy, he raised a few eyebrows. A sports junkie known on Capitol Hill for robust socializing, he still seemed a bit young. His ambitions had been obvious from his first days in Congress, and in 2002 he lost a caucus battle to become House minority leader to Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who has the job now.

Despite that setback, Ford has fashioned a reputation as a new-generation Democrat, less defined by interest-group politics and with strong opinions of how national Democrats have failed to compete seriously in the South. He is both supremely confident and dead serious. "I will run a very issue-rich, substance-rich campaign," Ford promised in a video that streamed over his new campaign Web site when he announced his Senate run.

On May 26, 2005, his uncle John Ford, a state senator, was indicted on corruption charges. It was a reminder -- though few politically aware people in this state needed one -- that Ford hailed from an illustrious Memphis clan. Fords had served in state and local government for decades, and a few had scrapes with the law.

Ford's father was one of 12 children of a funeral-home entrepreneur; Harold Ford Sr. served 11 terms in the House before his son took over the seat. The elder Ford was acquitted of bank-fraud charges in 1990. Another uncle, Emmett Ford, had resigned from the state legislature in 1981 after being convicted of insurance fraud.

When Ford ran to succeed his father, he billed himself proudly as "Junior." But his role model, as he told the Democratic National Convention in his 2000 keynote address, was former Tennessee senator and vice president Al Gore. He recalled meeting Gore (a fellow graduate of St. Albans School in Washington) in his family kitchen in Memphis.

"It was a time when, on the heels of Vietnam and Watergate, young Americans were turning away from public service. But Al Gore didn't turn away. He jumped feet first into public life," the young congressman recalled.A Fierce Campaigner

DOJ_NMG_0085987

Corker, who is 54, spent his early adult years creating a lucrative construction business. He was appointed state finance commissioner during the late 1990s and was elected Chattanooga mayor in 2001. He is credited with the impressive redevelopment of the city's riverfront.

White-haired and compact, with a rich twang, Corker has a friendly rapport with voters but has proven himself over the years to be a fierce competitor. When he ran against Frist in the 1994 GOP primary, Corker was called "pond scum" by Frist campaign manager Tom Perdue for airing an ad that suggested Frist had dodged the draft.

This year, as Corker slogged through a rough-and-tumble GOP primary with two more conservative opponents, Ford campaign insiders braced for a barrage of attacks. It has been unrelenting. Most of Corker's ads, news releases and campaign speeches are attacks on Ford, addressing such things as his House voting record and his not passing the bar exam.

Ford's rhetorical skills and good looks are particular targets. A new Corker ad features a series of ordinary-looking voters raising questions about Ford, with one woman asking "Has Junior ever had a job outside of politics?" and another noting "He does look good on TV."

Corker's attacks appear to have thrown Ford somewhat off-stride in recent days. The congressman showed up at a recent Corker news conference to insist that he stop criticizing the Ford family, a move Republicans called undignified. But some Republicans are concerned Corker is not working hard enough to whip up support in his party, in particular among the socially conservative voters who preferred his primary opponents, former representatives Van Hilleary and Ed Bryant.

"The differences need to be spelled out aggressively in the next few weeks," Frist said as the Senate majority leader campaigned with Corker in Athens, Tenn. Frist said Corker must convince Tennessee voters that he is "a genuine person who has their values."

While visiting a diner in Oak Ridge, Corker stopped to shake hands with Linda Ramsey, who was having lunch with her husband, Dale, and daughter Kelcee. Ramsey responded with a big smile when Corker asked for her vote. But when he moved to the next table, she conceded she was leaning toward Ford.

Although she supported Corker in the primary, Ramsey explained, "all he wants to do is point fingers. Ford is stepping up above it."

Ford is difficult to typecast -- conservative on some issues and liberal on others. In Coalmont, one of Ford's biggest applause lines came when he called for "character education" in public schools to teach the difference between right and wrong. But he also drew cheers when he suggested that the federal government take a bigger role in education.

Ford filmed a television ad inside the Memphis church he attended as a child, and he fondly recalls the times his maternal grandmother chased after him with a switch.

The state Democratic Party is working particularly hard to rally black voters. State party officials believe African Americans could push Ford over the top if they turn out in large numbers. In addition to clutching Bredesen's coattails, Ford has tethered himself to Rep. Lincoln Davis, a popular two-term Democrat from a rural, white central Tennessee district and the chairman of Ford's campaign.

Davis said he polled his district in July and found Ford trailing 49 percent to 35 percent. "I didn't even tell his campaign," Davis acknowledged.

New numbers came back a few weeks ago showing Ford ahead 49 percent to 39 percent. "He's a rock star, a superstar," Davis said. "And if he wins my district, he's the next senator from Tennessee."

Rush Limbaugh On The Offensive Against Ad With Michael J. Fox (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Possibly worse than making fun of someone's disability is saying that it's imaginary. That is not to mock someone's body, but to challenge a person's guts, integrity, sanity.

To Rush Limbaugh on Monday, Michael J. Fox looked like a faker. The actor, who suffers from Parkinson's disease, has done a series of political ads supporting candidates who favor stem cell research, including Maryland Democrat Ben Cardin, who is running against Republican Michael Steele for the Senate seat being vacated by Paul Sarbanes.

DOJ_NMG_0085988

"He is exaggerating the effects of the disease," Limbaugh told listeners. "He's moving all around and shaking and it's purely an act. . . . This is really shameless of Michael J. Fox. Either he didn't take his medication or he's acting."

Limbaugh, whose syndicated radio program has a weekly audience of about 10 million, was reacting to Fox's appearance in another one of the spots, for Missouri Democrat Claire McCaskill, running against Republican Sen. James M. Talent.

But the Cardin ad is similar. It is hard to watch, unless, for some reason, you don't believe it. As he speaks, Fox's restless torso weaves and writhes in a private dance. His head bobs from side to side, almost leaving the video frame.

"This is the only time I've ever seen Michael J. Fox portray any of the symptoms of the disease he has," Limbaugh said. "He can barely control himself."

Later Monday, still on the air, Limbaugh would apologize, but reaction to his statements from Parkinson's experts and Fox's supporters was swift and angry.

"It's a shameless statement," John Rogers said yesterday. Rogers, Fox's political adviser, who also serves on the board of the Parkinson's Action Network, added: "It's insulting. It's appallingly sad, at best."

"Anyone who knows the disease well would regard his movement as classic severe Parkinson's disease," said Elaine Richman, a neuroscientist in Baltimore who co-wrote "Parkinson's Disease and the Family." "Any other interpretation is misinformed."

Fox was campaigning yesterday for Tammy Duckworth, a congressional candidate, outside Chicago, when he alluded to Limbaugh's remarks. "It's ironic, given some of the things that have been said in the last couple of days, that my pills are working really well right now," he said, according to a report on the CBS2 Web site.

After his apology, Limbaugh shifted his ground and renewed his attack on Fox.

"Now people are telling me they have seen Michael J. Fox in interviews and he does appear the same way in the interviews as he does in this commercial," Limbaugh said, according to a transcript on his Web site. "All right then, I stand corrected. . . . So I will bigly, hugely admit that I was wrong, and I will apologize to Michael J. Fox, if I am wrong in characterizing his behavior on this commercial as an act."

Then Limbaugh pivoted to a different critique: "Michael J. Fox is allowing his illness to be exploited and in the process is shilling for a Democratic politician."

Limbaugh's shock at Fox's appearance is a measure of the disease's devastation, advocates say. Contrary to the charge that Fox might not take his medicine to enhance his symptoms, the medicine produces some of the uncontrolled body movements.

"Stem cell research offers hope to millions of Americans with diseases like diabetes, Alzheimer's and Parkinson's," Fox says in the Cardin ad. "But George Bush and Michael Steele would put limits on the most promising stem cell research."

Fox has appeared in ABC's "Boston Legal" this season. In his scenes, taped over the summer, Fox does not shake or loll his head as he does in the Cardin commercial, but does appear to be restraining himself, appearing almost rigid at times.

A source with direct knowledge of Fox's illness who viewed the Cardin ad said Fox is not acting to exaggerate the effects of the disease. The source said Fox's scenes in "Boston Legal" had to be taped around his illness, as he worked to control the tremors associated with Parkinson's for limited periods of time.

Limbaugh Says Actor Fox Exaggerating His Disease As Stem Cell Issue Churns (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rush Limbaugh has accused actor Michael J. Fox of exaggerating the physical effects of his Parkinson's disease in political ads urging viewers to vote for Democrats in next month's election.

The conservative radio host told listeners Monday that Fox's lurching, palsied movements in a TV ad for Missouri Senate challenger Claire McCaskill were “an act.” Limbaugh noted that Fox, a longtime advocate for research on embryonic stem cells, has said he sometimes does not take his medication in order to illustrate Parkinson's severe physical effects. Uncontrolled shaking and stiffness are among the symptoms of the nerve disease.

“If this was not an act,” Limbaugh said later on the show, “then I apologize.”

DOJ_NMG_0085989

John Rogers, Fox's spokesman, called Limbaugh's remarks "shameful."

It's an appalling, sad statement," Rogers said. "Anybody who understands Parkinson's disease knows it's because of the medicine that one experiences" body movements like those seen in the ad.

Fox, who has had Parkinson's for 15 years, is supporting candidates who would vote to expand research using stem cells from human embryos.

Embryonic stem cells are the precursor cells to almost every tissue in the body. Advocates of their use in research say they hold more potential to cure spinal cord injuries, diabetes and other diseases than adult stem cells. Opponents say that the research with embryonic cells, which destroys the embryos, amounts to abortion and that adult stem cells have been used successfully in therapies. This summer, President Bush used his first veto to kill a bill that would have funded research using leftover fertility-clinic embryos that would otherwise have been discarded.

Fox has also made ads for Senate candidate Ben Cardin in Maryland and Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle.

In the McCaskill spot (claireonline.com), which aired during Game 1 of baseball's World Series on Saturday, Fox says McCaskill, the state auditor, "shares my hope for cures" while her opponent, GOP Sen. Jim Talent, wants to "criminalize" expanded research. Talent spokesman Rich Chrismer called the ad "false" and says Talent supports "stem cell research that doesn't involve cloning or destroying a human embryo."

The Fox ads are part of a larger effort by Democrats who are using the issue as another weapon against Republicans already hurting from an unpopular war in Iraq and Bush's low approval ratings.

Democrats and interest groups are using ads, campaign events and celebrities in at least 20 House, Senate and governor races to push for more federal funding for embryonic stem cell research.

Fox's dramatic ads are "very effective" with suburban voters, seniors and parents, says Evan Tracey of the non-partisan Campaign Media Analysis Group, which tracks political advertising. "It puts the Republicans on the wrong side of hope."

Other TV spots:

•Singer Sheryl Crow, a Missouri native and breast cancer survivor, appears in an ad (www.missouricures.com) sponsored by the Missouri Coalition for Lifesaving Cures, which backs a state ballot initiative to permit research on embryonic stem cells.

•In Arizona, an ad (www .dccc.org/multimedia) sponsored by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee features the granddaughter of Morris Udall, a popular congressman who died of Parkinson's disease in 1998. Loren Udall, who has the autoimmune disease lupus, says that "by voting in Congress to restrict stem cell research, (Republican Rep.) J.D. Hayworth has played politics with people's lives."

Brian Nick of the National Republican Senatorial Committee says such "fear-mongering" ads distort the positions of candidates who favor research using adult stem cells. "It's unfortunate they're using a good man like Michael J. Fox as a political pawn to misrepresent people's view."

Sarah Chamberlain Resnick of the Republican Main Street Partnership, whose members back embryonic stem cell research, says of Missouri's senator, "Talent's entire race is going to come down to stem cells. (McCaskill has) been killing him on it."

Making Stem Cell Issue Personal, And Political (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

The plea is as disturbing — and arresting — as a hostage video from Iraq. In a navy blazer and preppy Oxford shirt, the actor Michael J. Fox calmly asks viewers to support stem cell research by voting for several Democratic candidates in Maryland, Missouri and Wisconsin, while his body sways back and forth uncontrollably like a sailor being tossed around in a full-force gale.

In short, Mr. Fox's display of the toll Parkinson's disease has taken on him turned into one of the most powerful and talked about political advertisements in years.

Republican strategists who saw how quickly the commercial was downloaded, e-mailed and reshown on news broadcasts certainly thought so. Rush Limbaugh rushed in to discredit Mr. Fox, though he mostly hurt himself. Mr. Limbaugh, the conservative radio talk show host, told his listeners that the actor either "didn't take his medication or was acting." Mr. Limbaugh later apologized for accusing Mr. Fox of exaggerating his symptoms, but said that "Michael J. Fox is allowing his illness to be exploited and in the process is shilling for a Democrat politician."

DOJ_NMG_0085990

Republicans cobbled together a response ad that did not mention Mr. Fox but attacked the ethics of embryonic stem cell research. It included testimonials by the actress Patricia Heaton ("Everybody Loves Raymond") and James Caviezel, who played Jesus in Mel Gibson's "Passion of the Christ." At least in the advance version shown on YouTube last night, Mr. Caviezel's introduction seemed either garbled or to be in Aramaic.

The issue of embryonic stem cell research is divisive, but Mr. Fox is not. And that is one reason his advertisement had such resonance. He is a popular actor who played a young conservative Republican on the sitcom "Family Ties." His illness was diagnosed in 1991, but he kept it secret until 1998. In 2000, he told his fans that because of his illness, he had to quit the hit sitcom "Spin City." He founded the Michael J. Fox Foundation to advance stem cell research, lobbied Congress and made commercials to rally support for his cause.

But he has rarely looked quite as infirm. Mr. Fox was recently a guest star on several episodes of the ABC drama "Boston Legal," and, presumably thanks to medication, his symptoms there were less noticeable.

If Mr. Fox did forgo medication for the advertisement as Mr. Limbaugh suggested, it could hardly be considered fraudulent: if anything, masking the extent of the disease's ravages is the deception, not revealing them. (A spokesman for Mr. Fox said his tremors were caused by his medication.) It was certainly the most dramatic way Mr. Fox has to personalize the issue; he used his infirmity much the way the late Christopher Reeve did when he lobbied for stem cell research to seek a cure for spinal injuries.

Debate over stem cell research is especially intense in Missouri, where voters are considering a measure that would amend the state's Constitution to protect all federally allowed forms of the research, including embryonic stem cell research. Mr. Fox's words in support of the Democratic Senate candidate, Claire McCaskill, were not nearly as forceful as his condemnation of her Republican opponent.

"Unfortunately, Senator Jim Talent opposes expanding stem cell research," Mr. Fox says in the 30-second spot. "Senator Talent even wanted to criminalize the science that gives us a chance for hope."

The Talent campaign protested Mr. Fox's wording as misleading. "Senator Talent supports medical research including stem cell research that doesn't involve cloning or destroying a human embryo," said the candidate's spokesman, Rich Chrismer.

But one reason candidates rely so heavily on 30-second spots is that they appeal to visceral emotion, not reason. In the recent past, it has been the Republican advertisements that have tended to be more bold and more memorable: the Willie Horton advertisements that George Bush used against Michael S. Dukakis in 1988 or the specter of stalking wolves that his son, George W. Bush, used to make Senator John Kerry seem weak on terrorism. Democrats usually have to go back to 1964 and Lyndon B. Johnson's "Daisy" attack on Barry Goldwater to find comparably vivid ads. Until now, that is.

These are times in which most actors seem prepared to do anything, and pay any price, to disguise flaws that could harm their careers. So when a famous one exposes the full, frightening extent of his infirmity in the name of saving lives, it tends to get noticed.

With 2 Weeks To Go, Allen, Webb Ad Blitz Hits A Higher Gear (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

RICHMOND, Oct. 24 -- Virginia's Senate candidates and their national party backers will begin a final, multimillion-dollar advertising blitz Wednesday, flooding the state's airwaves with campaign commercials during the two weeks before Election Day.

The close battle between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democratic challenger James Webb has become a nationally watched race in which the GOP may have to make an unexpected stand to retain control of the Senate.

As a result, neither side is letting up. During the next week, television watchers in Northern Virginia will see an average of five Virginia Senate ads a day. Together, the campaigns and the Senate party committees in Washington are spending $3.45 million over the next week in Northern Virginia.

"Voters are going to see so much stuff," said Stuart Rothenberg, editor of a nonpartisan political newsletter in the District. "If they are not numb already, they ought to shoot their brains full of Novocain."

DOJ_NMG_0085991

Voters in other parts of the state will also be deluged with the commercials about Allen and Webb. But most of the money will be flowing to Northern Virginia and its expensive media market, where a week's worth of ads for one candidate costs about $1 million. By contrast, running the same number of ads in the Roanoke media market costs about $89,000.

By Nov. 7, the Virginia Senate candidates will probably spend more than $25 million. And the race, which has become closer than anyone predicted several months ago, has drawn financial resources for both parties away from other competitive states.

"There is a lot of national Democratic money flying into Virginia, and we are not going to stand idly by while it does," said Dan Ronayne, a spokesman for the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, which has invested about $1.4 million in Virginia ads.

The Republican committee's first ad attacks Webb for his reaction to the Navy's Tailhook Association scandal, in which women were assaulted at a Las Vegas convention in 1991.

"Jim Webb, he called this scandal a witch hunt and a feminist plot," the female announcer says. "Jim Webb. Right for '06. 1806."

The ad cites a 1992 New York Times article in which Webb said, "A botched internal investigation and the ongoing revelations of inexcusable harassment of women . . . have also left in their wake a witch hunt that threatens to swamp the entire naval service."

Webb campaign officials said the GOP ad is unfair and takes Webb's past statements about Tailhook out of context.

"Like everything that comes out of Republicans these days, it is complete lies and distortions about Jim's record and what Jim has said and done in the past," said Kristian Denny Todd, a Webb spokeswoman. "The bottom line is they are desperate. For a guy who has been in office in this state for 26 years, [Allen] has nothing to offer but this kind of garbage."

Phil Singer, a Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee spokesman, predicted that the GOP ad would backfire.

"At a time when people are desperate for a change in policy in Iraq and the middle class is feeling squeezed, they want to hear solutions that are going to work and not political potshots and ads like the ones Allen and his allies are putting up that are purely negative," Singer said.

Webb has launched two TV commercials, including one that features former governor Mark R. Warner (D). In that ad, the popular ex-governor describes Webb's background and concludes by urging voters to choose Webb.

"I know Jim Webb," Warner says, looking into the camera. "I know his independence. And I know he'll make us proud."

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, said voters "are going to see lots of ads" between now and Nov. 7. "This is a race for the United States Senate. That is what races for the United States Senate have, lots of ads," Wadhams said. "But it is also important to note Senator Allen is traveling across the commonwealth on a very ambitious schedule, which he has done many times in the past."

Webb has also started running an ad that criticizes Allen's record of opposing increases to the minimum wage and allowing increases in college tuition, charges that Allen's campaign officials have denied.

Meanwhile, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has begun airing a commercial playing up Allen's loyalty to President Bush. It features Allen saying the phrase "stay the course" as an announcer says that "George Allen supports President Bush 96 percent of the time."

The ad continues: "Staying the course is not a strategy for victory in Iraq. And voting 96 percent with Bush won't move our country forward."

GOP's Kennedy Sticks To Iraq Stance In Unique Ad (MINNST)

By Patrick Condon

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 25, 2006

As his fellow Republicans around the country try to distance themselves from the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq, Minnesota Senate candidate Mark Kennedy is trying to turn the issue on its head with a new TV ad where he squarely states his support — "even though I know it may not be what you want to hear," he tells voters.

DOJ_NMG_0085992

The 30-second ad, running statewide for at least a week, is the latest attempt by the Republican to catch Democratic frontrunner Amy Klobuchar, and may be the only ad of its kind in the country. Staring into the camera, Kennedy acknowledges that "we've made some mistakes in Iraq" but says that "leaving Iraq now will create a breeding ground for new attacks on America."

Political observers said Tuesday they've not seen an ad like it anywhere this election cycle, with the Bush administration and Republicans on the defensive over Iraq. Just a day earlier, the White House acknowledged President Bush had dropped his familiar "stay the course" phrase in talking about the war.

Vin Weber, a former Minnesota congressman with close ties to national GOP leadership, said he believed Kennedy's ad was unique.

"I'd say the desire of most Republicans is to talk about something else," he said.

As a House member the last six years, Kennedy has been a vocal supporter of the Bush administration's foreign policy. He's visited Iraq each of the last three years, and used his support for U.S. policy toward Iraq and terrorism as a signature issue of his successful reelection campaigns in 2002 and 2004.

In resurrecting the issue now, Kennedy is trying to draw a distinction between himself and Klobuchar, whom he criticizes as offering no alternatives to current policy other than an undefined "change of course," as she put it in a new TV ad of her own that mentions Iraq among a litany of campaign issues.

"And this election is about all the sons and daughters of Minnesota serving in Iraq who deserve a change in course," Klobuchar says in her ad. Klobuchar has said invading Iraq was the wrong decision and that the U.S. should begin reducing troop levels. She doesn't support a timed, rapid withdrawal like some Democrats.

Weber, who has advised Kennedy but has no formal role in his campaign, said he hoped voters would respond to Kennedy's forthrightness. "We tend to think you can't tell voters what you really think and you have to treat them like spoiled children who demand to be told what they want to hear," he said.

Kennedy, on a campaign swing Tuesday through southwestern Minnesota, said the U.S. erred in not earlier cracking down on armed militias now causing havoc throughout Iraq. He also said more should be done to block shipments of money and weapons from across the border in Iran.

"Getting rid of the militias is going to be a difficult task," Kennedy said. "I don't want to set some sort of arbitrary deadline that is going to do nothing but give the enemy reason to hope."

Kennedy said the administration has at times faltered in how it characterizes the war on terrorism. He said it should be viewed as more long-term, similar to the Cold War, "not a short war." Still, he does not call for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, as some prominent Republicans have. "That's the president's decision, not mine," he said.

Ben Goldfarb, Klobuchar's campaign manager, said that support for Kennedy is still a vote to "stay the course in Iraq. Amy Klobuchar will do what Kennedy won't: ask tough questions, demand accountability and push for change."

Joel Rivlin, the deputy director of the University of Wisconsin Advertising Project, which tracks political advertising, said Kennedy's approach is an unusual one — but worth a try.

"It's increasingly clear that the Iraq war is going to be at the top of most voters' minds," Rivlin said. "What he seems to be trying to do is reframe the issue in a way that helps voters realize maybe there is another way to think about this — even if they don't see it that way themselves."

A Sense Of Service Sustained By Family, Faith (WP)

By Katherine Shaver

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Almost every Friday, Benjamin L. Cardin gathers with his family -- his wife, daughter, granddaughters, cousins and brother's family -- for dinner celebrating the Jewish Sabbath.

As many as 30 people come. Cardin often bakes the challah or grills the chicken. The group sings, prays and collects money for charity. Then everyone takes turns sharing what made each happiest that week. At one recent Shabbat, the Democrat took a break from campaigning for Maryland's open U.S. Senate seat to join in. He was happy, he told everyone, that Election Day was less than a month away.

DOJ_NMG_0085993

During 40 years in public office -- 20 in the General Assembly followed by two decades in Congress -- Cardin has woven his political life into the faith and family that he says sustain him.

He followed his father and uncle into the state legislature. One of his closest political advisers is Myrna, his wife of 40 years, whom he met in elementary school. At one of the lowest points in his life -- when his son committed suicide eight years ago -- Cardin carried out a Jewish custom of mourning for 30 days by gathering Jewish staffers and fellow Congress members in his Capitol Hill office for daily prayers.

His faith informs his actions in the House of Representatives, particularly a six-year membership on the ethics committee, he said.

His office displays none of the usual photographs of a congressman shaking hands with famous people. Instead, the most prominent photo shows his curly-haired granddaughter, Madeline, then 4, sitting beside him during a swearing-in ceremony at the Capitol.

He and his brother, Howard, shared a bedroom for 16 years while growing up. They remained so close after both married that they moved their families several times so they could live near each other -- at one point, across the street from each other for 25 years. He considered his father, Meyer M. Cardin, who died last year two days shy of his 98th birthday, one of his closest friends.

Ben Cardin, 63, said he remains grounded in what his father told him after his election to the General Assembly at 23. "He said I had something people worked a lifetime for," Cardin said, "that I had the opportunity to make a difference and that I should think about that. . . . I think about that frequently, and it affects everything I do in life."

Although Cardin hails from one of Baltimore's most prominent political families, his canvassers say his name draws blank looks from many voters. His Republican rival, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, is a telegenic, polished speaker who has captured attention with catchy TV ads highlighting his love of puppies. Steele hugs his way through a crowd and shares humorous personal stories. Cardin launches straight into serious policy discussions. At rallies, it is hard to tell that he is the star.

"My father-in-law would come to a restaurant and work every table," Myrna Cardin said of Meyer Cardin, who also became a Circuit Court judge. "Ben would sit down and eat and not even think people would want to be bothered during dinner."

Registered Democrats outnumber Republicans 2 to 1 in Maryland, but Cardin isn't taking any chances. After all, many of those Democrats chose a GOP governor four years ago. Nor can he ignore Steele's appeal for some as the first African American elected to statewide office in Maryland. Cardin skipped Shabbat last week, which he is loath to do, to attend an NAACP dinner in Prince George's County.

Cardin -- whose congressional district includes a piece of Baltimore and parts of Howard, Baltimore and Anne Arundel counties -- comes across as a mix of a professor and the nice guy next door, with a finely honed political edge. Political supporters and rivals alike describe him as steady, smart, decent and honest.

As Myrna Cardin said, using a Yiddish term for an upright person, "He runs his life to be a mensch."

Profiles of him never fail to mention that he is short, stout and, but for a few curly wisps of white hair, bald on top. His specialties in Congress -- pension law and Social Security -- gained him a reputation as a serious legislator but often draw yawns beyond the C-SPAN crowd. In stump speeches, Cardin calls for universal health care, a higher minimum wage and federal support for embryonic stem-cell research. He criticizes the Bush administration for trying to privatize Social Security and highlights his vote against sending troops to Iraq.

He is clearly most at ease -- and at his best -- in small groups, where he is warm and, for a man often labeled as dull, surprisingly witty. During lunch with a dozen Washington Post reporters and editors, Cardin mentioned his father's death. "His brother is 96 and just bought a car," Cardin said. He added dryly: "He took the five-year extended warranty. We have good genes in my family."

Supporters play up Cardin's seriousness as his strength.

"He's always thinking about something," said Frank M. Conaway Sr., a Democratic former Assembly colleague of Cardin's and now clerk of Baltimore's Circuit Court. "He's just not a jump-up-and-down kind of politician."

DOJ_NMG_0085994

By contrast, Myrna Cardin is gregarious and bubbly. Crowds warm to her beaming smile. She refers to her husband by his childhood nickname, "Benji."

They grew up in Baltimore, a mile apart in a middle-class neighborhood of first-generation Americans. Cardin's grandparents came from Lithuania and Russia. (Cardin said it's likely that an immigration officer shortened their last name from Kardonsky.) The extended family, including 17 first cousins, lived within a couple blocks.

"The family was always together," said Howard Cardin, a Baltimore defense lawyer. Many went into public service, he said, because "there was a strong feeling of serving public needs."

The men's parents were active in volunteer work, especially among the needy. Myrna Cardin said in an interview that her husband soaked up their example.

"Ben grew up in a very traditional Jewish home, where you gave back," she said. "That's his persona. . . . It's like he inhaled it as a good way to live."

In addition to teaching an ethics course at Johns Hopkins University, Cardin served on the House ethics committee, an often unpopular job because members must pass judgment on colleagues. He helped investigate the House Bank scandal, in which members regularly bounced checks. He was the lead Democrat in crafting a bipartisan punishment for then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who used tax-deductible money for political purposes and provided inaccurate information to House investigators.

"Ethics is the driving equalizer in my life -- to make sure everything I do can be judged as right or wrong," Cardin said in an interview.

It is a quality his wife said she has always admired. When they began dating at 15, she also saw him as happy, fun and full of adventure.

"And he drove a Chevy Impala -- a convertible -- and that didn't hurt," she said with a laugh over a glass of iced tea recently at a Baltimore coffeehouse.

She knew politics came with the package. The Cardin name loomed large in Baltimore's Democratic politics. In addition to his father, Ben's uncle, Maurice Cardin, served in the House of Delegates. Like his uncle and father, Ben would become a lawyer. He graduated first in his class from the University of Maryland's law school.

When his uncle left the General Assembly, local Democrats approached Cardin's father about filling the seat. Ben Cardin said he would run.

"They said: 'We've always had a Cardin on the ticket. We need a Cardin on the ticket,' " Myrna Cardin recalled. Cardin was in law school when he won. He quickly became chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee before being chosen one of the youngest House speakers in state history.

"I worked hard in that [first] election," he said, "but I think it's fair to say that without the name, I wouldn't have won."

Family ties haven't always helped. At least one challenger in the late 1980s tried to link Cardin to an older cousin, Jerome Cardin, who was jailed as part of the Maryland savings and loan collapse. Cardin was never implicated.

But Republicans couldn't compete with Cardin's ability to raise money and win votes in heavily Democratic districts. Before Steele, most of his challengers were little-known or first-time candidates running on pennies compared with Cardin's campaign coffers.

Scott Conwell, a Republican lawyer from Crofton who opposed Cardin in 2002, said Cardin spent much more money than he did. Cardin's congressional seat has been so safe for so long that he has never had to run a hard-hitting campaign, which fits his cautious nature, Conwell said. Cardin, he noted, bowed out after initially challenging then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening (D) in 1997.

"His issues are not risk-taking issues," Conwell said. "He's very safe. Even when he spent $1 million against me, no one would ever remember how he spent it because they were nice-guy commercials -- Ben doing this or Ben near the [Chesapeake] Bay -- but they weren't risk-taking commercials. They raised his favorability ratings, but they didn't spark any passion for him."

Cardin seems most passionate about discussing policy. On those issues, he said, he turns to his staff for advice. When it comes to any other difficult decision, political or personal, he asks Myrna.

DOJ_NMG_0085995

"She's not the person pulling the strings and shaping policy," said their daughter, Deborah Cardin, 37, who works at the Jewish Museum of Maryland. "But she's fiercely protective of my father. . . . She'll call the person who's driving him and say: 'Has Ben had lunch? Is he getting dinner?' "

If anything could have tested the Cardins' marriage, friends said, it was the death of their son, Michael. Family members said he was a sensitive young man who knew the names of homeless people on his street and loved discussing politics with his father. Myrna Cardin said they thought he might run for Baltimore City Council some day. One night in March 1998, Michael, 30, killed himself in his apartment. He had recently passed the state bar exam and was volunteering with lower-income residents.

Friends said Michael's death devastated his parents, but Ben didn't display his grief publicly. "They're not the kind of people who need to go to grief counseling," said Rabbi Mitchell Wohlberg of Beth Tfiloh Congregation in Baltimore, who officiated at Michael's funeral. "They had each other for that."

As for possible feelings of guilt, Wohlberg said: "Theirs wasn't the kind of situation where they had to ask themselves: Where did we go wrong? They knew in their heart of hearts [they] hadn't. Something went wrong with Michael."

Cardin said he was "extremely close" to his son -- they met regularly for lunch or dinner -- but neither he nor anyone else saw warning signs of depression or suicide. In learning more about his son's life after his death, Cardin said, he has come to believe that Michael "made a judgment, a wrong judgment, about a circumstance." He declined to elaborate, saying only that the "circumstance" is "not really relevant because it wasn't really major."

Though Myrna teared up on mention of Michael, Cardin broke into a wide, somewhat forced-looking smile.

"It's not a sad thing," Ben Cardin said. "Michael is a happy part of my life. He was an incredible person. . . . He was totally convinced he could change the world one person at a time. He'd go out of his way to find problems so he could help people."

Cardin said later: "You don't lose someone without changing. It's hard to describe how, but it changes your perspective. It's like my father said: You don't lose any opportunities in life."

Whether Cardin can seize the next opportunity -- a lesson born of faith, passed between fathers and sons -- is up to voters.

Michael Steele For U.S. Senate (WT)

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

The major-party nominees for U.S. Senate from Maryland are a study in contrasts: Rep. Ben Cardin, a veteran of 10 terms in the U.S. House and nearly 40 years in Maryland politics, from a wealthy, powerful Baltimore family. He is very much a quiet, cerebral liberal in the mold of retiring Sen. Paul Sarbanes, who held the seat for 30 years. By contrast, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, who we enthusiastically endorse for the Senate today, is anything but a conventional politician. As Mr. Steele himself told editors and reporters the other day, "I don't look at this race through conventional glasses."

Indeed, Mr. Steele's openness to new ideas offers a refreshing contrast from the sort of orthodox liberalism represented by Mr. Cardin. And Mr. Steele, the first black candidate elected statewide in Maryland in modern times, offers a compelling personal success story that is in many ways the embodiment of the American Dream.

His mother is a sharecropper's daughter who worked in South Carolina tobacco fields before coming to Washington and working at minimum-wage jobs for nearly half a century. His stepfather was a limousine driver. Mr. Steele, a Roman Catholic born in Prince George's County and reared in Washington, prepared for the priesthood but ultimately chose a career in law. He's even worked with such well-known Washington politicians as Democrats Joe Yeldell and John Ray (a Democrat we once endorsed for mayor).

Cutting your conservative teeth in a blue city and then moving to a blue state and rising to prominence is no small task. Seeing where Mr. Steele stands on key issues explains why he draws support from Republicans and Democrats. In fact, such a briefing proves why his opponent's campaign ads mistakenly try to pass Mr. Steele off as a Republican ideologue, which he isn't, who sees everything through Bush-colored lenses, which he doesn't.

Mr. Steele is staunchly pro-life (parting with many Republicans who support abortion in cases of rape and incest), and he is a free trader. He supports welfare reform and wants to come to Washington to push for policies so low-income Americans can get a pathway to wealth, primarily through homeownership. And while he stands for law and order, his compassionate conservatism calls for rehabilitating some drug offenders and he doesn't stand firmly on the death penalty, either. Mr. Steele also supports tax cuts and welfare reform.

DOJ_NMG_0085996

One of the issues Mr. Steele talks breathlessly and compassionately about is education. He has reservations about President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act, and can sound as frustrated as any schoolteacher who feels his hands are tied by the bureaucracy.

Involved in Maryland politics since the late 1980s, Mr. Steele became a political David battling big-government Goliaths. For example, as chairman of the Prince George's County Republican Party (Democrats outnumber Republicans in the county by nearly 5-1), he successfully mobilized opposition to a 1996 initiative pushed by county Democrats that would have raised property taxes. The result was a crushing defeat for then-County Executive Wayne Curry, whose effort to lift the cap was defeated by a landslide.

After the 2000 election, Mr. Steele became chairman of the state Republican Party, where he put together a 10-year plan to expand the party and elect more Republicans. His plan helped the state GOP score a major success four years ago, when voters elected Robert Ehrlich as governor and Mr. Steele as lieutenant governor. (No doubt Mr. Steele's statewide success encouraged Kweisi Mfume to run statewide, too.)

As lieutenant governor, Mr. Steele's responsibilities included chairing commissions responsible for enhancing opportunities for minority-owned businesses and improving education in the state. The education panel's recommendations, released last year, include plans for strengthening the state's charter school law and encouraging greater parental responsibility in education -- two things which Mr. Steele believes deeply in and will fight for in the Senate. Judging from Mr. Cardin's record, we fully expect that if elected the Baltimore Democrat would join Sens. Ted Kennedy and Barbara Mikulski in trying to water down any efforts to expand educational choice.

Obviously, the Cardin camp has Michael Steele on its mind: While still airing the Steele-is-a-Bush-man ads, Mr. Cardin is cynically attempting to exploit patients of Parkinson's disease by airing television commercials featuring actor Michael J. Fox, his body clearly ravaged by the disease. The ad urges a vote for Mr. Cardin because he supports open-ended public funding of embryonic stem-cell research. Mr. Steele supports adult stem-cell research. The commercial is a cheap shot on Mr. Cardin's part because it omits the inconvenient fact that it is hardly clear from the medical evidence that embryonic stem-cell research offers a cure.

Mr. Steele is a nontraditional candidate who has brought a different style of campaigning to an old-school blue state, and there are no gray areas when he stands on issues. The Washington Times is pleased to endorse Michael Steele for the U.S. Senate.

Report Warns Of Potential Voting Problems In 10 States (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Two weeks before the midterm elections, at least 10 states, including Maryland, remain ripe for voting problems, according to a study released yesterday by a nonpartisan clearinghouse that tracks electoral reforms across the United States.

The report by Electionline.org says those states, and possibly others, could encounter trouble on Election Day because they have a combustible mix of fledgling voting-machine technology, confusion over voting procedures or recent litigation over election rules -- and close races.

The report cautions that the Nov. 7 elections, which will determine which political party controls the House and Senate, promise "to bring more of what voters have come to expect since the 2000 elections -- a divided body politic, an election system in flux and the possibility -- if not certainty -- of problems at polls nationwide."

In a state-by-state canvass, the 75-page report singles out places, such as Indiana and Arizona, where courts have upheld stringent new laws requiring voters to show poll workers specific forms of identification. It cites states such as Ohio and Pennsylvania, which have switched to electronic voting machines whose accuracy has been challenged. And it points to states such as Colorado and Washington, which have departed from the tradition of polling sites in neighborhood precincts.

DOJ_NMG_0085997

The report of the clearinghouse, sponsored by the Pew Charitable Trusts, is the latest of several warnings in recent weeks and months by organizations and scholars who say that electoral problems persist in spite of six years of efforts by the federal government and states to correct voting flaws. The flaws gripped the public's attention after the close 2000 presidential election, which led to recounts in Florida and the intervention of the Supreme Court.

The election shambles of 2000 prompted Congress to pass in 2002 legislation intended to help states make significant election changes, such as by replacing outdated voting equipment. Some of the changes, including making sure that databases of registered voters are accurate, were required to be in effect by this year.

Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, said "things are getting better over time." But he said many of the changes in recent years have led to new problems and disputes. For instance, the decisions by many states to convert to electronic voting machines have yielded new concerns about whether they are secure and accurate, about paper records as backup proof and -- this year -- about whether the electronic or paper record should be considered the official tally if a candidate demands a recount.

The report cites Maryland for what it calls a "dismal primary" in September that "included human and machine failures galore," in part because Montgomery County election officials forgot to distribute to polling places the access cards needed for its electronic machines to work. The study raises questions about whether Montgomery officials are prepared for the bigger crowds in the general election and whether large numbers of mistrustful voters will resort to absentee ballots.

Some GOP Lobby Shops Hold Fast As Nov. 7 Looms (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron And Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 25, 2006

Seasoned Democrats may be in high demand as lobbying outfits and businesses prepare for a possible Democratic takeover of at least one chamber in November, but some top all-Republican firms are not clamoring to hire them.

Despite a growing sense of urgency in recent months to bring well-positioned Democrats to lobby shops, company government-relations offices and trade associations, several all-GOP and GOP-leaning lobby firms said that they are doing nothing to prepare for a change of congressional power.

“We are a Republican firm and our business model is to provide excellent service for our clients on the Republican side, without engaging in any hypothetical about the elections,” said Mark Isakowitz, president of Fierce, Isakowitz & Blalock. “Being a Republican firm is part of who we are.”

Isakowitz said clients rely on the firm’s ability to provide GOP strategy and expertise. Clients use Democratic lobbyists to work the other side. “That basic dynamic is working,” he said.

Remaining Republican during a tight election demonstrates loyalty, said several GOP lobbyists. “We have an election in a couple of weeks and we are part of the [GOP] team,” said Isakowitz.

Jim Pitts, one of the founding principals of DC Navigators, is on the same page. Pitts acknowledged that his pitch would be a lot easier from a business perspective if Republicans stay in power.

He does not anticipate losing clients, but says the company will have to be more deliberate in how it grows its business in 2007 and 2008. Pitts expressed concern that a change in leadership could affect the firm’s growth potential.

“So far, none of our clients have expressed a need for us to go out and hire a Democrat,” Pitts said. “Most of our clients are very happy with the work that we have done for them. We have already had some re-sign for the new fiscal year.”

While DC Navigators is not hiring any Democrats, the firm has forged and plans to strengthen strategic relationships with Democratic lobbyists and consultants.

According to Pitts, DC Navigators has been working with Jonathan Sallet at the Glover Park Group, Michael Lewan at Brown Rudnick and Vin Roberti of Roberti Associates and VAR II, LLC, a strategist active in the Democratic Party.

DC Navigators is busy on the campaign trail working with prospective GOP presidential candidates, such as Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), as well as Joe Negron, the GOP hopeful running for the seat left vacant by Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

DOJ_NMG_0085998

"We do not want to make [Democratic employees] uncomfortable when we talk about lobbying and then do something to help so-and-so Republican get elected," Pitts said. "We have had some talks with Democrats about joining the firm but the fit for them was not right, or for us, partly because of the electoral issues."

A flip to Democratic control next year could even provide at least one staunchly Republican firm with a competitive advantage.

While former Attorney General John Ashcroft has been campaigning for Republican candidates and is "certainly not ready to concede that we're going to lose either house," the Ashcroft Group has contemplated what next year might bring, said Juleanna Glover Weiss, a senior advisor at the firm.

"We do anticipate that Capitol Hill will be subpoena central" under Democratic control, she said. Ashcroft's experience as a senator and as the highest-ranking prosecutor in the country would make his firm valuable to any client being hauled before a congressional committee, Glover Weiss said.

Republican-leaning lobbying shops, or clients that have favored GOP representation, would have been smart to begin strategizing for a Democratic Congress months ago, one Republican lobbyist said. "If you wanted to do something, you should have started before now," the lobbyist remarked.

For example, the once all-GOP Federalist Group hired several prominent Democrats this year, including former Rep. Chris John (La.).

But even some firms that have few or no ties to Democratic lawmakers can expect to continue to flourish, particularly if they have close relationships to Republican committee leaders, as opposed to the leaders of the chambers, the Republican lobbyist said.

Mike Dyer, a Republican and a senior principal at Blank Rome Government Relations, said that firm has not made any preparations or plans for a Democratic Congress, but it is looking to recruit new lobbyists as the winners and losers on the Hill shake out in the coming months.

Dyer emphasized that Blank Rome has striven to be a bipartisan firm, "even if we may be perceived from the outside" as Republican. Dyer noted that the firm has brought in veteran Democratic lobbyists such as Peter Peyser and Heather Podesta.

But Blank Rome is expecting its clients' needs to change under a Democratic Congress, Dyer said. The firm's work would shift from offense to defense, or vice versa, depending on the client, he said.

"The workload might shift from one client to another," Dyer said. Still, he predicted, "End of the day, we're still as busy as we were [this] year."

Smart corporations and other interests maintain a steady engagement with both sides, Dyer said.

The lobbying firms that are the most vulnerable to a change in party control are those that have made their links to the House GOP leadership and the Bush administration their chief selling point, several Republican lobbyists commented.

Republican lobbyists repeatedly cited the now-defunct Alexander Strategy Group, which boasted close ties to ex-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) as an example of the type of firm that would have reasons to be nervous about a Democratic majority.

Compared to the first years of the Bush administration, recently there has been a "very clear trend" to ensure that law firms, lobby shops and government-relations offices have a much more bipartisan representation, said Peter Metzger, the vice chairman of Christian & Timber, an executive-search firm.

Since this spring there has been a great sense of urgency to hire Democrats, said Beth Solomon, director of Christian & Timber's Washington, D.C. office. Many firms are trying to poach experienced Democrats from other firms, she said.

"There is an advantage in bringing in someone who already has the clients and understands the business," she said. "Their price tag has gone up significantly."

But lobby shops may have a harder time, at least in the first year of a Democratic Congress, plucking high-profile staffers. After so many years in the minority, many staffers would want to stay to see Democratic policies put into place.

Several GOP lobbyists pointed out that another election is just two years away.

DOJ_NMG_0085999

A winning presidential candidate from either party could sweep congressional candidates along with them, Blank Rome's Dyer said. A strong GOP presidential candidate also could help his or her party reclaim House seats that might be lost this year in historically Republican districts.

For Governor In Maryland (WP)

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

WHEN HE RAN for governor of Maryland four years ago, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s claim to the job seemed to rest on little more than a sense of entitlement and a telegenic, genial personality. In fits and starts, though, he has grown in the role to become a generally proficient, pragmatic governor, if not always a disciplined or mature one. He has chalked up successes on transportation, the environment and education, among other things. For Mr. Ehrlich, the state's first Republican governor in a generation, those are real achievements -- particularly when weighed against the monolith of Democratic dominance in the state legislature. His opponent in the gubernatorial race, Democrat Martin O'Malley, is a smart, adroit politician who has compiled a creditable record as mayor of Baltimore for the past seven years, but he has not made a compelling case for toppling the incumbent. Our choice is Mr. Ehrlich.

No doubt Mr. Ehrlich has had the good fortune to govern during good times. Having inherited a crushing deficit upon taking office in 2003, he benefited over the next three years from a muscular national economy that lifted Maryland, as it did most states, and pumped up the public coffers in Annapolis. Still, Mr. Ehrlich helped his own cause by raising funds through higher taxes and fees, breaking with his party's knee-jerk anti-tax orthodoxy and using the proceeds constructively. Despite having squandered time, energy and political capital in pushing fruitlessly to expand state-sanctioned gambling in Maryland, the governor did manage a number of victories.

Mr. Ehrlich was able to revive, accelerate and push through approval of a highway to connect interstates 270 and 95 north of the District, which would be the first major road to be built in the Maryland suburbs in years and one that is badly needed. Though it had been on the state's drawing board for decades, the intercounty connector was a dead letter when Mr. Ehrlich took office. On the environment, Mr. Ehrlich rightly claims authorship of the "flush tax" bill, under which households pay a $30 annual fee to finance upgrades in sewage plants that pollute the Chesapeake Bay; it represents an important step toward cleaning the state's waterways.

On education, Mr. Ehrlich pushed through a law to allow charter schools in Maryland, providing more options for parents and students despite the opposition of some local school boards. We have also noted Mr. Ehrlich's courage in issuing more pardons and commutations for convicted criminals than his two predecessors together managed in 16 years in office. In an era when most governors are more preoccupied with punishment and establishing their bona fides as tough guys, Mr. Ehrlich's practice of dispensing mercy is exemplary.

There have been disappointments and dithering during Mr. Ehrlich's term as well, mostly of his own making. Relishing battle and cherishing his status as a besieged underdog, he picked fights needlessly, as in the childish blacklisting of two journalists from the Baltimore Sun. Likewise, his tiresome quarrels with the leaders of the General Assembly look more like clashes of puffed-up egos than hard legislative bargaining. Mr. Ehrlich could be a more effective governor if he applied himself more to the mechanics of governing and less to the skewering of his enemies on talk radio.

Mr. O'Malley, who has run a carefully scripted campaign for governor, has put his plentiful ambition to good use in one of the toughest big-city mayor's jobs in the nation. He made progress in stanching Baltimore's outflow of population, reviving some of its more blighted neighborhoods, reducing its level of violent crime, and adapting corporate methods of efficiency and accountability to the functions of government. Mr. O'Malley did not solve the problems of rampant crime and rough schools in Baltimore, but he put a dent in them.

As a candidate, however, Mr. O'Malley, nursing a lead, has been cautious, at times excessively so. He has balked at grappling with the tough budgetary choices he would be likely to face as state spending soars for education and health care. He favors slot-machine gambling, though only at racetracks, and so presents little advantage on that score. He has remained Baltimore-centric, offering little of substance about the Washington area's problems, especially its choked roads and transit systems. While it is easy to admire Mr. O'Malley's fluency as a public speaker and his winning ways on the stump, his campaign is seen by some of his own allies as insular -- a worrisome trait in a governor.

DOJ_NMG_0086000

More worrisome yet is the fact that an O'Malley victory would herald a return to the brand of one-party Democratic rule that has served the state poorly in the past. Mr. Ehrlich, for all his faults, has shaken up the old guard in Maryland politics -- while appointing plenty of Democrats to his cabinet and judgeships. If he were wise, he would use a second term to start anew with the legislature and build on his record of achievement.

U.S. Muslims Mostly Democrats (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

America's Muslim voters are a young, highly educated and prosperous voting bloc that will overwhelmingly back Democrats in November, according to a survey released yesterday by the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

They are also coming of age in terms of political representation. Next month, Democratic nominee Keith Ellison of Minneapolis is poised to become the first Muslim member of the House of Representatives. He says, if elected, he will take his oath of office with his hand on the Koran instead of the Bible.

"After September 11, neither political party wanted anything to do with Muslims," said Mohamed Nimer, research director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR). "Now they're receptive to Muslim candidates."

With their large families and socially conservative leanings, Muslims mirror the GOP's demographic profile. Seventy-eight percent of those interviewed were married. Of those respondents, 83 percent had at least one child and 54 percent reported two or three children. Muslims had an average of 4.5 members per family, contrasted with a 2005 Census Bureau figure estimating the number of family members in an average American household at 3.14.

But ideologically, their differences with Republicans are vast. Sixty-six percent favor normalization of relations with Iran, 55 percent are afraid the "war on terror" has morphed into a war on Islam, just 12 percent think the war in Iraq is worthwhile and only 10 percent support the use of the military to spread democracy.

The survey, conducted in August by Genesis Research Associates of Descanso, Calif., polled 1,000 American Muslims; 687 men and 313 women in 42 states. It has a margin of error of 3 percentage points. CAIR said the sex disparity is the result of men being more willing to participate.

The survey showed a voter bloc concentrated in 12 states with the most (20 percent) living in California. Seventy percent of the respondents were born overseas. Of those, 40 percent are from the Middle East; 33 percent from Pakistan, India or Bangladesh; 6 percent from Africa; 5 percent from Iran; and 3 percent from Europe. The rest either refused to name a country or named another part of the globe.

Forty-two percent of those polled said they were Democrats, 17 percent were Republicans and the rest either belonged to another party, no party or refused to answer.

The Democratic National Committee is aware of Muslim interest, a spokeswoman said yesterday, and has hired a part-time Muslim staffer, Hiam Nawas, to focus on soliciting their votes.

Birthplace was a factor on whether the "war on terror" is perceived as a war on Islam. Sixty percent of the foreign-born voters agreed with that statement, compared with 47 percent of those born in this country. Thirty-five percent of American-born Muslims disagreed with that statement.

"If you are born overseas, you'd tend to feel the impact of American policies more strongly because of your overseas experience," Mr. Nimer said. "Your sense of grievance is stronger."

When asked their denominational affiliation, 40 percent said they were "just a Muslim," 36 percent said they were Sunni and 12 percent were Shi'ites. The rest belonged to other branches of Islam.

Muslim voters are younger than the average American. Nearly 80 percent of Muslims are younger than 55, compared with 65 percent of the general public. The survey found 62 percent of the respondents possessing at least a college degree; 16 percent own their own business; 9 percent are engineers; 6 percent are professors or teachers; and 4 percent are doctors or dentists.

DOJ_NMG_0086001

Cheney Says Clinton Could Win Presidency (AP)

The Associated Press, October 25, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney said Tuesday he thinks Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton could win the presidency. He said Sen. Barack Obama might be viewed by voters as too inexperienced.

Cheney handicapped the Democratic field of potential candidates in an interview with conservative talk show host Sean Hannity.

"I think Hillary Clinton is a formidable candidate," Cheney said. "I think she could win. I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

Cheney said Obama, an Illinois Democrat, was an "attractive guy. Don't know him well, met him a few times. I think at this stage, my initial take on him was he's been two years as a senator. I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in. But certainly, he's an attractive candidate. If he decides to run, he'll be a player on the Democratic side."

Obama said Sunday he was considering a run for president in 2008, backing off previous statements that he would not do so.

As for himself, Cheney said he would not budge from his oft-stated decision that he will not run for president. "It's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable," the vice president said. "I don't know how else I can say it. If nominated, I will not run; if elected, I will not serve."

Cheney also said he was optimistic about Republican hopes in the Nov. 7 elections.

"I think we'll hold both the House and the Senate." Last week, Cheney raised eyebrows when he sounded less sure about GOP prospects. "I think we'll hold the Senate and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House," he told Rush Limbaugh.

Karl Rove, President Bush's chief political strategist, dismissed national polls and argued that based on individual polls Republicans will hold onto the House and Senate. He made the comments in an interview with NPR's "All Things Considered."

"I think Iraq and the economy play a role in virtually every race. But there are also local considerations in the local contest between two individuals that at the end of the day matters for great deal of the contest," Rove said.

Cheney: Sen. Clinton Is 'formidable Candidate' (USAT)

USA Today, October 25, 2006

Vice President Cheney said he believes Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., could win the presidency but that Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., might be viewed by voters as too inexperienced. Cheney assessed potential Democratic candidates in an interview with conservative talk show host Sean Hannity.

"I think Hillary Clinton is a formidable candidate," Cheney told Hannity.

"I think she could win. I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

Obama said Sunday that he is considering a presidential run in 2008; Clinton also has said she might run.

Cheney said he would not budge from his oft-stated decision that he will not run for president. "It's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable," Cheney said. "I don't know how else I can say it. If nominated, I will not run; if elected, I will not serve."

Senate candidate's name a tight squeeze

Senate candidate Jim Webb's last name has been cut off on part of the electronic ballot in three Virginia cities because of a computer glitch that also affects other candidates with long names, election officials said. The Democrat's full name, James H. "Jim" Webb, appears where voters choose a candidate. The error shows up on the summary page in Alexandria, Falls Church and Charlottesville, where voters are asked to review their selections before hitting the button to record their votes. Webb's opponent, Sen. George Allen, didn't emerge unscathed — his party affiliation is cut off. Jean Jensen, secretary of the Virginia State Board of Elections, pledged to have the issue fixed — in time for the 2007 state elections.

Newt Gingrich plugs Blackwell in Ohio

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich, campaigning for Ohio Republican Ken Blackwell, said Tuesday that the gubernatorial candidate's commitment to lower taxes will create jobs to help the state's struggling economy. Gingrich said

DOJ_NMG_0086002

Blackwell has a “passion for lower taxes” and that Democrat Ted Strickland has a “record of consistently voting for tax increases.”

Strickland campaign spokesman Keith Dailey said Strickland voted to cut taxes 81 times as a member of Congress. “The only thing consistent about that rhetoric is its inconsistency with the truth,” Dailey said.

Gingrich was an architect of the Contract with America and led a resounding GOP victory in 1994.

Cubin apologizes to disabled opponent

Rep. Barbara Cubin, R-Wyo., issued a public apology for a comment she made to a disabled candidate following a testy debate. “In retrospect, I was wrong in what I said, and I apologize,” Cubin said. Libertarian Thomas Rankin, who has multiple sclerosis and uses an electric wheelchair, said that after the debate Sunday night Cubin “walked over to me and said, ‘If you weren't sitting in that chair, I'd slap you across the face.' ” Cubin said she went over to Rankin, challenged his debate assertions and remarked that “if you had said that to anyone else, they probably would have smacked you.” Cubin is in a tight race for a seventh term against Democrat Gary Trauner.

Swann challenges ‘gray lives' comment

Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate Lynn Swann's campaign demanded an apology from Gov. Ed Rendell for saying that slot-machine gambling brings “brightness and cheer” into the “gray lives” of senior citizens.

“Diminishing the value and the lives of our senior citizens is offensive,” said Leonardo Alcivar, spokesman for Swann, the GOP nominee. Rendell, a Democrat, was defending the legalization of slot machines in Pennsylvania. “These are people who lead very gray lives. … There's not a whole lot of good things that happen in their month,” Rendell said of seniors who bus from Philadelphia to casinos in Atlantic City. “But if you put them on the bus, they're excited. They're happy. They have fun. They see bright lights. They hear music. They pull that slot machine and with each pull they think they have a chance to win.”

Rendell campaign spokesman Dan Fee said Rendell meant that some seniors will play slot machines for entertainment and does not intend to apologize.

Seniors are focus of Rhode Island debate

Democratic challenger Charles Fogarty blamed Republican Rhode Island Gov. Don Carcieri's administration for inadequately inspecting nursing homes, while Carcieri accused Democrats of failing to curb local property taxes for people on fixed incomes. The debate took place during a forum on elderly issues.

Nursing home care became a statewide political issue in 2004 when 87-year-old Germaine Morsilli died after being moved from a nursing home bed where she sometimes lay in her own waste, state inspectors reported. A manager and owner who ran that nursing home were convicted of stealing from the facility and two others. After her death, Fogarty, who is the state's lieutenant governor, and Carcieri pushed legislation tightening nursing home regulations.

Federal judge OKs exit polling in Florida

A federal judge in Miami threw out a Florida law that prohibits exit polling within 100 feet of a voting place, finding there was no evidence the surveys were disruptive or threatened access to voting. Judge Paul Huck said Florida's law was unconstitutional and ordered state officials not to enforce it Nov. 7.

Cheney Says Clinton Could Win Presidency (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney took a look Tuesday at the field of potential Democratic presidential candidates and said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton could be the next president. He also suggested a preference for Sen. Joe Lieberman in the race for the U.S. Senate in Connecticut.

And the vice president, famous for having declared in 2005 that the insurgency in Iraq was in its "last throes," acknowledged that the violence had not ended. Speaking with Juan Williams in a National Public Radio interview, Cheney said that with the political process in motion in Iraq, he would have expected "a lower level of violence than we're seeing today."

Cheney made the comments on the Democratic political scene in an interview with Fox News Channel's Sean Hannity. Cheney said that the former first lady "is a formidable candidate."

DOJ_NMG_0086003

"I think she could win," the vice president said, adding: "I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

He said that Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who on Sunday opened the door to running for the Democratic nomination, is an "attractive guy."

"Don't know him well, met him a few times," Cheney said, in his characteristic staccato speech. Obama was elected in 2004, and the vice president said "people might want a little more experience than that," but if he runs, "he'll be a player on the Democratic side."

Lieberman, who ran for the vice presidency in 2000, has built up a lead as an independent candidate after losing the Democratic primary election in August to Ned Lamont, who made the senator's support for the Iraq war the central issue in the campaign.

Asked whether he was backing Lieberman, whom Cheney presented as "a big supporter of the global war on terror," the vice president said he was reluctant to answer, but tipped his hand nonetheless.

"I don't want to harm Joe's chances or prospects," he said, "so I haven't said anything about his election."

As for his own position, he acknowledged the dark view critics take of him as, in his words, "the Darth Vader of the administration," and he also said, for the hundredth — or was it the thousandth? — time that he would not run for president.

"It's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable," he said.

Casting For West Wing (LAT)

By Tina Daunt

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Just the hint of a possible presidential run by U.S. Sen. Barack Obama — who is in town Friday to promote his book "The Audacity of Hope" — has Hollywood Democrats talking.

The e-mail from actor George Clooney arrived at 1:46 a.m. Pacific time (he's in Europe at the moment).

The subject: Illinois Democrat Obama.

"If SENATOR Obama became PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE Obama it would be the most electrifying thing to happen to the Democratic party since Kennedy," Clooney wrote.

Media mogul Haim Saban, however, was less impressed by Obama's disclosure this week that he's thinking about running for president in 2008. Saban is already electrified by another possible Democratic candidate: Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

"Only Hillary," Saban said, via BlackBerry message. "I hope she does announce soon so we can all go to work all out to make sure she wins ... and BIG!!!!!"

The 2006 midterm elections are only two weeks away, but Hollywood is already looking toward 2008 — even though no one has formally joined the race.

"It would be hard for me to pretend that I've not heard some of the talk," Obama said in an interview with The Times. "There's an old joke that every senator is thinking about running for president — all 100 of them."

Obama said that at the moment he's focused on getting Democrats elected on Nov. 7. After that, he'll consider his presidential prospects.

But while he's pondering his options, you can bet that some people in Hollywood are already envisioning his inaugural bash.

Director Rob Reiner compared a possible run by Obama to Abraham Lincoln's victory.

"How poetic would it be that a one-term congressman from the state of Illinois could be elected president and free the slaves," said Reiner, reached on his car phone Monday, "and now a one-term African American senator from that same state could become the next president?"

"Everyone admires him," producer Norman Lear said of the freshman senator. "They are very excited about the possibility that he's in the race. I think the people who are very much with Hillary will remain with Hillary. But the discussion is a good thing for the party."

DOJ_NMG_0086004

Almost anyone who has met Obama will tell you that he's charismatic and warm, but not giddy.

"My wife and I have tried not to get caught up in the hype," Obama said. "We still live in Chicago and I go to the same barbershop.... "

But there's no denying that since he rocked the Democratic National Convention in 2004 with an impassioned speech about America, his life has changed. For one, he became an instant political star.

His first book, "Dreams From My Father," released shortly after the 2004 convention, shot to the top of bestseller lists. His new missive promises to be equally as successful. Last week, he was in 15 cities promoting his book and raising money for the Democrats.

On Friday, he will be in Los Angeles to discuss the book at the Urban Issues Breakfast Forum of Greater L.A. and the California African American Museum.

Later that evening, he will attend a fundraiser for the state Democratic Party with gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides.

"This is an important election," Obama said. "The Democrats will win the House and we could win the Senate."

As he travels, Obama said, he finds that people — regardless of their party affiliations — have similar anxieties. "They're worried about whether they have enough healthcare for their kids, what's happening with the global economy. People have the same hopes and dreams. There's a stubborn self-reliance and optimism in the American people.... And I think people are in a serious mood."

Obama says he appreciates the supports he's been shown by Hollywood Democrats. (Obama, who was born in Hawaii to an American mother and a Kenyan father, counts Clooney and Bono as friends.)

"There are some celebrities who have really done their homework and know what they are talking about and are terrific advocates for justice and peace and opportunity around the world," he said. "I want all citizens to get involved. Whether they are the secretary in an office building or a movie star, I think the more engaged and interested people are, the better off we all are."

The column explores the intersection of celebrity and politics. Tips and comments can be e-mailed to tina.daunt@latimes.com.

When It Comes To Politics, Charlie Cook Has The Prophecy Market Cornered (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

The pharaoh had Joseph. The Greeks had the Oracle at Delphi. Washington has Charlie Cook.

Please tell us, Seer of Future Congresses, how many seats the Democrats will pick up in the House on Election Day.

"Twenty to 35," Cook answers.

And how about in the Senate, OProphet on the Potomac?

"At least four," the man with the crystal ball says. "Most likely five or six."

What fate does the seer see for Sen. George Allen (R-Va.)?

"He wins ugly, but he wins," Cook divines.

And, pray tell, how are the planets aligning for Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.)?

"Gone," he decrees.

The midterm elections are two weeks away, but the powerful cannot wait that long to learn of the outcome. And so they call in Cook, who, for a fee of $5,000 to $20,000, gives his audiences the (very) early returns.

Last week he spoke to pharmaceutical and insurance groups. On Monday, he flew to Las Vegas and back to talk to the American Beverage Association. Later this week it's American Express and a hedge fund in New York and the paper industry in Georgia. Yesterday found Cook at a breakfast with the DLA Piper law firm, lunch with automobile manufacturers and dinner in Boston with a corporate housing group.

All are looking for the same thing: next month's election returns. And Cook has them. "Senators Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio are pretty much done," he told the Piper audience at the Willard hotel. And the lifelines of Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) aren't looking any longer. "I'd be surprised if any of those four can survive," Cook informed the crowd of lobbyists, diplomats and journalists.

DOJ_NMG_0086005

The firm's representatives treated their visiting sage with great deference. James Blanchard, a former Michigan governor, introduced him as "a renowned expert." Former defense secretary Bill Cohen read Cook's credentials to the audience: "one of the best political handicappers . . . the Picasso of election analysis."

"He's hot," observed Rosemary Freeman, one of the event coordinators.

That's not the first description that comes to mind for Cook, who entered the ballroom lugging an overstuffed canvas bag, a torn, padded envelope and an overflowing blue file folder. Chubby and partial to big eyeglasses, he had the tail of his tie tucked into his shirt. He planted his Starbucks venti caffe latte on the head table, where he was joined by the Canadian ambassador and a former NATO secretary general.

Cook's well-rehearsed speech includes a reference to his posterior, an allusion to the movie "Young Frankenstein," and a tortured metaphor involving storms and levees to compare the 2006 election to the one in 1994. "The wave is bigger, but there are fewer structures on the beach," he forecast.

Cook is not the boldest of election prognosticators (that honor goes to Stuart Rothenberg), nor the most telegenic (washingtonpost.com's Chris Cillizza gets the nod there), but he is surely the most prominent. On contract with NBC, he was on "Meet the Press" on Sunday and taped segments for the "Today Show" and "NBC Nightly News." He commissions his own poll, and his column appears once a week in the National Journal. A Nexis search finds 873 mentions in the past 60 days for him and his company, the Cook Political Report.

And while he's not always on the mark (he admits to having "tread marks on my forehead" after understating the Republican gains in '94) he's close enough that nobody challenges his forecasts. "I'm not as much of an expert as he is, so I have to defer to him," said Dick Gephardt, a former House Democratic leader, after Cook's talk to the Piper firm.

Fortified by another venti caffe latte and a double espresso shot with cream, Cook took a cab to NBC's studio for a hit with anchor Joe Scarborough. While he was in the makeup room, a reporter from the Columbus Dispatch begged him to talk about Ohio's Senate candidates. After his on-air comments, he slipped into "Hardball" producer Tammy Haddad's office to give the staff an update on Senate races in Tennessee (trending Republican) and New Jersey (trending Democratic). "Hardball" host Chris Matthews stopped Cook on the way out to inquire about three Pennsylvania House races.

A quick cab ride got Cook to the Cannon office building just in time for his luncheon speech to the automobile group. Posters showing a plate and fork advertised "Lunch with Cook." The group's chief, Fred Webber, gave the intro: "To give us a sneak peek of what's going to happen on Election Day, no one -- no one -- is better than Charlie Cook."

Cook gave the same speech about Frankenstein and hurricanes, then offered some presidential prognostication for dessert. "I would give McCain a 60, 65 percent chance of winning the Republican nomination," he disclosed. By contrast, he added, "I'll win the Tour de France before Rudy Giuliani wins the Republican nomination."

The oracle hopped into a waiting sedan to catch his flight to Boston. The car ride gave him the first chance in hours to check his BlackBerry -- and to make some last-minute revisions to his prophecies. "Montana closing more than thought," he typed in an e-mail to a reporter. "Burns might not be dead yet."

Tuition Outpaces Inflation (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 — Tuition and other costs at public and private universities rose faster than inflation this year, the College Board said in a report released Tuesday. But the increases were more measured than in recent years.

In the report, the board also found that in the past five years, tuition and fees at public institutions rose more than at any other time in the past 30, increasing by 35 percent to $5,836 this academic year. Tuition and fees at private four-year colleges increased by 11 percent over the same period, though the average price of attending a private institution is $22,218.

“Neither student aid funds nor family incomes are keeping pace with college prices,” Gaston Caperton, president of the board, said at a news conference. “This is a serious problem that must be addressed.”

DOJ_NMG_0086006

The tuition and fees figures in the report are the so-called sticker prices, which do not reflect discounts students receive in the form of grant aid and tax benefits. Such aid reached about $9,000 at private four-year institutions, $3,100 at public ones and $2,200 at two-year institutions, the report said.

Although many students do not pay the sticker price, the cost of attending public and private universities has consistently outstripped the rate of inflation. Last year, the Consumer Price Index, a standard measure of changes in the cost of goods and services, rose by 3.4 percent. Tuition, fees, room and board have increased this year by more than 5.5 percent at both public and private four-year institutions.

The price increases at public universities are largely the result of declining federal and state support, the report said.

Margaret Spellings, secretary of education, said in a statement that the report "underscores the need to make colleges and universities more accountable for results and at the same time increase need-based aid."

Because of cost increases, students and their families are increasingly turning to loans. Private loans, which are not guaranteed by the federal government, generally have less favorable terms than federal loans, but are the fastest-growing option for financing higher education. Last year they totaled more than $17 billion.

At the same time, the average Pell grant, the federal government's grant to the neediest students, declined last year for the first time in 10 years, falling to $2,354 a year. Sandy Baum, senior policy analyst at the College Board and a professor of economics at Skidmore College in New York, said the decline resulted from a change in the formula for calculating Pell grant awards.

"Grant aid has failed to keep pace with the posted tuition charges," Robert Shireman, executive director of the Project on Student Debt, which is financed primarily by the Pew Charitable Trusts, said in a statement in response to the College Board report. "Income for most American families has stagnated, leaving students and their parents with little choice but to turn to loans."

The College Board report, which is compiled annually, drew on a survey of 2,677 public and private nonprofit institutions, as well as data from government agencies and other organizations, like the National Association of State Student Grant and Aid Programs. The survey was sent out in October 2005, and collected by August this year.

In the current academic year, the average cost of tuition, fees, and room and board at public four-year universities, attended by about 35 percent of undergraduates, was $12,796, up 5.6 percent from $12,115 last year, according to the report. At private four-year colleges and universities, attended by 16 percent of undergraduates, those costs were far greater: $30,367, up 5.7 percent from last year.

There are not enough data to measure room and board costs at two-year public institutions, attended by 41 percent of undergraduates, but tuition and fees rose 4.2 percent to $2,272, up from $2,182 last year.

Asked to predict future changes in tuition, Ms. Baum told reporters, "We predict that it will go up, not down."

Spikes In College Price Tags Not So Sharp (WP)

By Jay Mathews

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Amid partisan finger-pointing over soaring college costs, a national report offered some good news yesterday: Average tuition and fees are not rising as fast as they did a few years ago.

The College Board said the increase in tuition and fees at public four-year colleges, although still higher than the national inflation rate, slowed for the third year in a row. Increases at private four-year colleges have also cooled off in recent years, although the average yearly price of attending a private college is $22,218, far more than the state school average of $5,836.

At least two Washington area institutions are emblematic of the trend. At the University of Maryland, in-state tuition and fees for undergraduates were unchanged this year. At George Washington University, the increase was only 3.9 percent, about equal to national inflation. GW spokeswoman Tracy Schario said it was "our lowest increase in more than two decades."

But the smaller increases this year at many colleges were made possible by major price increases earlier in the decade. Middle-class parents have discovered, to the pain of their wallets, that the general inflation rate and the college inflation rate are out of sync. Overall, the College Board reported, state school prices are up 35 percent from five years ago, even after adjusting for inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0086007

This year, average tuition and fees increased 6.3 percent at four-year public colleges and 5.9 percent at four-year private colleges. The annual price for two-year public colleges went up 4.1 percent, to $2,272. The College Board said the national inflation rate for the same period was 3.82 percent.

At the University of Virginia, in-state tuition and fees rose 9.1 percent, to $8,035, and at George Mason University, those costs went up 9 percent, to $6,408. American University's tuition and fees rose 5.7 percent, to $29,673, and Georgetown University's tuition and fees increased about 6 percent.

Kalman A. Chany, author of the Princeton Review book "Paying for College Without Going Broke," said the data show that it remains difficult for families to pay for college, even if this year's increases were not so bad. He said parents and students should consider seeking scholarships and subsidized loans to make sure they do everything possible "to minimize the sticker price."

Leaders of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce gave dueling interpretations of the College Board data. Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon (R-Calif.), the committee chairman, blamed colleges for raising prices whenever Congress increases student aid. Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the committee's ranking member, said Congress should cut college loan interest rates and increase the value of federal Pell Grants for low-income students.

In some states this year, political candidates have accused state officials of letting tuition get too high -- a charge that Democratic gubernatorial challenger and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley has hurled at Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R). The College Board report says that federal grant aid did not keep up with inflation but that total student aid increased 3.7 percent last year even after inflation. Even without factoring in inflation, the report says, the average federal Pell Grant for low-income students fell by $120 per participant.

James A. Boyle, president of the College Parents of America, said: "Unfortunately, schools continue to raise their sticker prices because they can. The demand of college-bound students currently exceeds the supply, as the bulge of the baby boom echo makes its way through American high schools and competes to claim the relatively fixed number of available college seats."

Boyle said that in the next decade, demand will slacken and colleges will have to compete on price. "That is of little comfort to families today, however, whose budgets and levels of patience are being stretched to the breaking point," he said.

The College Board report indicates that few students pay full price for college. On average, full-time students at private four-year institutions receive about $9,000 in aid each year in the form of grants and tax benefits. The aid is about $3,100 a year at public four-year schools and $2,200 at public two-year colleges.

Chany said the College Board data show that families should look out for the possibility that some well-regarded private colleges would cost no more than similarly prestigious out-of-state public universities when all the costs are figured in.

"Average out-of-state tuition and fees at public four-year colleges are 71 percent of average private four-year tuition and fees," the report says. "But adding room and board, the cost of a year for an out-of-state student at a public four-year college is 77 percent of the average tuition, fees, room and board at a private four-year college." Chany said students with good but not great grades in high school might also find more aid available at private than at public schools.

As Tuition Soars, Federal Aid To College Students Falls (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

At a time when employers say that almost every new job in the U.S. will require workers to have more than a high-school education, the chance that students at the bottom of the economic ladder can afford to finish college has taken a turn for the worse.

The College Board's latest annual reports on student aid and college pricing find that over the past five years tuition at public four-year universities has soared by a record-breaking 35% when adjusted for inflation. Meanwhile, spending on Pell Grants -- the biggest source of federal aid for low-income students -- fell for the first time in six years.

DOJ_NMG_0086008

"There is no question that the bulk of the impact of that is falling on lower- and lower-middle-income students," says Donald Heller, a Pennsylvania State University professor who has studied access to higher education. "They are getting killed on the aid side, and they are getting killed on the tuition side."

The number of students from all income levels pursuing post-secondary education continues to grow. But to stay in school, educators say, low-income students are taking loans, using high-interest credit cards to pay tuition, working more hours, and opting for two-year schools.

Low-income students are choosing two-year colleges for financial reasons even though studies show more of them are academically qualified for four-year schools due to efforts by school districts to push them into tougher, college-prep courses. But only 23% of community college students earn a bachelor's degree -- a vital credential in today's workplace -- within six years, as compared with 63% of students at four-year institutions, according to the College Board, a New York-based nonprofit that administers the SAT college admissions test and analyzes higher-education data.

The shrinking Pell Grant funding "doesn't give us the chance to attend college and get the degree we need to get the earnings that we should," says Kennel Etienne, a former Pell recipient from Revere, Mass. Mr. Etienne, 23, has been struggling to earn money to return to college since he dropped out of Mount Ida College, in Newton., Mass., for financial reasons two years ago.

Pell Grants are often used as an index of how accessible higher education is to lower-income students. About $12.7 billion in Pell Grants were awarded for the 2005-2006 academic year, down 3% from $13.1 billion the previous academic year. The average grant per recipient slipped to $2,354 from $2,474. The decline came after the Bush administration rejiggered the eligibility formula: It reduced how much money families in many states were assumed to be paying in state and local taxes, which increased their after-tax incomes and made many ineligible for the grants.

The vast majority of the 5.4 million students receiving Pell Grants come from families earning less than $40,000 a year. Despite much debate in Congress, the value of the maximum Pell Grant, $4,050, hasn't budged in three years even as the price tag for attending a four-year public university has soared. The maximum Pell grant met 33% of the average price of tuition, fees, room and board at a public four-year school in 2005-06, down from 42% in 2001-02.

The increase in tuition and fees at the four-year publics was a relatively moderate 6.3% last year, or 2.4% after adjusting for inflation. But College Board data shows that the overall 35% inflation-adjusted increase since 2001-2002 is the biggest five-year jump since it began gathering such data in the 1970s. It's also more than triple the 11% inflation-adjusted increase at private colleges. Private colleges face many of the same cost increases as their public-sector brethren. Over the past five years, utilities costs for colleges and universities have risen by 72%, according to the College Board, while costs for employee benefits are up 31%.

Neither "student-aid funds nor family incomes are keeping pace with college prices," Gaston Caperton, the College Board president, said yesterday. "This is a serious problem that must be addressed."

About 35% of the nation's 15.2 million undergraduates attend four-year public universities and about 16% go to four-year private schools, according to the College Board. About 41% attend two-year public schools, with most of the rest going to for-profit colleges, such as the University of Phoenix.

The steep tuition increases for public colleges come as many state legislatures, facing growing pressure to fund other priorities such as Medicaid, prisons and primary and secondary education, have reduced in recent years appropriations for higher education on a per-student basis. State and local government appropriations were $5,825 per full-time student in 2004-2005, down from $6,846 per student in 2000-2001 after adjusting for inflation, the College Board said.

To compensate for the pressure on appropriations, four-year publics have raised tuition, making bargains harder to find. At the University of Texas at Austin, once considered one of the sector's best buys, tuition has increased by 47% over the past three years. Meanwhile, at California public universities, where the cost of attending was minimal until the 1990s, tuition and fees have soared by 40% in the past five years, to as much as $7,000 a year at the University of California campuses, the state's most selective schools.

DOJ_NMG_0086009

The College Board reports come amid increasing debate over higher education policies that appear to favor affluent students. Many universities, seeking to boost their standing in the college rankings, have increasingly used their own resources to award merit aid to top-ranking students who have no financial need.

According to one recent study, only 10.8% of undergraduates at 19 leading public and private universities come from families in the bottom 25% of annual income. In recent months, both Harvard and Princeton said they planned to drop early admissions, saying that such programs, which are commonplace among selective colleges, favor the already-advantaged.

At the same time, corporate leaders concerned about the nation's future competitiveness are calling for students from a broader range of backgrounds to attend college. "We think it's critically important," says Arthur Rothkopf, senior vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "We think 90% of the newly created jobs in this country are going to require some post-secondary education."

College Aid Is Up, But Tuitions Are, Too (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — College tuition prices are up, no surprise. And to a lesser extent, so is total student aid.

But federal Pell Grant funding for low-income students declined for the first time in six years, and students borrowed more from private lenders last year than ever before.

Those are just a few of a wide range of findings related to the cost of attending college that were released Tuesday by the College Board, a non-profit whose members include more than 5,000 schools, colleges and education groups.

Published tuition and fee increases continued to slow, the report says:

•Public four-year university prices for in-state students rose 6.3%, to $5,836, vs. 7.1% last year, after two years of double-digit increases.

•Private four-year university prices were up 5.9%, the same rate of increase as last year, to $22,218.

•Public two-year college prices rose 4.1%, to $2,272, down from the 5.4% increase last year.

The report cautions that pricing patterns vary by region and have grown “increasingly complex,” in part because some colleges charge different amounts depending on what year a student enrolled or what they're majoring in.

Also, the average net prices — that is, the amount students pay after financial aid is factored in — are “significantly lower” than published prices, though they are increasing, too. But the report notes that financial aid averages conceal the wide range of aid awards; some students get a full ride, others pay the full amount. And federal tax benefits and a trend toward non-need-based state and institutional aid benefit middle- and upper-income students more than lower-income students, it says.

While private-university prices are on average higher, public four-year universities have struggled most with controlling the amount students end up paying. Their inflation-adjusted tuition increased 35% over the past five years, compared with 11% for private four-year universities. And net price increased even more dramatically at publics — 69% in inflation-adjusted dollars over that period vs. 9% for privates.

Also, students at public universities on average take longer to graduate (6.2 years vs. 5.3 at private universities). That adds to the cost of attending college, both because of additional tuition charges and loss of potential income.

The report also notes that when related expenses are considered, the differences in the costs of attending two-year and four-year public institutions narrow. Published tuition charges at two-year schools represent 39% of the average four-year school, for example. But when room and board, books and supplies, and transportation are included, the cost of attending two-year college ($12,300) is 75% of the cost of attending a four-year public college ($16,400).

Student aid, including state, institutional and federal grants, increased 3.7% to $134.8 billion in 2005-06, compared with 3% the previous year, the report says. But funding for the Pell Grants, the federal government's main need-based aid program, was down from $13.1 billion in 2004-05 to $12.7 billion last year, and the average amount per recipient dropped $120, from $2,474 to $2,354. Last year, the maximum Pell Grant, $4,050, covered 33% of tuition at public four-year institutions; four years ago, it covered 42%.

The decline was no surprise; the report attributes it mostly to a technical change in the formula for eligibility.

DOJ_NMG_0086010

Nevertheless, in light of intensifying concerns about access to college, the drop is “greatly disturbing,” says David Ward, president of the American Council on Education, an umbrella group for colleges and universities.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, though, took colleges to task. “Parents and students must understand why costs are so high and what they are getting for their money,” she said. She also said institutions and states must do more to increase need-based aid.

Rep. Howard McKeon, R-Calif., head of the House education committee, also took a swipe. Noting that federal student aid has nearly doubled in the past decade, he said, “No matter how much student aid rises from one year to the next, an equally dramatic spike in college costs follows.”

Median debt levels of graduating students are “almost certain” to have increased in recent years, the report says, because neither grant aid nor family incomes have kept pace with cost hikes. The median student debt for bachelor's degree recipients in 2003-04, the latest year for which statistics are available, was $19,300. Median debt levels for graduates increased sharply between 1995-96 and 1999-2000, but 2003-04 graduates “were no more deeply in debt than those who had graduated four years earlier,” the report says.

Federal loans remain the largest source of student loans. But the report says private loans are growing more common. Last year, they accounted for 20% of all such borrowing; a decade ago, it was about 4%.

That's “worrisome,” says Robert Shireman of the non-profit Project on Student Debt, because private loans are riskier. “It's more important than ever to ensure that student loans help, rather than hurt, responsible borrowers.”

Spitzer Is Good For Business (WSJ)

By Donald G. Kempf Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Eliot Spitzer looks like a shoo-in to be New York's next governor. Given his reputation, those who operate businesses (or do business) in the state may be fearful that there are dark days ahead. They shouldn't be. Based on my experiences with him, I expect Mr. Spitzer to be a strong -- and successful -- advocate for sound and sensible economic growth. I see good times ahead for business interests, not bad.

Mr. Spitzer has been accused of overreaching as New York's attorney general, operating outside of his areas of expertise when dealing with federal securities laws and such. That's not what I saw as the general counsel of a large New York financial institution. Mr. Spitzer often had a better grasp of the underlying facts, legal implications and policy considerations than many from the federal regulatory agencies. Discussions (sometimes debates) with him on the substance of matters were both focused and fruitful. He was especially constructive when it came to searching for sensible solutions that would facilitate firms resolving problems and getting back to running their businesses for the benefit of customers, employees and shareholders.

Moreover, because he is both smart and self-assured, Mr. Spitzer is willing to engage where others at times seek to hide behind their regulatory status. Ask him, "How can you justify that?" and he will answer you. (Sometimes quite aggressively, to be sure, but he will answer you.) Ask the same of someone from a federal agency involved in the same matter and the reply you're apt to get is often something like, "We don't have to justify (or even explain) our actions to you. We are the ones officially charged with this area of responsibility. We have made our determination and that is the end of it."

Mr. Spitzer does not welsh on deals either -- as some public servants seem wont to do. Their excuse/rationale runs something like this: "We don't represent a 'regular' client -- we represent a 'special' client, the public. Therefore, if we enter into a deal but later think of something else we want to do instead, it's fine for us to renege." Not Mr. Spitzer: When he gives his word, he keeps it. As one senior financial institution executive once put it, "In his dealings with us, Eliot has never done something he said he wouldn't do or failed to do something he said he would do."

Still, the story line runs something like this: Why is this guy Spitzer "meddling" in stuff over which the feds already exercise jurisdiction? The answer, of course, goes all the way back to the founding of the country and the federalist system we adopted back then. At the end of the day, far from being an officious intermeddler, Mr. Spitzer has proven to be a catalyst for constructive change.

DOJ_NMG_0086011

When it comes to fashioning sound public policy in areas where legitimate business interests are at stake, Mr. Spitzer has demonstrated on many occasions that he is neither anti-business nor a knee-jerk reactor. He placed New York among the states that supported the Bush administration's consent decree ending the Microsoft case, rather than among those states that opposed it. He has long been a supporter of and also an advocate for sound reforms in the area of tort law. He has also been actively involved in groups seeking to strike a sensible balance between individual rights and community safety.

The comprehensive strategy Mr. Spitzer outlined last month "to make New York the best place in America to do business" sets forth a number of decidedly business-friendly initiatives. Included are the prospect of lower worker compensation premiums; reform of the archaic Wicks Law, which drives up construction costs in public projects; and a streamlining of the regulatory system to help break the logjam, providing clearer permitting standards and shortening and simplifying the regulations. There's more, of course, and, if he can pull much of it off -- and based on Mr. Spitzer's past performance it seems like a good bet he can -- it spells a healthy and positive business climate for the state.

My political heroes are Ronald Reagan, Newt Gingrich and George Bush -- W., not H.W. So it came as something of a surprise to me that, the more I dealt with Eliot Spitzer, the higher I came to regard him and the more respect I had for him as a public servant. I guess, as they say, the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Mr. Kempf was executive vice president, chief legal officer and secretary of Morgan Stanley until his retirement in 2005.

Rice Says 'Axis Of Evil' Proven Right (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 25, 2006

Recent events in Iran and North Korea support President Bush's 2002 claim that those nations were part of an "axis of evil," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday.

After discussions of the North Korean nuclear test and the anti-Semitic remarks of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, radio host Sean Hannity asked Rice about the axis remark.

"You think of some of the world reaction to the president's use of the word 'axis of evil,' and then you see how events have been unfolding," Hannity remarked.

"It was a pretty good analysis, wasn't it?" Rice replied. "It really was."

Bush used the term to describe Iraq, Iran and North Korea, states he said sponsor terrorism and seek weapons of mass destruction. Iraq's dictator, Saddam Hussein, was toppled the next year in a U.S.-led coup, but autocratic governments remain in place in the other two countries, and both have nuclear programs that alarm the West.

The remark in Bush's State of the Union address drew immediate criticism as too shrill and potentially damaging to U.S. foreign policy. In the case of North Korea, it has been blamed for souring what might have been an opportunity for the U.S. to engage the reclusive Pyongyang leadership and negotiate an end to its nuclear weapons program. The Bush administration says North Korea was determined to cheat and that it pursued a more effective strategy of international diplomacy.

"The president three years ago realized that in order to manage the North Korean nuclear problem, a problem that's been going for decades, we have to have a regional coalition," Rice said in the interview. "This isn't something the United States was going to be able to do alone."

Proof of the strategy's success came when China voted this month to impose sanctions on its neighbor and ally North Korea, she said.

On Iran, Rice said that nation's people deserve a better leader. She predicted the U.N. Security Council will approve sanctions against Iran over its disputed nuclear program "in the next few weeks."

Hannity asked Rice about her career plans, including what Rice has called her dream job of running the NFL. She did not seek the NFL commissioner's job when it came open earlier this year, saying she still had work to do at the State Department.

"Yeah, I lost that, " Rice said. "It came up a little early."

Hannity tried a political question Rice has shot down for months: "You have no intention of running for president?"

"No," Rice said.

"Never?"

DOJ_NMG_0086012

"No."

Bolton: Sanctions 'help Regime Change' (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

Imposing economic and political sanctions against Iran and North Korea will help democratic forces in those countries as Washington pursues its "ultimate objective" of regime change, John Bolton, the US ambassador to the United Nations, said on Tuesday.

Mr Bolton's comments, to Fox News, reflect the views of hardliners in the Bush administration who doubt that the threat of nuclear proliferation can be dealt with through negotiations.

Although the US denies it is pursuing a "regime change" policy towards what it calls the "axis of evil", Mr Bolton's linking of sanctions with "democratic forces" are likely to complicate delicate coalition-building efforts by Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state.

Last week Ms Rice went to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia to co-ordinate the implementation of UN sanctions imposed against North Korea in response to its underground nuclear weapon test. This week the focus shifts to New York where the US and Europe are working on a sanctions resolution for Iran.

European diplomats said they had clashed with Mr Bolton, rejecting his attempt to include a provision that would stop Russia supplying nuclear fuel to the Iranian reactor under construction at Bushehr.

Some European officials suggested Mr Bolton was "freelancing" and did not have the backing of Washington for a position that was sure to antagonise Russia. Diplomats said France, Germany and the UK would put forward a narrowly focused draft resolution soon. US officials declined to comment.

Asked by Fox News why the UN did not try to encourage political change in Iran and North Korea, Mr Bolton said talk of changing authoritarian regimes into democracies would "make a lot of countries unhappy".

He went on: "But I think that's something the United States and its friends should be pursuing on their own, because that is our ultimate objective. If you had countries that were responsive to the public will – unlike, say, North Korea or Iran – I think the odds are considerably reduced that they'd want to spend their scarce resources on nuclear weapons."

The US, he said, wanted to mobilise international support to isolate those regimes economically and politically. "That puts pressure on them internally. I think that helps democratic forces in those countries or in their diasporas."

But he also suggested that change would not happen soon.

Analysts in Tehran say his remarks will not encourage Iran to resume talks under the US-imposed precondition that it first suspend its uranium enrichment programme.

The US expressed concern that Iran will start up a second set of enrichment centrifuges at its Natanz plant in defiance of a UN demand for suspension. Iran insists it will only enrich the fuel, under international inspection, to the low level needed for a civilian reactor.

West Wants Iran Technology Sales Banned (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, October 25, 2006

The U.S. and its allies want the U.N. Security Council to ban the sale of missile and atomic technology to Iran and end most U.N. help for its nuclear programs — moves diplomats said Tuesday are narrowly focused in hopes of winning Russian and Chinese backing for sanctions.

The diplomats, who spoke with The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the draft resolution was not yet public, said the proposal also would commit U.N. member nations to denying entry to Iranian officials involved in developing missiles or nuclear systems.

A Security Council resolution passed last week imposed similar sanctions on the sale or transfer of technology that could contribute to North Korea's nuclear and ballistic missile programs after that nation's test explosion of a nuclear bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0086013

One of the diplomats described all three measures aimed at Iran as moderate in impact, saying that was an attempt to win Russian and Chinese support. Moscow and Beijing could be formally presented with the draft later this week, the diplomat said.

Both Russia and China have agreed in principle to imposing sanctions over Iran's defiance of a council ultimatum to freeze uranium enrichment and sharply improve cooperation with the U.N. probe of suspect Iranian atomic activities.

But both continue to publicly push for dialogue instead of U.N. punishment, despite the collapse last month of a European Union attempt to entice Iran into talks. The EU proposed Iran at least temporarily freeze enrichment as a condition for multilateral talks meant to erase suspicions it may be trying to build nuclear arms in violation of its treaty commitments.

As permanent members of the council, Russia and China hold the power to veto its actions, as do the United States, France and Britain, which drew up the sanctions resolution.

Iran insists it won't halt uranium enrichment, which it says is intended solely to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that will generate electricity. But enrichment also can produce material for nuclear warheads, and the U.S. and others are suspicious of Iran's intentions.

Canceling technical assistance to Iran from the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, would do little to ease such fears. But as the first such withdrawal of IAEA help, it would send a strong signal of international displeasure with Tehran.

IAEA technical programs, which are freely available to all member countries, are restricted to medical or agricultural help, nuclear safety expertise and other peaceful applications that cannot be diverted for weapons purposes.

Typical projects, as listed in a confidential IAEA document seen by AP, involve the disposal of radioactive waste produced by nuclear reactors and the use of narrowly targeted radiotherapy for tumors.

In a bow to Russia, the draft resolution exempts IAEA technical cooperation on operational safety and legal advice at Iran's Bushehr nuclear facility being built by the Russians.

The facility would be Iran's first atomic power plant and the Tehran government recently allocated about $245 million to finish it. The facility is now projected to go on line in late 2007, nearly a year later than originally envisaged.

It was unclear how any eventual sanctions might impact Russia's planned sale of 29 Tor-M1 air defense missile systems to Iran. Analysts in Russia have said Moscow might scuttle the deal as part of a give-and-take with Washington over sanctions.

One of the diplomats who spoke with AP said Washington had wanted to include Bushehr and ban all IAEA technical cooperation but reluctantly agreed with Britain and France that Russia would not go along.

A U.N. official said Tehran would probably depict any sanctions as a U.S.-inspired blow against Iranian programs that aid the poor by using nuclear technology to treat the sick and to increase agricultural yields by reducing crop pests.

Additionally, he said, Iran will argue that no evidence has been found proving it seeks to make nuclear weapons despite more than three years of IAEA probes. As such, Tehran will say it has a continued right to IAEA technical aid as an agency member in good standing, he said.

Iran has shrugged off the threat of sanctions. Diplomats told AP on Monday that experts had begun testing a second enrichment facility at Natanz, in central Iraq, over the past few weeks in defiance of the council's ban on such activities.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable for reactor fuel but not weapons — in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz.

Iran has said it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz by the end of this year, but experts have said industrial-scale production of enriched uranium would require 54,000 centrifuges.

N Korea 'has No Plan Yet' For Second Test (FT)

By Richard McGregor And Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

China said on Tuesday North Korea had no immediate plans to conduct a second nuclear test, damping speculation of another blast following the imposition of United Nations' sanctions on the reclusive state.

However, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesman suggested that Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, had warned in a meeting with a senior Chinese politician last week that Pyongyang could test another bomb if the pressure on it was not eased.

DOJ_NMG_0086014

"He [Kim] indicated that [North Korea] has no plans for a second nuclear test but if other countries impose more pressure, then [North Korea] may take further steps," the spokesman, Liu Jianbao, said.

The South Korean and Japanese governments both said last week that they had detected activity suggesting North Korea might be preparing to conduct a second nuclear test.

This followed reports that US spy satellites had detected "suspicious vehicle movements" that could signal preparations for another test, and a defiant statement from North Korea warning the US "not to miscalculate".

However, such fears have failed to materialise and many analysts think Pyongyang will try to drag out the crisis for as long as possible.

Kim Tae-woo, a nuclear specialist at the Korea Institute of Defence Analyses, said he did not expect a second test in the near future.

"Even though they need more nuclear tests, they will use this as a card to play when they feel really threatened. Then they will conduct a second test," Mr Kim said.

But because the first test was considered a technical failure – the small size of the blast suggested the weapon had not fully detonated – it was likely that North Korea would want to try to iron out the problems then eventually test again, analysts said.

The same applied to the intercontinental ballistic missile that failed shortly after it was launched in July.

In a regular news briefing in Beijing, Mr Liu warned the international community not to do anything that could further escalate tensions on the Korean peninsula.

"All parties should not wilfully interpret or expand the sanctions," he said. "Sanctions are not the end. They should serve the goal of peacefully settling the crisis through dialogue and consultation."

Mr Liu also said he was unaware of any moves by China to reduce its food or energy aid to North Korea, something the US has long encouraged it to do as a lever to bring Pyongyang to heel on the nuclear issue.

Beijing has been critical of Washington's imposition of financial sanctions but otherwise the two sides have been working unusually closely on the nuclear issue.

North Korea has expressed a willingness to return to the six-party talks, which also involve Russia, South Korea and Japan, on its nuclear programme, but only if the US lifts financial sanctions.

China Says N. Korea Not Planning Test (AP)

By Alexa Olesen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

China gave its first full public account Tuesday of its mission to North Korea, saying it got no apology from top leader Kim Jong Il for the atomic explosion but did receive assurances there were no plans for a second nuclear test.

The North's reclusive leader also expressed a willingness to return to six-nation talks over its nuclear program if financial restrictions levied by the U.S. are first resolved, said Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao.

Chinese State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan met with Kim last week during a trip to Pyongyang with Beijing's top nuclear envoy and vice foreign minister that analysts and diplomats had called a critical opportunity to assess the North's intentions.

The meeting resulted in no breakthroughs, but China cast the discussions in a positive light.

Tang was told during meetings with Kim and other North Korean officials that the regime has no plans currently to carry out a second nuclear test, Liu said. "But if it faces pressure, North Korea reserves the right to take further actions," he added, citing Tang.

A second nuclear test has been widely believed to be a possibility. Earlier this month, U.S. media reported that Pyongyang may be preparing for another blast, citing suspicious activity at a suspected test site in the country's northeast.

But on Tuesday, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported the U.S. military had not detected signs of preparations for a second atomic test.

Despite the apparently conciliatory tone of the Pyongyang meeting, Liu said Kim did not apologize for his regime's nuclear test, as some South Korean media had reported.

DOJ_NMG_0086015

"These reports are certainly not accurate," Liu said. "We haven't heard any information that Kim Jong Il apologized for the test."

North Korean officials told the Chinese envoy Pyongyang was willing to return to international negotiations on its nuclear program but wants "certain questions, including the matter of U.S. financial sanctions against it, resolved first," Liu said at a regular press briefing.

The U.S. has sought to cut off the North's access to international banking as punishment for alleged counterfeiting of U.S. dollars and other illicit activity. Pyongyang has denied the charges and boycotted six-nation talks on its nuclear program until the U.S. ends the crackdown.

"All countries involved in the six-party talks believe the talks should be resumed but of course the parties do not all agree on how," Liu said, referring to the talks Beijing has hosted since 2003. They include China, the two Koreas, the United States, Russia and Japan.

"Consultations are required to find a way acceptable to all," he said.

The North Koreans also said countries should not "willfully interpret or expand the sanctions" imposed by the United Nations because of the test, according to Liu.

The United States and Japan are among countries that have imposed additional sanctions on the North. Liu said he had no information to indicate that China had already, or was considering, cutting its food and energy assistance to North Korea.

Beijing, as the North's main ally and source of aid, has the greatest leverage over the regime. However, China has been reluctant to pressure the North, in part out of fear that a collapse of social order there would result in a flood of refugees over their shared border.

Instead, it has been involved in a flurry of diplomatic activity aimed at lessening tensions and preventing the crisis from escalating since Pyongyang announced its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited Beijing last week and Ban Ki-moon, the next U.N. secretary-general and South Korea's foreign minister, was scheduled to arrive in Beijing on Friday to discuss the standoff with top Chinese leaders.

Ban said he plans to use his new position as U.N. chief, which he'll assume at the beginning of next year, to seek a peaceful resolution of the nuclear issue. He also said Seoul fully backs the U.N. sanctions imposed on the North as punishment for the nuclear test.

South Korea has yet to outline any specific action it plans to take to enforce the sanctions. The U.S. has urged the South to join an anti-proliferation initiative, and to take steps for more accountability in joint economic projects with the North.

Ban said Seoul was still reviewing its policies "to bring them closer in line" with the U.N. measures.

South Korea's unification minister Lee Jong-seok, who is in charge of relations with North Korea, offered to resign on Tuesday to take responsibility for the North's nuclear test, the presidential office said Wednesday. Lee has been a strong supporter of engagement with North Korea, and his critics accuse him of being pro-Pyongyang.

Associated Press writers Jae-soon Chang and Burt Herman in Seoul, South Korea, and Kozo Mizoguchi in Tokyo contributed to this report.

China And US Closing Ranks Over North Korea Issue: US (AFP)

AFP, October 25, 2006

NADI, Fiji - The US and China "have never been closer" in the wake of North Korea's nuclear test earlier this month, US Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said.

Hill, who has responsibility for East Asia and the Pacific, has been travelling recently with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in East Asia to try to ensure a united front on the application of UN sanctions against North Korea after its nuclear test on October 9.

"In China we felt we were speaking with one voice on this issue," Hill told journalists on the sidelines of a meeting of Pacific Island Forum leaders.

"At no time have we felt closer together than we have felt in the wake of these North Korean provocations."

DOJ_NMG_0086016

"I think the Chinese understand that the North Korean provocations, the decision to proceed with a nuclear weapons programme is really something quite beyond the pale and something we need to all speak with one voice about," Hill said.

"It always used to be that the Chinese would ask for more patience and we'd ask the Chinese for less patience but I think today we are really working better together."

"Ultimately the proof of the pudding will be if we can get North Korea back to the negotiating table and out of these programmes."

China is Pyongyang's closest ally and Beijing's foreign ministry said Tuesday that North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il had told Chinese envoy Tang Jiaxuan last week that a second nuclear test was not currently planned.

However, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesman added that increased international pressure could trigger more action.

Rice Proposes Asia Form Security Alliance (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

BEIJING -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is urging Asian nations to form a regional security organization to address common threats, suggesting that the six-nation forum dealing with North Korea -- which includes China and Russia -- could be a useful starting point.

Such an organization would not come even close to NATO's integrated political and military structures, but it would assure more effective responses to crises such as Pyongyang's recent nuclear test, Miss Rice told reporters in Beijing during a regional tour last week.

A senior State Department official said the secretary will elaborate on the concept during a speech at the Heritage Foundation in Washington today.

"That you've had no way to even have conversations about common security threats is a problem for the region, and it gets exposed when you have something like this," Miss Rice said of the North Korean nuclear issue.

"There are highly developed security arrangements all throughout Europe -- as a matter of fact, some people think too many," Miss Rice said. "I don't think this region is probably going to develop an organizational structure anything like what you have in Europe."

But a more informal group, perhaps growing out of the six-party process that includes the United States, Japan and South Korea, is not only possible, but also necessary, she said. U.S. officials said Australia, Indonesia, the Philippines and other countries also would be good candidates for a security organization.

"Those mechanisms, I think, are going to need to come into being and begin to give the region a way to have this conversation," Miss Rice said, adding that the six-party framework "is a first chance to do some of that."

The Bush administration, which has refused to negotiate with North Korea bilaterally, proposed the six-party talks in 2003 on the grounds that it would be more difficult for Pyongyang to break an agreement that involved several countries, including its benefactor China.

"The fact that we can all talk about proliferation issues with one another, defense issues with one another -- eventually, I think, more articulated versions of all of those -- is something that this region has really lacked," Miss Rice said.

Miss Rice did not say whether North Korea, the other participant in the six-party talks, would be invited. But another official familiar with interagency talks on the issue said membership could be held out as a reward to Pyongyang if it dismantles its nuclear program.

The official said the proposal was first developed four years ago under Secretary of State Colin L. Powell but sidelined by opposition from Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Some officials remain wary of anything that smacks of rewarding North Korea after its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

Analysts generally agree that a regional security organization in Asia is necessary, and point to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation as a model. APEC heads of state meet each November for a high-profile summit on economic issues. This year's meeting will be held in Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0086017

But several diplomats and analysts expressed doubts that China in particular would sign on to a security arrangement that institutionalizes the dominance of the United States in the Asia-Pacific region.

Critics of the plan note that China has refused to invite the United States to join the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, which deals with Central Asian security issues, and has excluded the United States from joining the East Asia Economic Summit.

Many APEC members complained at the 2003 summit in Bangkok that President Bush wanted security to dominate the agenda while they preferred to talk about economics and business.

But U.S. officials said that, had there been a forum at which Asian security could be discussed, Mr. Bush would not have been accused of trying to "hijack" the APEC agenda with issues such as terrorism and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Jamie Metzl, executive vice president of the Asia Society in New York, noted that Asian security also is a topic at the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' Regional Forum, which takes place every summer. But, he said, ASEAN "doesn't have the robustness required to address the region's needs as a whole."

Michael Pillsbury, a specialist on China, said the secretary's proposal will challenge China's government.

"This will fuel the debate in China between hard-liners and the moderates about whether to accept this constructive offer," he said. "This will revive the debate over China's refusal to join the U.S. as a responsible stakeholder."

Michael E. O'Hanlon, senior fellow in foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said a security organization is a good idea, "but it will have an inauspicious start if we fail utterly to deal with the North Korean nuclear threat using the same putative grouping."

Miss Rice credited the six-party process, and China's participation in particular, with the relative ease with which the United States negotiated a unanimous U.N. Security Council resolution punishing North Korea for its nuclear test.

"Thirty years you haven't been able to get a Security Council resolution on North Korea, and when you get one, it's Chapter 7, it's 15-0, and China is at the center of it," Miss Rice said.

Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter is invoked only when the 15-member council determines that international peace and security are being threatened. The North Korea resolution imposed trade and financial sanctions related to Pyongyang's weapons of mass destruction programs and banned imports and exports of illicit materials and equipment.

Test Sparks N. Korea Backlash In Japan (AP)

By Hans Greimel

AP, October 25, 2006

When a bamboo grove mysteriously erupted in flames and nearly engulfed an office compound of Japan's biggest pro-North Korean organization, So Chung-on was hardly surprised.

Harassment of Japan's insular North Korean community, the biggest outside the homeland or China, dates back decades. But animosity has flared to new levels since North Korea stunned the world with its nuclear test.

"The atmosphere in Japan is now the worst," said So, director of international affairs at Chongryon, an umbrella group acting as de facto embassy for tens of thousands of ethnic Koreans who live in Asia's richest capitalist society yet see North Korea as home.

No one was hurt in the Oct. 17 arson attack, and the blaze was put out before it could torch local Chongryon offices. But it was one of several outbursts putting people on edge — including angry protests outside Chongryon facilities, threatening phone calls to North Korea-backed private schools and a severed pinkie finger mailed to the group's headquarters with a note promising "punishment from heaven."

North Koreans in Japan have long been vilified as a communist fifth column, but with Tokyo leading a worldwide campaign to sanction Pyongyang for its nuclear test, they now stand in an unwanted spotlight.

Japan, lying within easy range of North Korean missiles, is especially jittery about its neighbor's atomic arsenal. After the Oct. 9 test, Tokyo banned North Korean imports, barred port entry of North Korean ships and prohibited most North Korean nationals from entering the country.

Chongryon has not commented on the nuclear test, but was quick to condemn the backlash.

DOJ_NMG_0086018

The measures will likely strangle North Korean businesses in Japan and divide families with roots in both countries. It could also finally kill off reconciliation between rival camps of North and South Koreans in Japan.

"Koreans who have nothing to do with the nuclear test have become the victim," Chongryon said in a statement. "The ratcheting up of sanctions severely threatens the rights and lifestyle of Koreans in Japan."

There are some 600,000 ethnic Koreans among 127 million Japanese, most of them descendants of people who moved here voluntarily or by force during Japan's 1910-1945 colonial rule of the Korean peninsula. About 200,000 are affiliated with Pyongyang.

All Koreans in Japan face discrimination in Japan. All Koreans were stripped of their Japanese citizenship after World War II and those in Japan found themselves in a society that often looked down on them as former colonial subjects.

Yet given the long-standing animosity between Tokyo and Pyongyang, North Koreans face especially limited economic opportunities, confined to tight-knit community-run businesses. Students who attend North Korean schools find it all but impossible to enter public universities.

Chongryon functions like an embassy because Japan and North Korea have no diplomatic ties. Its walled headquarters in Tokyo is guarded by police. Inside, visitors are greeted by a giant mural of North Korea's founding father Kim Il Sung and his son, current leader Kim Jong Il.

The current backlash began in July, after North Korea conducted internationally condemned missile tests.

Since then, there have been 130 cases of harassment and intimidation against North Korean students, Chongryon said. The pace quickened after the nuclear test, with two arson attacks against Chongryon facilities, including the bamboo incident in the city of Mito.

Tokyo's sanctions are meant to squeeze North Korea's economy and pressure Pyongyang into giving up its nuclear ambitions. But in reality, North Korean trade with Japan tumbled 85 percent from 2001, to a paltry $195 million last year. Analysts say any additional crackdown will have limited impact overseas.

But in Japan, it will dig deep into North Korean businesses that rely on importing manufactured goods like cheap men's suits, marine and agriculture products, like clams and mushrooms, and raw materials such as coal.

Meanwhile, banning North Korean ships will shut the doors on the most popular way for North Koreans to visit relatives back home, and the new immigration restrictions will further limit travel.

Chongryon's future is anything but bright, said David C. Kang, a North Korea expert at Dartmouth University.

Loyalty toward Chongryon started fading in the 1990s when North Korea's economy flat-lined and famines killed an estimated 2 million people. Then, in 2002, Kim Jong Il shocked the world by admitting North Korean agents had been kidnapping Japanese citizens to train communist spies.

Today, many North Koreans simply opt for South Korean or Japanese citizenship to escape the stigma.

Chongryon tried to bolster its support by striking a landmark reconciliation accord with the South Korean association in Japan earlier this year. But the nuclear crisis scuttled that too.

"The North Korean community is dwindling, for both assimilation in Japan and also because it's such a sinking ship," Kang said.

General Says U.S. Could Beat N. Korea (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, October 25, 2006

The U.S. military would prevail in a war against North Korea but at a greater cost in lives than if the United States were not already fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said Tuesday.

"It would not be as clean as we would like it to be, but it would certainly be sure, and the outcome would not be in doubt," said Gen. Peter Pace.

He told a Pentagon news conference that the U.S. military has plenty of people available to fight wars beyond Iraq and Afghanistan, but he acknowledged that U.S.-based ground combat units are not fully equipped.

DOJ_NMG_0086019

"We have 2 million folks who can start protecting this nation anywhere else we need them to tomorrow, if we need them to," Pace said when a reporter asked what sort of threat North Korea's military poses.

The fight, however, would be messier than if the U.S. military did not have 147,000 troops tied up in Iraq and about 20,000 in Afghanistan.

"It would be more brute force, wherever we might have to go next, than it would be if we weren't already involved in the war we have going on in Iraq and Afghanistan," Pace said. "Why? Because you need precision intelligence to drop precision munitions. And a lot of our precision intelligence assets are currently being used in the Gulf region. So some of those would not be available if you had to go someplace else."

As a result there would be more unintended damage inflicted, he added.

"You end up more like a World War II, Korean War campaign," he said, adding that he was not making any predictions. "I'm just saying that, on a scale, you're going to have to use more brute force to get the job done" in North Korea.

Pace said U.S. intelligence can determine the size of the North Korean military but it cannot provide an equally important piece of information in assessing the threat of war: the intent of North Korea's leaders.

"What is not knowable is the intent of the leadership in North Korea to use or not use that power at any given time," he said. "And applying Western logic to the leadership in Korea is not something that I would personally want to get my future on."

Concerns about North Korea's intentions have grown in recent months following its July missile tests and its underground nuclear test, which prompted the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on North Korea.

Pace said he had seen no indication that North Korean forces have been placed on a higher state of alert.

"To my knowledge, the North Koreans' status of their armed forces is stable," he said. "I mean, they haven't raised or lowered any particular parts of their readiness to cause any kind of alarm."

Across South Korea, Softer Feelings Toward The North (NYT)

By Martin Fackler

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

BUNDANG, South Korea, Oct. 22 — With news about the North Korean nuclear crisis flashing on the living room television, Kim Yoon-sup unleashed a verbal barrage of his own at the heavily armed Communist nation, some 60 miles north of this wealthy Seoul suburb.

From a sofa in his son's high-rise condominium, the 79-year-old Korean War veteran blasted the North for murdering its domestic opponents, starving its population, and amassing legions of tanks and cannons. Mr. Kim, a retired air force colonel, also criticized his own country's policy of engagement, which had failed to stop the North's nuclear test earlier this month.

But asked if South Korea should sever its growing trade and investment ties with the North, as many in the United States advocate, his answer was a firm no. His country must continue engagement, he said, to avoid either backing the government into a corner or causing further economic hardship for its people.

"We can't be too harsh," he said. "North and South, we share the same blood, after all. Of course, it's good to help them." His son, daughter-in-law and three grandchildren all agreed.

Once fervently anti-Communist, South Korea has slowly parted ways with the United States, its largest ally and wartime protector, on how to deal with the North. Across age groups and political persuasions, most South Koreans now appear to believe that their nation has no choice but to keep building ties with the North, despite the widespread shock and anger here over its nuclear test.

This bedrock of public sentiment underlies the different responses to the crisis by South Korea and the United States. Many in Washington have called for tougher sanctions or even a naval blockade to further isolate the North's impoverished government and force it to relinquish its nuclear ambitions. But Seoul has been reluctant to tighten the economic screws on the North, hoping instead to entice it to the bargaining table with increased links with the outside world.

This softer approach is a result of a deeper evolution in public perception here since the end of the cold war and South Korea's subsequent emergence as an Asian economic powerhouse. The changes were reflected in the personal political odyssey of the Kim family, three generations of whom gathered on a Sunday evening to discuss their perceptions of the North.

DOJ_NMG_0086020

The elder Mr. Kim, the family patriarch, was born in what is now North Korea and fled the brutality of the fledgling Communist government in a grueling winter boat ride. But his grandchildren, who have lived most of their lives in this high-rise community on the outskirts of the bustling South Korean capital, said they saw the North as too distant and poor to be a real threat.

"The nuclear test is scary, but not enough to feel like it has violated everyday life," said a granddaughter, Kim Ta-yon, a 21-year-old university junior in French literature. "None of my friends think North Korea will actually attack."

Her mother, Song Yon-ju, 49, said she remembered the panic caused by military crises in previous decades, when she joined mad rushes to grocery stores to stock up on boxes of dried noodles. There have been no such panics this time, she said, which she attributed to South Koreans having grown weary of living in fear.

She also said the continued desire to engage the North reflected a streak of pragmatism in a country where much of the population lived within range of North Korean artillery. A tougher policy would only push the North into deeper desperation, she said.

"Even a little mouse will bite if it's cornered," she warned quietly.

Similar attitudes appear in recent public opinion polls, which show that while the claimed nuclear detonation hardened attitudes toward the North, a majority of South Koreans still oppose outright confrontation. According to a telephone survey of 800 people last week by the Naeil Shinmun-Hangil Research Center, only 15 percent of respondents called for ending economic ties, compared with 83 percent who supported their continuation. But most supporters agreed the current policy needed revisions, such as making it harder for North Korean leaders to profit from such ties.

Political analysts say a big factor behind the desire to maintain economic ties is a deep ambivalence in South Korean views of the North. While the two Koreas still face each other across the minefields and barbed wire of the demilitarized zone, many South Koreans have come to see the North as nothing more than a destitute, misguided relative.

"South Korean people are caught in a dilemma between perceiving the North as a threat and as a brother," said Lee Nae-young, a political science professor at Korea University in Seoul. "They felt betrayed by the nuclear test, but don't want aggressive sanctions, either."

These conflicting feelings toward the North were apparent in the conversation with the Kims. The elder Mr. Kim, who watched Communist troops gun down critics in his village and spent 20 years in the South Korean Air Force, warned that the North was still armed to the teeth. But he also said South Korea could not just close the door on North Korea and its famine-ravaged population.

"We have no choice," he said. "We can't ignore the more than 20 million Koreans still living up there. They don't have enough rice."

His son, Kim Seok-kyeon, 49, a general manager at an insurance company who was born after the Korean War ended in 1953, agreed that his country could not go back to the confrontation of the cold war. He said there was no need because the North wasn't as fearsome as it used to be.

"They have more airplanes and tanks than we have," he said, "but they have no fuel to put in them."

Another generation down, his son, 11-year-old Kim Dong-hyun, said he didn't worry about North Korea at all. When pressed, he described the country as "crazy and harmless."

His two sisters, both in college, said their textbooks blandly described the North as a starving land where fellow Koreans spoke an antiquated dialect. This was a big change from the era of their father, the insurance executive, who grew up during the military dictatorships of the 1960's and 1970's. He said anti-Communist education ran through his schooling, with monthly homework assignments to make posters demonizing the North.

The three generations of Kims also showed subtle differences in their views of America's role in the nuclear standoff. All agreed that the United States was a friend, and that the crisis had made them appreciate the protection offered by the American nuclear umbrella.

But while the elder Mr. Kim expressed confidence that Washington was working to resolve the crisis, his granddaughters suggested that America bore some blame for the standoff — a common sentiment here.

DOJ_NMG_0086021

"If the U.S. isolates North Korea, it's just silencing someone who has something to say," said Kim Ta-yon, the university junior. "I don't think North Korea did the test to provoke war, but because it wants a voice in international society."

Pre-emptive Attack On Hamas Eyed (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Applying a lesson from the recent war against Hezbollah, Israeli leaders are increasingly talking about staging a pre-emptive military offensive in the Gaza Strip in order to avert a Hamas buildup of improved missiles.

Israeli forces already operating in the Gaza Strip Monday killed at least nine Palestinians and wounded 20. But officials and politicians say a broader operation against Hamas is necessary if Israel wants to deny it the ability to stockpile weapons like the Shi'ite militia Hezbollah, which was able to build up its arsenal during six years of relative calm.

"We should not allow Hamas to build in Gaza what Hezbollah built in Lebanon," said Ephraim Sneh, Labor parliamentarian. "[A broad offensive] seems to me almost unavoidable because the accumulation of arms in Gaza in the hands of Hamas and other terror organization is intolerable."

The talk of an escalation in Gaza comes as Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert agreed in principle to bring a far-right party, Yisrael Beitenu, into his coalition.

The move stabilized a coalition whose foundations emerged from the Lebanon war severely shaken. But it also reorients the political constellation of Mr. Olmert's government toward the right.

Israeli army units, which retook the corridor in Gaza along the Egyptian border this week, have uncovered more than a dozen smuggling tunnels used to sneak weapons, money and contraband into Gaza from Egypt.

At the same time, Israeli intelligence officials say they think that Syria and Iran are supplying Hamas with the advanced anti-tank missiles that turned armored vehicles like the Merkava tank into a sitting ducks, according to local press reports.

Hamas is also thought to be receiving longer-range rockets like the Katyusha missiles fired by the hundreds into northern Israeli this past summer.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz has said that Israel cannot allow Gaza to become another Lebanon. At the same time Mr. Peretz, the chairman of coalition partner Labor party, said that Israel has no desire to reconquer the Gaza Strip permanently.

In the Gaza violence Monday, Palestinians reported three civilian deaths while Israel's army said soldiers fired because they felt threatened by gunmen from the northeastern Gaza village of Beit Hanoun.

For now, politicians such as Mr. Peretz want to promote diplomatic attempts to release kidnapped soldier Gilad Shalit, in the hope that a deal would create momentum behind an accord that would avert contributions to Hamas' arms buildup in Gaza.

"What we are hearing from military officers is that they see the obvious need for an operation," said a senior Israeli security source. "The politicians are not thrilled by a military operation, but if it becomes necessary, a military operation will be taken."

Officials say privately they are skeptical whether diplomatic efforts will yield any substantial results in taming the arms buildup and avert a military invasion.

During the monthlong war with Hezbollah, many Israelis questioned why military and government officials allowed the Shi'ite militia to stockpile rockets and build fortifications for so many years.

Barring a deadly militant attack on Israel that gives the government a justification for a Gaza push, Mr. Olmert's government is likely to wait until he returns from meetings in the United States with President Bush.

Kidnapped AP Photographer Freed In Gaza (AP)

By Karin Laub, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

An Associated Press photographer was freed unharmed Tuesday after a harrowing day in the hands of Palestinians who abducted him at gunpoint and dressed him in women's clothes to spirit him from one secret location to another.

Emilio Morenatti was brought before midnight to the office of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas by Fatah officials. It was not clear who kidnapped him, though officials said he was taken by criminals. The government and main Palestinian groups denounced the abduction.

DOJ_NMG_0086022

Morenatti, a 37-year-old Spaniard, looked fatigued after his daylong ordeal but said he was unharmed.

"I'm tired but happy to have come back because there were very anguished moments," said Morenatti.

He said the kidnappers held him in a small room, where he was kept for about four hours during which he was visited by masked men. Later he was put in a car dressed as a woman and taken to another location.

"They put a bag on my head and they dressed me up as a woman, as a woman in a long veil," the photographer added.

Morenatti said he was blindfolded for much of the time, and that his captors spoke only Arabic, which he doesn't speak.

"I didn't know at any moment what they were doing," he said. "They moved me but nobody explained anything to me. It was very confusing."

The photographer said he was held in complete darkness for hours. In the second house where he was held, Morenatti said he heard the sounds of a family. He said he was given one meal of cheese and lunch meat early in the day and a portion of fruit later.

Morenatti did not know his captors. Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's office said in a statement that the identity of the kidnappers was known and they "would be pursued."

Tom Curley, AP's president and chief executive officer, said, "The Associated Press is relieved that Emilio has been released, apparently unharmed. The security of our journalists is always our top concern. We appreciate the assistance offered by so many people in obtaining his release, especially Palestinian and Spanish officials.

"It is crucial, however, that journalists such as Emilio be able to freely report the news in areas of conflict. We will be investigating what happened to assure that he and others can continue their important work," Curley said.

Morenatti's family in Spain rejoiced at news of his release.

"We were all sitting around together and when we heard the news we yelled with joy and then we opened a bottle of rioja (wine) to celebrate," Miguel Angel Morenatti, a brother of the photographer, told the AP.

"I managed to talk with Emilio for about 15 seconds and he told me that he was well both physically and mentally. The most important thing is that he is safe and free,"

Morenatti was seized as he headed out of his Gaza City apartment for an AP car, where Majed Hamdan, an AP driver and translator, was waiting. Hamdan said four gunmen grabbed his keys and cell phone and told him to turn away, pressing a gun to his head and threatening to harm him if he moved.

They took Morenatti, shoving him into a white Volkswagen Golf and driving off, Hamdan said.

Hours later, Morenatti was turned over to Fatah forces.

Abbas is not in Gaza, but his office is a safe Fatah stronghold in the territory, which is in the throes of a sometimes violent power struggle between Abbas' Fatah and the militant Islamic Hamas, which is in charge of the Palestinian government.

In the past two years, militants have frequently kidnapped foreigners as bargaining chips to get relatives released from Palestinian prisons, secure government jobs or settle personal scores. In most cases, the kidnappings were brief and the hostages released unharmed.

But recently, the kidnappers have changed tactics. Two Fox News journalists kidnapped in August were held for two weeks, much longer than previous cases. The men also suffered physical and mental abuse in captivity.

An unknown group calling itself the Holy Jihad Brigades claimed responsibility for the August abduction, and its demand for the release of Muslim prisoners held by the U.S. raised fears that foreign extremists, perhaps al-Qaida, had infiltrated Gaza. But Palestinian security officials said the name was a front for local militants.

The media advocacy groups Reporters Without Borders and the Committee to Protect Journalists condemned Morenatti's kidnapping.

"We're dismayed that journalists have become pawns of Palestinian groups seeking to exploit them for political purposes," said CPJ Executive Director Joel Simon. "These blatant attacks on journalists will have a chilling effect on their ability to do their work and will ultimately deprive the world of information about this critically important story."

Morenatti, from Jerez, Spain, has been based in Jerusalem since April 2005, handling periodic assignments in Gaza and the West Bank. He has been in Gaza since Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0086023

Morenatti began working for the AP in April 2004, and spent a year in Afghanistan covering the conflict there. He also covered the war in Lebanon and the World Cup soccer tournament in Germany.

In 1992, Morenatti began work as a photographer with EFE, the Spanish news agency, Spain.

The Wrong Partner In Israel (NYT)

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Badly weakened by criticism of his conduct of this summer's inconclusive war in Lebanon, Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has chosen to make an unwise and damaging trade-off. Bringing the pro-settler Israel Beiteinu party into his governing coalition reinforces his vulnerable parliamentary majority. But it makes it virtually impossible for Mr. Olmert to carry out the partial West Bank withdrawal program he ran on just seven months ago.

Israel Beiteinu is the political vehicle of Avigdor Lieberman, who advocates annexing West Bank settlements and reassigning Arab Israeli citizens to a rump Palestinian state. Mr. Lieberman, who is set to become a deputy prime minister, has criticized other right-wing leaders, like Ariel Sharon, for evicting settlers from occupied regions.

American and European diplomats have been arguing that the one positive result of the Lebanon war could be new momentum toward a wider Middle East peace. The idea was that a new awareness of the limits of Israeli military power and growing Arab fears of Shiite radicalism would push both sides toward the necessary compromises.

That now seems less likely than ever. The chief Palestinian party, Hamas, refuses to take the most minimal steps required for diplomatic credibility — a clear rejection of terrorism, acceptance of prior agreements and acknowledgment of Israel's legitimacy. Efforts by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to bring Hamas around have not gotten as much support as they should from Israel. With Israel Beiteinu joining Mr. Olmert's coalition, they are likely to get even less.

Creating new obstacles to peace with the Palestinians is the last thing Israel needs after the Lebanon fiasco.

Iran, Syria Rebuild Hezbollah (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

Iran and Syria are rapidly rearming Hezbollah guerrillas in southern Lebanon as an international peacekeeping force has failed to carry out a U.N. mandate to disarm the Shi'ite militia group, Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shaul Mofaz said yesterday.

Mr. Mofaz, a former defense minister and chief of general staff in the Israeli Defense Force, also warned that time was growing short for the international community to implement effective sanctions to halt Iran's drive for nuclear weapons.

"We know the policy of the Iranian regime is to buy time by talking" while it pursues a nuclear bomb, Mr. Mofaz said in an interview in his suite at the Renaissance Mayflower Hotel in Washington. "So far they have been very successful."

The hawkish Mr. Mofaz is the transportation minister under the unity government headed by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, but he remains a major voice on defense and security issues in Israel.

He met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, among others, on a visit to Washington this week in advance of U.S.-Israel security talks set for December.

Mr. Mofaz said Israel's 34-day war with Hezbollah fighters this summer had dealt the Shi'ite militia a major setback in its southern Lebanese base. But he expressed frustration that the Lebanese army and an enhanced U.N. peacekeeping force had not disarmed Hezbollah or sealed the border to prevent Syria and Iran from rearming their "proxy."

"Arms smuggling across the border from Syria has continued after the war," he said. "We know of the activity but we don't know what types of weapons are involved."

He acknowledged that Israel's armed forces "did not achieve all our goals" in the Lebanon campaign, failing to crush Hezbollah as a fighting force and to win the release of Israeli soldiers held by the Shi'ite group.

But he said the "main issue of discussion" with U.S. officials was Iran.

"Iran poses the biggest threat not only to the state of Israel but to the countries of the West as well," he said. "Under the umbrella provided by a nuclear capability, Iran might be more involved in harboring, supporting and financing terror."

DOJ_NMG_0086024

Mr. Olmert told reporters last week that Iran would have a "price to pay" if it rejected international offers to stop its suspect nuclear programs. But Mr. Mofaz yesterday put greater stress on multilateral efforts to pressure Iran, calling for strong sanctions against Tehran if it refuses to cooperate.

"The time has come for effective sanctions after three years of dialogue without any achievements," he said.

The North Korea nuclear test earlier this month has heightened the need for a tough stand against Iran, Mr. Mofaz said. North Korea has sold Iran missiles that can deliver nuclear warheads, and Mr. Mofaz said Pyongyang's test of a nuclear device means it could now transfer "nuclear assets" to Iran as well.

On Syria, Mr. Mofaz dismissed as a "ploy" recent offers by President Bashar Assad for direct peace talks with Israel, saying Damascus continues to support Hezbollah and militant Palestinian groups battling Israeli forces in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

"We believe it is not [Syria's] intention to have a real negotiation," he said. "When we see real intentions for peace in Syria, then we can have a different approach."

Mr. Olmert is expected to travel to Washington next month for talks, and the Bush administration is pressing for new movement on peace talks with the Palestinians.

But Mr. Mofaz said the bloody internal standoff in the Palestinian territories between the Hamas government, which refuses to recognize Israel, and the Fatah party of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas leaves Israel with no effective negotiating partner.

Pentagon Official Sentenced In Arms Sale (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 25, 2006

A former Defense Department official was sentenced to 18 months in prison and another pleaded guilty Tuesday to selling military equipment in the Middle East and pocketing hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Most of the equipment was unneeded and scheduled for auction, but prosecutors said the illegal deals also included the sale of Humvees that were still weaponized and were not supposed to have been sold.

Ronald W. Wiseman of New Boston, Texas, was sentenced for violating federal weapons laws. Wiseman worked for the Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service, the Pentagon agency that sells excess military equipment.

The agency contracts with overseas auctioneers to sell the equipment and return the money to the government. Prosecutors said Wiseman and a Saudi Arabian auctioneer agreed to sell some equipment off the books and share in the profits.

Wiseman pleaded guilty in May and agreed to cooperate in a federal investigation. A second U.S. official, Gayden C. Woodson of North Ogden, Utah, pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiracy to steal government property.

Woodson said that in January 2001, he joined Wiseman's conspiracy and continued it after Wiseman left the Middle East the following year. Woodson admitted in federal court that he made at least 19 illegal transactions and received about $350,000.

U.S. authorities have recovered some of the Humvees and traced others to Spain, the Czech Republic and other countries, according to court documents.

"By putting militarized vehicles into an unregulated stream of foreign commerce, in a part of the world in which United States military personnel are engaged in deadly conflict with insurgency forces, the defendant put those vehicles within reach of adversaries who could use them against our own," prosecutor Laura A. Ingersoll wrote.

Woodson is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 31.

Chavez Could Support Bolivia As Alternative U.N. Candidate (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Bolivia's president said Tuesday that Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez would throw his support behind the Andean country if Venezuela is unable to win enough votes to defeat U.S.-backed Guatemala for a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Bolivian President Evo Morales, a close ally of Mr. Chavez, raised the possibility during a speech in El Alto, Bolivia, while in Caracas Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro said Venezuela would continue its drive for the rotating Security Council seat.

DOJ_NMG_0086025

A 36th round of voting is scheduled to be held Wednesday, and some countries in the region -- from Brazil to Guyana -- expressed hope of seeking an alternate candidate. Other possibilities mentioned by diplomats included Chile and Uruguay.

Venezuela trailed Guatemala in 34 of the 35 votes so far, and tied the Central American country in one round last week.

Venezuela has denounced what it calls coercive measures by the U.S. government aimed at keeping a critical government off the Security Council.

Mr. Morales said he had spoken by phone with Mr. Chavez on Monday, who told him that if Venezuela does not get the two-thirds majority it needs to win, he will "propose Bolivia as a candidate."

"We're candidates for the Security Council," Mr. Morales said. "I hope we can win a consensus. Our ambassadors should be mobilized in the United Nations."

Mr. Maduro, meanwhile, said Venezuela has a "sovereign and legitimate right" to maintain its candidacy. He said Venezuela would only consider talks on a consensus candidate if Guatemala drops out of the race and the U.S. doesn't try to interfere.

The foreign minister said Venezuela has the support of a large majority of countries across Latin America and the Caribbean.

"Venezuela has always been willing to have a dialogue," Mr. Maduro said. "Bilateral meetings have been held today. We've received a ratification of the vote by a group of countries that have stood by us strongly."

Mr. Maduro said he would travel to New York to lead Venezuela's delegation as the voting resumes.

As for seeking consensus on another country to fill the rotating seat, Mr. Maduro said "we could only consider that option if Guatemala quits, if the United States ceases its crude blackmail to other governments of the world."

Meanwhile, Guyana's foreign minister, Rudy Insanally, said Latin American and Caribbean nations are likely to seek an alternate candidate if neither Guatemala or Venezuela wins enough votes in fresh balloting this week.

He said countries would be meeting to discuss alternatives. "We are hearing Chile or Uruguay. These two are the likely ones," Mr. Insanally said.

Brazilian Foreign Minister Celso Amorin also said Brazil favors a consensus candidate, despite the fact that his nation has expressed support for Venezuela.

Other compromise candidates that have been suggested for the two-year seat include Costa Rica, Panama, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, and Brazil.

Venezuela Denies Ending U.N. Bid (WP)

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Oct. 24 -- Venezuelan officials on Tuesday denied Bolivian President Evo Morales's claim that Venezuela had decided to withdraw from the competition for a seat on the U.N. Security Council and would instead nominate his country as a candidate.

Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro demanded that Guatemala, its rival for the position, and the United States meet three conditions before Venezuela would drop its bid.

Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal said a Bolivian compromise candidacy "was apparently a unilateral decision by Venezuela, because they have not notified me." He rejected the idea that Guatemala would step aside in favor of Bolivia.

"We have not pulled out, and we have no intention of doing so," he said in Guatemala City.

Latin American U.N. representatives reconvene in New York at noon Wednesday to consider a consensus candidate. Venezuela and Guatemala jockeyed over 35 rounds of voting last week -- the second-longest bid in U.N. history -- to land one of Latin America's two-year rotating seats on the council, but neither got the required two-thirds majority among U.N. members.

"Comandante Chavez called me this morning and said he could not get the two-thirds he needed for the Security Council," Morales said from El Alto, Bolivia, referring to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. "Chavez said he will leave the candidacy to Bolivia."

Like Chavez, Morales has strained relations with the Bush administration, which has backed Guatemala for the Security Council seat.

DOJ_NMG_0086026

Maduro said Venezuela required that Guatemala resign its candidacy, that the United States stop "its gross blackmail of the governments of the world, and . . . that we have a transparent process to find some kind of third option to represent the region with dignity."

Venezuela Diatribe Backfires (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 24 — Venezuela's populist leader, Hugo Chávez, earned giggles and guffaws at the United Nations last month with his mass appeal diatribe ridiculing President Bush as the devil. Mr. Chávez said he could still smell the telltale scent of sulfur on the General Assembly rostrum where Mr. Bush had spoken the day before.

Now it appears that Mr. Chávez's histrionic performance — styled to win him support from the United States' many detractors at the United Nations — may have cost his country the seat on the Security Council that he has conducted a global campaign to win.

Developing nations make up a vast majority of the 192 countries in the General Assembly and generally warm to rants against Washington. But they also value the United Nations as a place where their voices can be heard in a dignified setting, and both supporters and detractors here say Mr. Chávez may have miscalculated in turning it into his bully pulpit.

Delegates said they also feared that the performance demonstrated the kind of behavior Venezuela might bring to the orderly confines of the Council chamber.

As the General Assembly resumes voting on Wednesday on who should occupy the seat being vacated by Argentina, Venezuela's candidacy is already considered finished. In 35 rounds over three days last week, the ambassadors kept Venezuela's competitor, Guatemala, far in front, though not in ready reach of the two-thirds majority needed to win the seat.

In a twist to Venezuela's quest for the seat, President Evo Morales of Bolivia, Mr. Chávez's closest political ally in South America, said Tuesday that Mr. Chávez had asked him to put Bolivia forward as an alternate candidate to Venezuela. But a spokeswoman for the Venezuelan Foreign Ministry later said the nomination of Bolivia was just one option under consideration. In any case, the decision to select a new candidate would be up to the Latin American and Caribbean group at the United Nations.

Venezuela's poor results came as a surprise, and many people, including those favoring Caracas in the voting, point to Mr. Chávez's performance as the cause.

"The speech played the most important role in what happened," said Riordan Roett, the director of the Latin American Studies Program at Johns Hopkins University. "You can talk like that in Latin America, and people will have a chuckle, but there is traditional respect for protocol, and it was not amusing to a lot of people who see the U.N. as the forum for expressing third world views."

"The speech really hurt his case," said Enrique Berruga, the ambassador of Mexico. "Most members don't want this place to be turned into a mockery. In the General Assembly, there are limits, and he went way beyond them."

Another Latin ambassador, who said he knew of many countries that voted against Venezuela because of the speech, agreed that Mr. Chávez had stepped over a line.

"U.S.-bashing is acceptable, but not the U.N.-bashing that they thought Chávez's speech amounted to because in the end this is everyone's house, and a speech like that goes down the same dirty drain as the bitter criticisms of the U.S.," the envoy said. He asked not to be identified because he was commenting on the leader of another South American country.

Asked if Mr. Chávez's popularity might be flagging closer to home, Mr. Roett pointed out that presidential candidates who have been identified with Mr. Chávez in recent elections in Ecuador, Peru and Mexico all did badly. "For sure he's not gone as a force, but people are less impressed with him than they were four or five years ago," he said.

The expectation at the United Nations has been that the inconclusive balloting will drag on for many days as Venezuela and Guatemala refuse to step down and the Latin American group is consequently unable to turn to a compromise candidate.

The calculus could change if Venezuela does decide to drop out.

DOJ_NMG_0086027

The unseemly process is embarrassing to Latin diplomats who acknowledge that the 33-nation Latin American and Caribbean group at the United Nations has often shown disunity, while the 53-nation African group and the 54-country Asian group yearly produce candidates without dispute.

"We probably have the least amount of time difference between our countries of any group, but we have the greatest difficulties getting together," said Eduardo J. Sevilla Somoza, the ambassador of Nicaragua. His country lost its bid for a Security Council seat last year to Peru.

The disarray that the Venezuela-Guatemala standoff has produced at the United Nations reflects divisions within the region itself.

First, there is the role of the United States, which has lobbied vigorously for Guatemala in an effort to keep Venezuela off the Security Council and whose attempts to influence Latin America have long divided the region.

"Both countries feel victimized, Guatemala because of Venezuela and Venezuela because of the United States," said Ronaldo Sardenberg, the ambassador of Brazil. "It's a very complicated moment."

Another part of the divide is a regional tug-of-war pitting the small countries of Central America and the Caribbean against the large nations of South America.

Guatemala has never been on the Security Council. Venezuela has been a member four times, and the powers of the continent, Brazil and Argentina, have held a seat nine and eight times respectively.

But the division most on the minds of Latin Americans today is the one provoked by Mr. Chávez and his adoption of an authoritarian, state-centered leadership model that he is trying to spread through the region, which has in recent years adopted market economics and democracy.

Kenneth R. Maxwell, a senior fellow at the David Rockefeller Center for Latin American Studies at Harvard, said he believed there was a "tectonic shift" that was dividing Latin America three ways — a northern sphere encompassing Mexico, Central America and the Caribbean; a southern part based in the large countries of South America; and an Andean stretch where indigenous leaders were coming to power.

He said that shift had created an instability that had given Mr. Chávez an opportunity to win over other countries to his thinking, particularly as long as he can tap Venezuela's oil proceeds for his political goals.

Arturo Valenzuela, the director of Georgetown's Center for Latin American Studies, said he thought the divisions were serious, but not as deep as the ideological schism that befell the region during the cold war when many countries were ruled by military dictatorships.

Many Auto Makers Miss Targets For Emissions Cuts In Europe (WSJ)

By William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

BRUSSELS -- About three-quarters of auto makers are failing to improve fuel efficiency to meet Europe's voluntary targets to cut carbon-dioxide emissions, according to an environmental group's study.

The European Federation for Transport and Environment produced the study to heat up a debate over whether the European Commission should impose mandatory emissions cuts for automobiles. The federation backs mandatory controls, while the commission has set only voluntary targets.

"As long as 75% of car makers go unpunished for their failure, we will never make the necessary progress," said Aat Peterse, director of the Clean Cars Program for the transport federation, a nongovernmental group based in Brussels with member organizations in 20 countries.

Any effort to impose new rules on the auto industry is likely to meet resistance from individual governments. The European Parliament's environment committee voted last month to delay compliance with CO2 standards to 2011 from 2008, saying auto makers needed the time to develop technologies.

The spokeswoman for the European Automobile Manufacturers Association, Sigrid de Vries, said she hadn't yet seen the report, but that it was wrong to single out individual companies, explaining that some car makers emphasize large fuel-consuming vehicles, while others concentrate on small, fuel-efficient ones.

DOJ_NMG_0086028

In August, the European Commission, the executive arm of the European Union, told car makers they must do more to cut CO2 emissions in new vehicles and threatened to impose regulations after revealing that 2004 average emissions -- at 12.4% below 1995 levels -- were well below industry commitments to cut emissions 25% by 2008.

"The situation is not satisfactory," said Günter Verheugen, commission vice president and commissioner for enterprise and industry. "We expect that industry sticks to its commitments."

Japanese and German car makers led the new study's list of worst performers. Nissan Motor Co., Suzuki Motor Corp. and Mazda Motor Corp. registered well above the rate of European standard. Volkswagen AG, Europe's biggest car maker by sales, has improved fuel efficiency at less than half the rate needed, the study says.

In contrast, other European and U.S. manufacturers made progress. Fiat SpA, Renault SA, Peugeot SA are on track to meet or exceed targets by 2008. Ford Motor Co. and General Motors Corp.'s Opel division also come out well. In Europe, both companies concentrate on small and midsize cars.

Vietnam's Roaring Economy Is Set For World Stage (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam — Nearly four decades ago, South Vietnamese leaders mapped out their battle plans inside the presidential palace here. When they lost the war, the palace became the base for the Ho Chi Minh City People's Committee, which worked to impose tight Communist control.

But in September it was the scene of a very different gathering: a board meeting of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

In the three decades since Vietnam has gone from communism to a form of capitalism, it has begun surpassing many neighbors. It has Asia's second-fastest-growing economy, with 8.4 percent growth last year, trailing only China's, and the pace of exports to the United States is rising faster than even China's.

American companies like Intel and Nike, and investors across the region, are pouring billions of dollars into the country; overseas Vietnamese are returning to run the ventures.

In the latest sign of Vietnam's economic vitality, trade negotiators from around the world are preparing, after more than a decade of talks, to put the finishing touches on an agreement, possibly by Oct. 26, for Vietnam to join the World Trade Organization. President Bush, President Hu Jintao of China, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia and other heads of state plan to come to Hanoi in mid-November for an Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit meeting.

For Vietnam, the meeting will be a coming-out party, critical to its pride in much the way the 2008 Olympics in Beijing are for China.

"I think they are the next China," said Michael R. P. Smith, chief executive of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. "It's not the scale of China, but it's a significant economy."

Through the end of last year; Vietnam's growth rate exceeded that of Thailand, Malaysia, Taiwan, South Korea and even India, its closest rival.

The latest Asian economic tiger, Vietnam now produces and uses more cement than France, its former colonial ruler. The main index for the Ho Chi Minh City stock market and a smaller exchange in Hanoi have nearly doubled in value this year. Vietnam has become the talk of investment bankers and investors across Asia.

But with such growth has come controversy, here and in the United States. Republicans in Congress are divided over a coming vote soon after the midterm elections: Should the United States grant permanent, full trade relations to Vietnam, given the two countries' history and Vietnam's current position, where it sells almost nine times as much to Americans as it buys?

Corporate America is divided, too, over a Bush administration initiative to win votes for full trade status by throwing a bone late in September to Southern senators representing states where textiles are made. Vietnamese officials are furious with Washington over what they see as a last-minute protectionist attempt to limit the exports of their country's booming garment industry.

DOJ_NMG_0086029

In Vietnam, nearly double-digit growth is starting to produce the same shortages of skilled labor as in India and China. Executives at multinationals like Groupe Lafarge of France and Prudential of Britain say that local accountants, human relations managers and other professionals are so scarce that salaries are soaring 30 percent to 50 percent a year.

Many educated Vietnamese now are like Ha Nguyen, 34, a chemical engineer who is working at his third job in three years, having received big raises each time he changed companies. "Right now, it's easy in Vietnam to find a job," he said, pausing while doing a chemical analysis of cement quality at a corporate laboratory here.

Roads and ports in this country are increasingly choked with cars and ships, the congestion worse than China's but not yet as bad as India's. Yet deep-seated corruption has slowed construction; the government has put the brakes on highway building across northern Vietnam this year after uncovering a graft scandal that led to resignations and detentions all the way to the top of the Transport Ministry.

Balanced against these problems is a government that, like China's, has embraced capitalism after becoming disillusioned with the widespread poverty and sometimes hunger that accompanied tight state control of the economy.

Economic liberalization policies have been pursued in earnest since the early 90's, after poor harvests and economic mismanagement left millions facing malnutrition in 1990.

Among the architects of this change are a handful of bright economists like Le Dang Doanh, a top adviser to the government and the Communist Party who studied in the old Soviet Union and East Germany but became deeply disillusioned with the corruption and inefficiency of state-owned industries.

"The reform is definitely irreversible," Mr. Doanh said. "Any attempt to come back to a centrally planned economy, to overplay the state sector, is economically irrational, inefficient and psychologically is counterproductive."

If anything, Vietnam has leaned in the other direction. The Finance Ministry has just produced a draft personal-taxation law, expected to be approved by January, that offers more tax breaks for the wealthy than the United States does. Inheritances among immediate family members will be entirely exempt from taxation. So will interest on all but the largest bank accounts, and a fierce debate is under way over whether capital gains should be taxed.

And in some ways, Vietnam is more pro-business than China. Reluctant to anger city dwellers, state-owned power companies in China minimize blackouts in residential areas but cut off power to factories as much as three days a week, forcing them to run on costly diesel generators.

Vietnam takes the opposite course. Takashima Masayuki, general director of a Japanese-owned factory that makes shirts and jackets in Bien Hoa city, said the factory did not even have a generator because the authorities never allowed power to be cut off in the industrial zone where it is situated. By contrast, Ho Chi Minh City residents say they have brief power interruptions as often as twice a day.

Like China and India, Vietnam has benefited enormously from the return of a diaspora — people who had fled the country. Thousands of overseas Vietnamese have come home after learning English, gaining entrepreneurial experience and acquiring technical skills.

Phu Than, Intel's country manager for Vietnam and Indochina, was 14 when he was evacuated in the last days before the fall of Saigon, leaving by helicopter with his mother, an employee of the old American Consulate in Danang.

He earned an electrical engineering degree from the University of California, Davis, then joined Intel and now oversees the largest foreign investment in Vietnam, the construction of a semiconductor assembly and test factory that will cost $300 million for the first phase and another $300 million for a likely expansion later.

American businesses are catching on to Vietnam's attractions, but they still lag behind Taiwan companies, which are the biggest foreign investors in Vietnam, followed by Singapore.

Vietnam's appeal to foreign companies rests on its young labor pool. Three-fifths of its 84 million people are under 27. And with a policy of limiting families to two children, as distinct from China's one, Vietnam will continue for many years to have a large proportion of hard-working low-skill employees.

Typical is Nguyen Thi Hong, 30, who rides each morning on her rusty bicycle to stand outside factories and look for work in Bien Hoa, 15 miles northeast of Ho Chi Minh City; in China, factories advertise far and wide even for unskilled workers.

DOJ_NMG_0086030

A brightly patterned kerchief protecting her from air pollution, Mrs. Hong said she and her husband, a mechanic who has found work here, have left their year-old son with his parents in their hometown in the central part of the country.

Vietnam has reduced the percentage of its people living in abject poverty — less than $1 a day — to 8 percent from 51 percent in 1990, a greater advance than either China or India.

But incomes are still far short of Western levels. Few of these Vietnamese can afford to eat American beef or fly in Boeing jets. The country's trade surplus with the United States has soared — it exported $5.56 billion worth of goods to the American market in the first eight months of this year while importing $625.9 million.

That imbalance, much of it in the garment industry, has complicated the Bush administration's effort to persuade lawmakers to approve normal trade relations with Vietnam. The administration tried to shore up support by sending a letter on Sept. 28 to two Republican senators, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, saying that the Commerce Department may file its own antidumping cases against low-price shipments of Vietnamese clothing without waiting for American companies to do so.

But the letter has upset retailers and other importers, who worry that they may end up paying any punitive duties that are imposed.

"The retail industry is really split on this," said Brad Figel, the government affairs director at Nike, which remains in favor of the bill and is seeking clarification of administration policy.

Antidumping duties are an emotional issue in Vietnam, after the United States imposed them on catfish exports three years ago and the European Union recently imposed them on Vietnamese and Chinese shoe exports. Vietnamese officials warn that dumping cases could hurt the regulatory environment for American businesses and cause layoffs at garment factories, where most workers are low-income women.

"These people suffered from the war a lot already, and we would not want them to suffer again," said Nguyen Anh Tuan, vice director of Vietnam's Foreign Investment Agency. "American investors should not lose their foothold in Vietnam."

Talk to garment-factory workers in Vietnam these days, though, and they are looking forward to a future where their children live far better than they do. "My parents were very poor," said Nguyen Thu Hoai, 28, said as she folded green Nike jackets in a state-owned factory in Ho Chi Minh City.

"But I will be able to give my son a good education," she said, describing a modest Prudential life insurance policy she bought for her 2-year-old son that includes a savings fund for educational expenses. "He will have more opportunities."

A Mercenary Force For Darfur (WSJ)

By Max Boot

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Mercenaries used to dominate warfare. The "Hessians" who served Britain in our War for Independence (many were actually from other German states) became notorious among the colonists, but foreigners formed a major part of every army in the world until the French Revolution. Their outlook was pithily expressed by a 17th-century soldier who said: "We serve our master honestly, it is no matter what master we serve."

And they did provide good service. It was thanks largely to "free lances" (the origin of that now common term) that absolute monarchs managed to consolidate their power in Europe and carve out vast overseas empires. Private entities like the Dutch and English East India Companies even marshaled their own armies and navies to defend their domains.

But with the rise of nationalism in the 19th century, soldiers of fortune fell into disfavor. The assumption became prevalent that it was honorable to fight for one's country, even if compelled to do so via a draft, but dishonorable to fight for a paycheck.

Yet mercenaries remain abundant. Some serve nation states -- for instance the Nepalese Gurkhas in the British and Indian armies. Many more are employed by companies such as DynCorp, Vinnell and Blackwater, all of whom vociferously resist the "mercenary" label; they prefer to be called security companies or private military firms.

Call them what you will, such outfits have grown in importance as the armed forces of the U.S. and other countries downsized after the end of the Cold War. Today, from Afghanistan to Iraq, much of the logistical support for American troops is provided by Halliburton subsidiary KBR.

DOJ_NMG_0086031

Hired hands aren't just serving chow or cleaning latrines. They're also carrying guns to safeguard supply convoys, buildings and VIPs. Even many U.S. ambassadors are protected by private bodyguards. Our man in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, never leaves home without his heavily armed Blackwater detail.

Peter Singer, a fellow at the Brookings Institution and author of "Corporate Warriors," estimates that at least 20,000 private gunslingers have been employed in Iraq alone. Among foreign troop contingents, they are second in number -- and in casualties -- only to the U.S. military. Mr. Singer quips: "President George W. Bush's 'coalition of the willing' might thus be more aptly described as the 'coalition of the billing.'"

Many of these contractors, largely veterans of Western and Soviet bloc militaries, have performed bravely in trying circumstances. But they have also caused their share of problems. There have been numerous scandals over firms charging too much or not delivering what they promised. Even more pervasive have been complaints about guards running wild. In their black body armor and armored Chevy Suburbans, contractors are notorious for careening through traffic and firing wildly, not caring who gets hurt as long as they reach their destination.

Yet, for all their shortcomings, there is no way to end our reliance on privateers -- at least not without a big increase in military end-strength, which is needed but not likely. And they can actually perform valuable work that we won't send our own troops to do.

Case in point: Darfur. A force of 7,000 lightly armed African Union peacekeepers has been helpless to stop the genocide being carried out in this region of the Sudan. Odds are that a contingent of U.N. blue helmets, if and when they finally arrive, won't do much better. Why not turn to the private sector?

Mercenaries have committed their share of abuses in Africa. (See "The Wild Geese" and "The Dogs of War," both based on real events in the 1950s and 1960s, the heyday of "Mad" Mike Hoare, "Black" Jacques Schramme and other notorious swashbucklers). But they have also been effective in stopping human-rights abuses.

In 1995-96, Executive Outcomes, a South African firm working for the government of Sierra Leone, made short work of a savage rebel movement known as the Revolutionary United Front that was notorious for chopping off the limbs of its victims. As a result, Sierra Leone was able to hold its first free election in decades. The now-defunct Executive Outcomes also helped the Angolan government quell a long-running insurgency by Jonas Savimbi's Unita, leading to the signing of a peace accord in 1994. Another private firm, MPRI, helped to bring peace to the former Yugoslavia in 1995 by organizing the Croatian military offensive that stopped Serbian aggression.

Hired guns could be equally effective in stopping the campaign of rape, murder and ethnic cleansing carried out by the Sudanese government and the janjaweed militia in Darfur. In fact, several firms have already offered their services. They could be employed by an international organization like the U.N. or NATO, by an ad hoc group of concerned nations, or even by philanthropists like Bill Gates or George Soros.

Critics complain that mercenaries didn't provide long-term fixes. Sierra Leone, for instance, fell back into brutal warfare after Executive Outcomes left. But that's because the mercenaries were on short-term contracts; they might have created more lasting stability if they had been given longer-term employment.

Many also worry about abuses committed by mercenaries, who in some cases have tried to plunder or even take over small states. But the record of privateers compares favorably with that of U.N. peacekeeping forces, which have been distinguished more by their propensity for committing sex crimes than by any success in keeping the peace. To deal with potential abuses, private fighters could be hired under a contract that would hold them liable for war crimes in the International Criminal Court or some other jurisdiction. That would make them more accountable than U.N. forces, which operate with almost complete impunity.

Sending mercenaries to Africa isn't politically correct. But it would be a lot more useful than sending more aid money that will be wasted or passing ineffectual resolutions that will be ignored.

Mr. Boot, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, is the author of "War Made New: Technology, Warfare, and the Course of History, 1500 to Today," published last week by Gotham Books.

The Really Cold War (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0086032

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Berlin

The Berlin Wall fell almost 17 years ago. At the time, the future seemed clear: The fall of the wall would unleash an unstoppable tide of free markets and free people — and for about 15 years it did just that. Today, though, when you stand where the Berlin Wall once stood and look east, you see a countertide coming your way. It is a black tide of petro-authoritarianism emanating from Russia, and it is blunting the Berlin Wall tide of free markets and free people.

Why? Russia is a classic example of what I like to call "the First Law of Petropolitics," which posits that the price of oil and the pace of freedom operate in an inverse relationship in petrolist states — states with weak institutions and a high dependence on oil for their G.D.P. As the price of oil goes down, the pace of freedom goes up. The day the Soviet Union collapsed the price of oil was near $16 a barrel. And as the price of oil goes up the pace of freedom goes down. Today, Russia's president, Vladimir Putin, flush with surging oil and gas profits, is crushing domestic opponents, renationalizing major energy companies, throwing out Western human rights groups and generally making himself the big man on campus in Europe.

When Europeans tell you that they fear a new "cold war," this time they really are talking about the temperature — and the fear that Russia, if it wanted to turn off the gas, could make Europeans very cold. About 40 percent of Europe's natural gas imports come from Russia, and that is expected to grow to 70 percent by 2030.

With prices high, Russia has gone from the sick man of Europe to the boss man. Russia is a having a much bigger impact on Western Europe "with gas pipelines than it ever had with SS-20" long-range nuclear missiles, remarked the German foreign-policy expert Josef Joffe, author of the smart book "Überpower: The Imperial Temptation of America."

"Ten years ago we thought Russia was out of it," Mr. Joffe said. "We knew it was going to come back. But suddenly, out of the blue, with the rise in oil prices, it is back on stage, and this time it's much more skillful. The image we have of Russia is [the port of] Murmansk, where the Russian fleet is rotting — but power comes in many forms." And the most popular form today is oil and gas.

Goodbye NATO, hello Citgo.

The other day, the BBC quoted a senior "E.U. insider" as saying of European Union leaders: "You know what happens when they get in the same room with Putin?" They all prostrate themselves "and say, 'I love you, Vladimir.' " The BBC was reporting about a tense summit meeting last Friday in the Finnish town of Lahti. E.U. leaders reportedly beseeched Mr. Putin to honor contracts with Western oil companies, as well as to ease his crackdown on press freedoms, on human rights groups in Russia and on Georgia, and to investigate the murder of a crusading Russian journalist.

What the E.U. wants, a senior German official explained, is to be able to invest in more Russian oil and gas drilling projects and pipelines upstream, so that Russian and E.U. energy interests will be so intertwined Russia will never consider turning off the gas. Mr. Putin wants Gazprom, the giant Russian gas company, to be able to buy into more downstream consumer operations in Europe. That way Russia could dominate the industry from its oilfields all the way to the gas meters of Berlin and Brussels. Right now, the two sides are in a standoff.

"We cannot allow energy to divide Europe as communism once did," José Manuel Barroso, the European Commission president, told The Financial Times. But it is.

In fairness to Mr. Putin, turnabout is fair play. After the Soviet Union collapsed and Russia was enfeebled, the U.S. and the E.U. crammed NATO expansion down his throat. He's now using petro-power to push back. "Russia is very different from Venezuela or Saudi Arabia," remarked Clemens Wergin, an editorial writer at the German daily Der Tagesspiegel. Russia has nukes and oil, he noted, and therefore has the potential to play a much more domineering geopolitical role in Europe.

German officials don't really think Russia is about to turn off the gas if it doesn't get its way on some issue. After all, it never did that during the old cold war, and Russia today is much more dependent on Western markets. But still, centuries of uneasy relations between Europe and Russia make German officials queasy about how dependent they've grown on the Kremlin to heat their homes and offices. Queasy or not, one thing they know for sure: Russia is back. The gas man cometh.

Europe's Muslims (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0086033

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

AYEAR AGO this week, riots erupted in mostly Muslim suburbs of Paris and other French cities, underlining the alienation of a subculture that makes up 8 percent of the country's population but has suffered from chronic unemployment and discrimination. One year later, that alienation -- and the threat of violence that comes with it -- appears to have worsened, not only in France but across Western Europe. French police are facing what some call a "permanent intifada" in Muslim neighborhoods, with nearly 2,500 incidents of violence against officers recorded in the first six months of the year. Some of these now take the form of planned ambushes: On Sunday a gang of youths emptied a bus of its passengers, set it on fire, and then stoned the firefighters who responded.

In Britain, the London bombings of 2005, which were executed in part by native-born Muslims, have been succeeded by this summer's arrest of another group of native extremists who allegedly plotted to blow up airliners. Two Lebanese residents of Germany were accused of trying to bomb passenger trains. The threat of violence by Muslims angered by perceived insults, whether from the German-born pope or the director of a Mozart opera, has become more frequent.

Europeans are slowly growing more aware that a major part of the global struggle against Islamic extremism must take place in their own countries -- and not just in faraway Afghanistan or Iraq. But their governments, media and political elites still appear to be a long way from coming to grips with the challenge. Rather than seeking to address the larger alienation of mainstream Muslims, European leaders often appear to do the opposite -- by challenging the culture of Muslims and defending gratuitous insults of Islam.

One recent but hardly isolated example came from Britain's House of Commons leader, Jack Straw, who criticized Muslim women for wearing veils and said he asked those who visited his office to remove them, on the grounds that they impede "communication." It's hard to believe that veils are the biggest obstacle to communication between British politicians and the country's Muslims; and it's even harder to imagine Mr. Straw raising similar objections about Sikh turbans or Orthodox Jewish dress. True, the Labor Party MP was reflecting -- or maybe pandering to -- the concern of many in Britain about the self-segregation of some Muslims. But veils -- which are also under government attack in France and Italy -- are not the cause of that segregation, much less of terrorism. Attacks on Muslim custom by public officials are more likely to reinforce than to ease the community's alienation.

Mr. Straw and other European politicians could contribute far more to combating radical Islam if they focused on those who actually foment intolerance among European Muslims -- as well as those in the mainstream community who promote prejudice against Arabs and South Asians and their descendants. Muslims in Europe should be invited to embrace the countries where they live on their own terms. They should be expected to respect laws and freedoms. But politicians would do better to work on dismantling the barriers Muslims face in getting educations and jobs rather than those that distinguish Islam from the secular majority.

DOJ_NMG_0086034

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Says U.S. Image Hurt By Actions (FINDLAW/AP) 4
Spain, US Agree Greater Anti-terror Cooperation (AFP-Y) 4
Poor Image: Gonzales Knows It's More Than A Misunderstanding (LONGNJ) 4
Saudi Prisoner Release Gives U.S. Pause (LAT) 5
Court Again Rejects Part Of Canada's Antiterror Laws (NYT) 7

Homeland Response:

FBI Hit For Anthrax 'Dead-ends' (WT) 7
Anthrax Mystery And Misery Linger For Postal Workers (WP) 8
Traveler Program In Demand (USAT) 9
More 9/11 Remains Found At Ground Zero (AP-Y) 9
Analysis: Whites Challenged Katrina Insurers More (USAT/AP) 10
Safer, Stronger, Smarter (USAT) 11
New Orleans Plan: Rebuild In Flood Zones, Hand You The Bill (USAT) 11

War News:

General Weighs 2nd Troop Shift To Calm Baghdad (NYT) 12
More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound (WP) 14
Iraqis To Plan Timeline For Reducing Violence (LAT) 16
U.S. Shifts Onus To Iraqis To Find Political Solution (WSJ) 17
No Major Troop Cut In Iraq For A Year (USAT) 18
Iraqi Takeover Target Set (WT) 19
U.S. Says More GIs May Be Needed In Iraq (AP-Y) 20
Iraqi Realities Undermine The Pentagon's Predictions (NYT) 21
More Troops Means More Targets For Snipers (USAT) 23
Envoy Says Not All Is Bad In Iraq (AP) 24
Gen. Pace Optimistic About Iraq Progress (AP-Y) 25
Lawmakers Warm To Plan For Divided Iraq (HILL) 26
The Beltway Retreat (WSJ) 27
Insult To Injury In Iraq (WP) 28
Success In Iraq Possible, Say US Officials (FT) 29
Announcement Draws Skeptical Reaction In U.S. (MCT) 30
Another Bin Laden Victory (WT) 31
Calling Again For Troop Withdrawal (WP) 32
Running Against Themselves (NYT) 33
The Hard Way Out (WP) 34
'All Over The Place' (WP) 35
Idle Contractors Add Millions To Iraq Rebuilding (NYT) 36
Halliburton Cited For Iraq Overhead (WP) 37
Halliburton Will Sell 17% Of Its KBR Unit (WSJ) 38
Iran's Supreme Leader Seeks Calm In Iraq (AP) 38
No Word On Soldier Missing In Baghdad (AP) 39
Military Mounts Search For Missing U.S. Soldier (WP) 39
Troops Fortify Hold On Plant That Once Housed Insurgents (WP) 40
Military Trains Personnel In Advisory Roles (LAT) 41
Grass-Roots Group Of Troops Petitions Congress For Pullout From Iraq (WP) 43
War Critics Try To Recruit Military (AP-Y) 43
Inside The Beltway (WT) 44
War On West Shifts Back To Afghanistan (LAT) 45
Pakistan's Sovereignty (WSJ) 47
A Border Affair (WSJ) 47

Corporate Scandals:

First Senior Executive Admits Options Fraud (FT) 49
Comverse's Former Finance Chief Pleads Guilty (WSJ) 49
Comverse Ex-CFO Names Jacob Alexander In Guilty Plea (Update3) (BLOOM) 50
Former Comverse CFO Pleads Guilty To Backdating Scheme (LAW) 52
Former Top Comverse Official Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud (AFP) 52
End Of Enron's Saga Brings Era To A Close (WP) 52
NEC Probed Over Delay In Filing Results (FT) 54
Going In-House? It Might Be A Wise Move (LAW) 54
Study Finds Options Scandal Has Cost Companies Billions (MERCN) 57
Throwing Back The Big Fish (NYT) 57

Criminal Law:

Hastert Wants Fast Action On Foley (CHIT) 58
Hastert Urges Quick Action On Foley (AP-Y) 59
Hastert, Reynolds Testify About GOP's Handling Of Foley Case (WP) 60
Speaker Testifies In Foley Ethics Inquiry (NYT) 61
Hastert, Reynolds Testify To Ethics Panel (HILL) 62
Lawmaker's Influence In Land Deals Probed (WP) 62
Congressman From Arizona Is The Focus Of An Inquiry (NYT) 63
Experts: Ban Won't Stop Online Gambling (AP) 63
Ex-Refco CFO Accused Of Defrauding Investors Of $1 Billion (AP) 65
Drug Raid Yields Los Alamos Documents (SFC/AP) 66

Safavian Argues For No Jail Time In Abramoff Case (AP) 66
Cannon Writes Judge On Behalf Of Convicted Former Chief Of Staff (SLT)..... 67
Suburban Mayor Enters Plea In Bribes Case (CHIT)..... 68
Niles Mayor Pleads Not Guilty (BVND)..... 68
Verdicts In Murder Of Times Reporter (NYT)..... 68
D.C. Man Guilty In Reporter's Slaying (WP)..... 69
Pieces Of Art Collection Were Someone Else's (NYT) 70
FBI Wants Help Finding Stolen Power Line Maintenance Trucks (AP)..... 71
U.S. Launches Probes Into Fraud Cases (MERCN) 71
Financial Firms Join Data-Security Program (WSJ)..... 72
Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Web Scam (OREG) 73
U.S. Investigates Church Music Director (NYT) 73
Pornography In The Anglican Church? (NBC) 74
Former Trooper Expected To Plead To Luring Teen (BOSH)..... 74
Crime Drops After Increase In Officers (WP)..... 74
Ohio Executes Cult Leader For 5 Killings (FINDLAW/AP) 75
Police Reviewing Claims Against Delegate (BSUN) 75
Creative Crooks As Shoplifters Use High-Tech Scams, Retail Losses Rise (WSJ) 76

Civil Law:

Latest Round In Web Porn Law Fight Begins (LAW) 79
More FOIA Funds, Staff Needed, Group Says (GOVEXEC) 81
Research Group Questions 'rosy' Report On Agencies' FOIA Progress (FEDTIMES)..... 82
Dana Gets More Time For Bonus Plan (DOW) 82
Bankrupt Opposition (WSJ) 83

Civil Rights:

NAACP Decries Fine For Couture (RTD)..... 84
Two Jailers Indicted, Another Pleads Guilty In Inmate Assaults (AP)..... 84
Federal Oversight Of Mental Health Plan To Be Lifted (HONADV) 85
Studies Look For Reasons Behind Racial Disparities In Health Care (WP)..... 85
Virginia Battle On Same-sex 'Marriage' Down To Wire (WT)..... 86

Antitrust:

Carlyle-Led Steel Deal Spotlights Unheralded Side Of Private Equity (WSJ)..... 88
If Sergio Leone Made A Movie About Antitrust . (WSJ)..... 88
Thomson Nears Plan To Put Learning Unit On Block (WSJ)..... 89
EU Probes Guarantee For Loan To TVO (AP)..... 90

Environment:

Hopes Brighten For Curb On Damaging Ocean Fishing (CSM) . 91
EU, U.S. Meet In Finland To Discuss Climate Change, Environmental Issues (FINDLAW/AP)..... 92
Oil-, Gas-Lease Sales Halted In Gulf Coast (WSJ)..... 92
Louisiana And U.S. In Accord To Review Gulf Drilling Plans (NYT) 93
Governor Is Blunt To Bush (LAT) 93
L.A. County Beaches Ranked Foulest In State (LAT)..... 95

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New E-mail Scam Using FBI Name (AP) 96
E-Mail Hoax Claims To Be From FBI (ABC)..... 96
Feds Arrest Three, Seize $27M In Cocaine And Ice (ATBC)..... 97
Neighbors Aghast At Drug Bust Rental House In Clayton Full Of 'Ice' (AJC)..... 97
DEA Seizes $27 Million In Meth, Cocaine (ND)..... 98
Drug Bust Nets Meth, Thousands In Cash (WSB) 99
Record Drug Bust In Clayton Co. (WXIA)..... 99
Second Internet Pharmacy Closed (NOTP) 99
Texas Drug-run Ends In 5 Arrests, Half-ton Of Pot (FWCOM).. 100
4 Face Charges After Raid Of Green Cross Dispensary (DB) .. 101
Imported Meth: State's New Scourge? (INDYSTAR) 102
Doctor Gets Long Sentence For 'prescription Mill' (FLJOURNAL)103
FLINT: Doctor Gets 328 Years For Giving Drugs To Addicts (FREEP)..... 104
Alleged Pot Farmer, After A Smug Remark, Hears The Feds' Retort (STNIA) 104
Convicted Doc Accuses Feds Of Double Cross (MDH) 105
Pot Trial Pushes A Hot Button (FRESBEE)..... 106
White House To Seek More Colombia Aid (KCS) 107
Colombia Aid To Stay Same Despite Rights Allegations (MH) . 108
Colombia, US Examine Drug Plan (PRENSA) 109
Rumsfeld Urged To Fight Afghan Opium (AP) 109
Senator Seeks Change In Afghan Drug Policy (UPI) 109

Immigration:

DNA Testing A Mixed Bag For Immigrants (WP) 110

Tax:

Tax Breaks For Football (WP) 111

Congress-Administration:

Feds Ease Limits On Same-sex Schools (AP)..... 112
Federal Rules Back Single-Sex Public Education (NYT) 113
Schools May Offer More Single-Sex Classes Under New U.S. Regulations (WP)..... 115
Single-sex School Restrictions Ease (USAT)..... 115
Public Schools Sanctioned For Single-sex Classes (WT)..... 116
Failing Schools Fighting Back (WP)..... 117
National Medicaid Transport Probed (WT) 118
Panel Plans Ways To Narrow Tax Gap (WSJ)..... 119
Where It's Always Christmas (WP)..... 120
Diplomacy Turns A Profit (WP)..... 121
White House's Chief Usher Is Bowing Out (WP)..... 122
Trademark Office To Experiment With Telecommuting (WP) ... 123
Face Facts (NYT)..... 124

Other News:

US Stocks Quiet As Fed Meets (FT) 125
Dow Edges Higher To Another Record Despite Rising Oil Prices, Fed Concern (WSJ)..... 126
How Much Is Too Much? (WP)..... 126
Winter-Heating Bills Are Tough To Forecast (WSJ)..... 128
Judge Rules Against Boy's Circumcision (CHIT)..... 129
Hip-Hop Editor Wins Suit Over Her Firing (WP)..... 130
Bush Campaigns On Pocketbook Issues (AP-Y) 130

DOJ_NMG_0086036

In Sarasota, Bush Urges GOP Faithful To Get Out The Vote (HTRIB) ... 132
President Brings His Clout To Boost Florida Hopefuls (MH) ... 136
President Says Democrats Are 'Disposed' To Increase Taxes (WP) ... 137
Bush Battles For GOP Dominance (LAT) ... 138
President's Boca Visit Pulls In $1 Million (PALMBEACHP) ... 139
Bush Stops By Boca Raton, Raises A Cool Million For GOP (FLSUNSEN) ... 139
Social Security Enters Elections (WP) ... 140
Bush Finding Welcome Mats As G.O.P. Looks For An Edge (NYT) ... 141
Bush Welcome To Raise Cash, But No Pictures And No Press (WT) ... 142
Bush Should Focus On Korea (HILL) ... 143
Bush Advisers Blitz Radio Airwaves (AP) ... 144
Radio Hosts Get Closer To The White House -- If Only Physically (WP) ... 145
White House Hosts Mass Talk Radio Event (USAT) ... 146
The GOP Leans On A Proven Strategy (WP) ... 146
Republican Base Loses Faith (CSM) ... 148
Disillusioned Insider's Book Tests Bush's Image As 'Pastor-in-Chief' Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ) ... 150
Rove Upbeat About GOP Money, GOTV (HILL) ... 151
Democrats Won't Count Votes Before They're Cast (WT) ... 152
Democrats May Be Poised To Win, But They're Still Lost (WP) 153
Democrat Waxman Could Give The Bush Administration Fits (MCT) ... 154
Voters' Doubts About Sharing In Prosperity Send A Danger Signal (WSJ) ... 155
NRCC Targets 33 Districts (HILL) ... 156
Upping The Dosage Fearing A Democratic Victory, Drug Makers Fund Key Races (WSJ) ... 158
Trio Of Linked Districts Could Make Florida Pivotal To House Takeover (HILL) ... 160
GOP Incumbents Use Tough Underdog Tactics (HILL) ... 161
Hayworth Goads Mr. Nice Guy Into Fight In Arizona-5 (HILL) ... 163
Though Weakened, New Orleans Lawmaker Is Ebullient And Defiant (NYT) ... 164
A Congressional Endorsement (NYT) ... 166
Taylor Still Holds Land (HILL) ... 166
My Friend, Bob Ney (HILL) ... 167
Poll: Senate Within Dems' Grasp, But Pitfalls Remain (LAT) ... 168
GOP Pumps Money Into Mo., Va. Races (AP-Y) ... 170
Senate Could Be Evenly Split Once Again (AP) ... 171
All Eyes On South's Big Race (CSM) ... 171
A Contentious Campaign In A Battleground State (WP) ... 173
Rush Limbaugh On The Offensive Against Ad With Michael J. Fox (WP) ... 175
Limbaugh Says Actor Fox Exaggerating His Disease As Stem Cell Issue Churns (USAT) ... 176
Making Stem Cell Issue Personal, And Political (NYT) ... 177
With 2 Weeks To Go, Allen, Webb Ad Blitz Hits A Higher Gear (WP) ... 178
GOP's Kennedy Sticks To Iraq Stance In Unique Ad (MINNST) 179
A Sense Of Service Sustained By Family, Faith (WP) ... 179
Michael Steele For U.S. Senate (WT) ... 182
Report Warns Of Potential Voting Problems In 10 States (WP) 183
Some GOP Lobby Shops Hold Fast As Nov. 7 Looms (HILL) ... 183
For Governor In Maryland (WP) ... 185
U.S. Muslims Mostly Democrats (WT) ... 186
Cheney Says Clinton Could Win Presidency (AP) ... 187
Cheney: Sen. Clinton Is 'formidable Candidate' (USAT) ... 187
Cheney Says Clinton Could Win Presidency (LAT) ... 188
Casting For West Wing (LAT) ... 189
When It Comes To Politics, Charlie Cook Has The Prophecy Market Cornered (WP) ... 190
Tuition Outpaces Inflation (NYT) ... 191
Spikes In College Price Tags Not So Sharp (WP) ... 191
As Tuition Soars, Federal Aid To College Students Falls (WSJ) 192
College Aid Is Up, But Tuitions Are, Too (USAT) ... 194
Spitzer Is Good For Business (WSJ) ... 195
Rice Says 'Axis Of Evil' Proven Right (AP) ... 195
Bolton: Sanctions 'help Regime Change' (FT) ... 196
West Wants Iran Technology Sales Banned (AP) ... 197
N Korea 'has No Plan Yet' For Second Test (FT) ... 198
China Says N. Korea Not Planning Test (AP) ... 198
China And US Closing Ranks Over North Korea Issue: US (AFP) ... 199
Rice Proposes Asia Form Security Alliance (WT) ... 200
Test Sparks N. Korea Backlash In Japan (AP) ... 201
General Says U.S. Could Beat N. Korea (AP) ... 202
Across South Korea, Softer Feelings Toward The North (NYT) 203
Pre-emptive Attack On Hamas Eyed (WT) ... 204
Kidnapped AP Photographer Freed In Gaza (AP) ... 205
The Wrong Partner In Israel (NYT) ... 206
Iran, Syria Rebuild Hezbollah (WT) ... 206
Pentagon Official Sentenced In Arms Sale (AP-Y) ... 207
Chavez Could Support Bolivia As Alternative U.N. Candidate (WSJ/AP) ... 207
Venezuela Denies Ending U.N. Bid (WP) ... 208
Venezuela Diatribe Backfires (NYT) ... 208
Many Auto Makers Miss Targets For Emissions Cuts In Europe (WSJ) ... 210
Vietnam's Roaring Economy Is Set For World Stage (NYT) ... 210
A Mercenary Force For Darfur (WSJ) ... 212
The Really Cold War (NYT) ... 213
Europe's Muslims (WP) ... 214

DOJ_NMG_0086037

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Says U.S. Image Hurt By Actions (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ciaran Giles, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

(AP) - MADRID, Spain-U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday he believes some of the U.S. actions in its war on terror have done damage to the image of the United States abroad, particularly its commitment to the rule of law.

The U.S. has drawn criticism around the world for the Abu Ghraib prison scandal in Iraq, its treatment of detainees and secret renditions of terrorism suspects to clandestine prisons in allied countries where they are allegedly tortured.

"The notion that the United States does not fully support the rule of law is one I find very disappointing," Gonzales told reporters, especially given that President Bush "believes the Unites States is the leader, is a beacon of hope in the world and it's important that our actions should reflect a total commitment to the rule of law."

He blamed the country's deteriorating image on misunderstanding in Europe about what the U.S. is doing to fight terrorism.

"Part of the misunderstanding is the fault of the United States in the sense that we need to be out there more, talking about what we are doing and why," he said.

Gonzales was in Madrid for the sixth meeting of a working group set up two years ago to coordinate the fight against terrorism and other police matters.

Gonzales dismissed criticism that prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay detention facility were in legal limbo and said the recent Military Commissions Act ensured fair trials for terrorists and guarantees that evidence acquired through torture will not be used.

"The Military Commissions Act reflects a careful balance by our Congress to respect the rights of terrorists to receive a fair trial but to do so at a time when we are still at war with the enemy," Gonzales said.

Bush signed the act into law last week after a highly publicized dispute with key Republicans over the terms of the legislation. Civil libertarians and leading Democrats have decried the law as a violation of American values.

Spain, US Agree Greater Anti-terror Cooperation (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 25, 2006

Spain and the United States agreed to ramp up cooperation against terrorism and organized crime during a visit by US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the interior ministry said.

The agreement came during talks between Gonzales and Spanish Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba, it said.

Washington offered to make technology which the US Federal Bureau of Investigation uses to index DNA samples available to Spanish police.

Spanish Justice Minister Juan Fernando Lopez Aguilar told reporters after the meeting, which also saw Gonzales confer with Spanish counterpart Candido Conde-Pumpido, that judicial cooperation between the two nations was "excellent."

He added that they were committed to "achieving good long-term results" in fighting terror.

Gonzales said the United States was sometimes "misunderstood" in Europe and it had to "talk more" to explain its position on security.

Asked if Spain was prepared to countenance handing over terror suspects to US military courts, Aguilar told Spanish media that Spain was determined to protect its citizens' rights at all times.

Gonzales did not address a decision last year by the Spanish Supreme Court to overturn a six-year prison sentence for Al-Qaeda membership handed down in October 2005 to a former Spanish inmate at the US base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

In a separate case, the high court this month acquitted a Moroccan former inmate of Guantanamo who also had been accused of Al-Qaeda membership.

Poor Image: Gonzales Knows It's More Than A Misunderstanding (LONGNJ)

Longview (TX) News-Journal, October 25, 2006

Alberto Gonzales, who once made headlines when he authored legal arguments that President Bush had the authority to authorize torture, is now disappointed by our nation's sagging reputation.

Gonzales, then the White House counsel but now the U.S. Attorney General, was in Spain for a meeting of an international working group created two years ago to coordinate the fight against terrorism and deal with other global law enforcement issues. While there, he told reporters, "The notion that the United States does not fully support the rule of law is one I find very disappointing."

According to an Associated Press report, the nation's top lawyer added that Bush "believes the United States is the leader, is a beacon of hope in the world and it's important that our actions should reflect a total commitment to the rule of law."

Of course, Gonzales failed to mention that in order for Bush to live up to his words, he needed to sign legislation last week — the Military Commissions Act — to ensure fair trials for suspected terrorists and assure that evidence garnered through torture will not be used at such trials.

Gonzales told reporters that our country's tarnished image abroad is due to our allies' misunderstandings about what the United States is doing to fight terrorism.

Actually, that tarnished image is due to our allies' growing understanding of measures the United States has taken in its efforts to combat terrorism, including the use of secret prisons abroad, the rendition of prisoners to governments known to use torture and the indefinite detention of people who are suspected but not yet proven terrorists.

Gonzales would like to talk about Bush's "total commitment to the rule of law" but he has often been reticent about discussing the administration's commitment to the spirit of the law. That's because the longtime Bush aide and attorney has played a key role in seeking loopholes that allow the president to sidestep the spirit of the law.

The attorney general's comments were almost laughable when he opined that the way to dispel the "misunderstanding" among our European allies is for the United States "to be out there more, talking about what we are doing and why."

Meanwhile, at home we hear administration officials and supporters raising the specter that members of the media are unpatriotic and possibly traitorous when they report about what the administration is doing — and why.

Of course, when the media reports on the government's actions, the administration loses control of the message. And we all know how important that control is.

It's the administration that decides when retirement accounts are "private" ... until it decides they are personal.

It's the administration that decides how long we will "stay the course" ... until it decides we will no longer do so.

It's also the administration that decides how long we will use the term "cut and run" ... until it is no longer politically profitable to do so.

That's the problem with the Bush administration. We are asked to see things its way, but only as long as its way looks good. If its way of seeing things begins to show some tarnish, then we are told we can no longer see it that way, that it's time to change our point of view.

It's going to be very interesting to see how that approach works if, as many observers of many political viewpoints predict, the Republicans lose control of Congress in the coming election.

Saudi Prisoner Release Gives U.S. Pause (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Rich Connell And Robert J. Lopez

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

U.S. officials, apparently caught off guard by the Saudi government's recent release of more than two dozen former Guantanamo Bay prisoners, are voicing fears that the men will join the camp of violent extremist groups.

The Saudis released the 29 men from jail for observance of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement, with instructions to return to custody by the end of this month.

Saudi officials said that although the men were still under investigation for possible terrorist ties, they were not considered serious threats. "Throwing people in jail and letting them rot is not the answer," said Nail Jubeir, spokesman for the Saudi Embassy in Washington.

But the commander at the sprawling camp here for suspected terrorists is skeptical.

"I'm interested in if they go back to the fight," said Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr. He contends that about 50 of 300 men released since Guantanamo became a prison in 2002 for terrorism suspects have resumed plotting against U.S. interests worldwide, but could identify only one confirmed example.

The kingdom's decision to temporarily release the 29 men illustrates the limits of U.S. influence as the Bush administration seeks to shrink the population of Guantanamo by transferring prisoners to other nations. And it underscores how differently the U.S. and other countries, including Britain and Germany, perceive the danger posed by former detainees.

Of the 437 captives at the U.S. naval base in Cuba, 110 have been cleared for release to their home countries, and more are being added to the list. Officials have said fewer than 100 prisoners will face military tribunals, leaving 200 or more to be repatriated.

Guantanamo has come under increasing criticism from U.S. allies and is dogged by allegations of prisoner abuse. Administration officials say that the camp will be needed for the foreseeable future, but that the ultimate goal is to shut it down.

Some nations have refused to accept Guantanamo detainees, denying responsibility for them or balking at U.S. demands for elaborate security measures on transferred prisoners.

DOJ_NMG_0086039

Critics say the problem has been exacerbated by U.S. failure to plan earlier for releasing prisoners. Lawrence Wilkerson, chief of staff to then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell in President Bush's first term, recalled repeated high-level meetings in which State Department officials pressed the Pentagon to explain its plans for releasing captives from the U.S.-declared war on terrorism.

Wilkerson, now a vocal critic of administration policies on terrorism, said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney "refused to deal with it. For these guys, there was never any idea of final disposition."

In the cases of several British citizens, Wilkerson said, Rumsfeld wanted extensive security measures that the British government refused to accept. The British citizens were transferred anyway, and all were released.

Spokespersons for Rumsfeld and Cheney maintained that the administration had worked steadily, in cooperation with U.S. allies, to release or repatriate detainees while trying to ensure they were treated humanely and wouldn't pose threats later.

"The United States government has no desire to hold detainees any longer than necessary," a Defense Department spokesman said.

More recently, the U.S. and its ally have clashed over nine men at Guantanamo who had lived in Britain but were not citizens. A British court case filed on behalf of the men opened a window on the process when top officials had to file statements, copies of which were obtained by The Times.

Earlier this year, according to court records, U.S. and British officials began discussing the possible release of the men. The British officials said the U.S. expected assurances of extensive, open-ended monitoring and surveillance before they would consider returning the men to Britain. The records show that U.S. officials sought guarantees that intelligence officials would know immediately if the men met with Islamic radicals or made threatening statements.

Even if British officials conducted surveillance, used covert agents and intercepted phone calls, the measures would not have satisfied U.S. officials, according to a declaration by William Nye, head of Britain's counter-terrorism and intelligence directorate.

"None of these techniques, individually or collectively, would have been able to provide the sort of guarantees sought by the U.S.," Nye said.

The nine men, Nye told the court, were not considered enough of a danger to warrant diverting intelligence resources "from those who pose a greater threat to national security."

An appeals court in London backed the British government, which also argued that it could not advocate on behalf of the nine detainees because they were not British citizens. The men remain at Guantanamo.

Critics say the ruling served the interests of both U.S. and British officials by creating the appearance that the countries had tried to hammer out a transfer agreement but were thwarted by legal and security constraints.

"This represents a convenient cover for both parties," said Brent Mickum, a Washington lawyer who represents two of the detainees.

British and U.S. officials declined to discuss any specifics of the diplomatic talks.

In another case, that of Murat Kurnaz, a Turk born and raised in Germany, officials in Berlin initially balked at taking him back after the U.S. approved his transfer in 2002. His case languished until this year, when the new German chancellor, Angela Merkel, raised the issue with Bush.

But the transfer was delayed for several more months, in part because of U.S. demands for extensive surveillance and other security measures to keep tabs on Kurnaz's activities, according to interviews and European media reports.

The measures were rejected by German authorities because they would have created "a collision with German law," said Bernhard Docke, the attorney handling Kurnaz's case in Germany.

Kurnaz finally returned to his hometown of Bremen in August and was briefly placed under investigation for possible ties to Islamic extremists. The Germans have since dropped the case.

A spokesman for the German Embassy in Washington declined to comment.

Detainees from Saudi Arabia make up one of the largest groups at Guantanamo Bay. Saudi prisoners have come under particular scrutiny, in part because of the nation's fundamentalist strain of Islam and the fact that 15 of the 19 men who hijacked airliners in the Sept. 11 attacks were Saudi nationals.

So it was not surprising that the releases for Ramadan raised eyebrows among U.S. officials.

"We're certainly hoping they don't come back and haunt us," said a senior State Department official who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter.

Saudi officials said the men were released to their families to help rehabilitate them. "The idea is to slowly bring them back into the fold of society," said Jubeir, the embassy spokesman.

But Harris, the prison commander, says he has an obligation to know what becomes of the men in his custody. Part of his mission, he said, is to "keep enemy combatants off the battlefield."

DOJ_NMG_0086040

"I take it very seriously whether a detainee is going to get to go home or not," he said.

Court Again Rejects Part Of Canada's Antiterror Laws (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

OTTAWA, Oct. 24 — An Ontario judge ruled Tuesday that an "essential element" of Canada's antiterrorism laws was unconstitutional.

The decision, by Justice Douglas Rutherford of the Ontario Superior Court, marks the second time in less than a week that a judge at the court has rejected parts of the nation's new antiterrorism laws.

Justice Rutherford found that the laws, introduced after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, improperly defined terrorism as a crime committed with religious, ideological or political motives. That definition, he said, is "an essential element that is not only novel in Canadian law, but the impact of which constitutes an infringement of certain fundamental freedoms," including "those of religion, thought, belief, opinion, expression and association."

The constitutional challenge to the laws was brought by the first person to be charged under them, Mohammed Momin Khawaja, a 27-year-old, Canadian-born software developer.

Mr. Khawaja, a former contract employee of Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs, was arrested in Ottawa in 2004 as part of a series of raids coordinated between the British and Canadian police. In Britain, nine other people were arrested and 1,320 pounds of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, a potential bomb ingredient, was seized.

Mr. Khawaja faces seven charges under the new Canadian laws.

He remains in jail, however, because Justice Rutherford struck down only the specific definition of terrorism, without nullifying the law itself. As a result, the impact of Tuesday's decision on Mr. Khawaja's case is not clear, nor are the implications for the 17 other people who were arrested in the Toronto area in June and charged with a number of terrorism-related offenses. Patrick Charette, a spokesman for Canada's Department of Justice, said that because the bulk of the law was preserved, if not the definition of terrorism, the government would go ahead with Mr. Khawaja's trial as planned in January.

But Mr. Khawaja's lawyer, Lawrence Greenspon, said that if the government attempted to try his client, he would ask the Supreme Court of Canada to drop the charges.

"How can you proceed on charges when every one of them is a terrorism charge, but you've taken away that definition?" he said.

The definition of terrorism as a politically or religiously motivated crime, Mr. Greenspon added, has led to abuses by the Canadian police and intelligence officers. "That's why they're knocking on Muslim Canadians' doors and questioning and detaining people who are Arab or followers of Islam," he said.

Last week, another judge struck down portions of Canadian secrecy laws that were included in the antiterrorism legislation. Those parts had been used to raid the home and office of a reporter for The Ottawa Citizen newspaper.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Hit For Anthrax 'Dead-ends' (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

A senior member of the Senate Judiciary Committee wants Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to explain why the FBI has not made an arrest in its anthrax investigation, citing five years of "dead-ends and a lack of progress."

"There are numerous and serious questions that need to be answered about both the investigation itself and how the FBI has handled it," Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, said in a letter yesterday to Mr. Gonzales.

"The FBI's refusal to brief Congress over the last several years is an outrageous response to reasonable requests at getting to the bottom of the attacks."

The FBI's anthrax investigation began in October 2001 after Congress became one of the targets in the first bioterrorist attack on the United States. A letter laced with the deadly bacterium was addressed to Tom Daschle, the South Dakota Democrat serving as Senate majority leader.

Anthrax-tainted letters ultimately killed five persons in the U.S. and infected 17 others.

The FBI took primary responsibility for investigating the attacks and has described its "Amerithrax" probe as one of the largest and most complex in the history of law enforcement. The FBI said recently that it was determined to solve the case, had conducted 9,000 interviews and had issued 6,000 subpoenas.

DOJ_NMG_0086041

Nearly 20 FBI agents, working with inspectors from the U.S. Postal Service, continue to pursue the case.

FBI Assistant Director Joseph Persichini Jr., who heads the Washington field office, said last month that FBI and U.S. Postal Service investigators were "fully committed to bringing the perpetrators of these murderous attacks to justice."

Mr. Persichini said the scientific advances gained from the investigation were unprecedented and had strengthened the government's ability to prepare for and prevent biological attacks.

Mr. Grassley said a detailed examination of the probe may reveal the FBI's "institutional resistance to criticism and dissent."

Mr. Grassley, who also serves as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said many of the resources devoted to the anthrax probe since 2001 were aimed at attempting to prove that former Army scientist Steven Hatfill, once identified as a "person of interest" in the investigation, was involved in the attacks.

The Justice Department has since said that the strain of anthrax used in the attacks was available to a wider circle of people than initially thought.

Mr. Grassley called "outrageous" the FBI's prohibition of further anthrax briefings to Congress and the suggestion that lawmakers were leaking sensitive information.

"Given the allegations about FBI leaks related to [Steven] Hatfill and its similar leaks related to Richard Jewell in the Centennial Park Bombing Case, for the FBI to withhold information from Congress for fear of leaks seems a bit hypocritical, to say the least," he said.

Mr. Grassley asked, among other things, whether the FBI has been able to narrow the number of "persons of interest" and labs.

Anthrax Mystery And Misery Linger For Postal Workers (WP)

By Courtland Milloy

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

The envelope containing the anthrax was postmarked Oct. 9, 2001, and arrived at the Brentwood postal facility in Northeast Washington a few days later. The return address read, "4th Grade, Greendale School, Franklin Park, NJ 08852." But the letter had not been mailed by kids. And you could be forgiven for no longer wondering who had mailed it.

Forgiving those who'd forgotten about them -- that's what some postal workers have been trying to do for five years, ever since two of their own, Thomas L. Morris Jr., 55, and Joseph P. Curseen Jr., 47, died Oct. 21 and Oct. 22, 2001, respectively, after inhaling anthrax from that envelope. They want to forgive our forgetting how badly they had been treated. Forgive our not caring that the killer remains at large. Forgive our lack of concern that it could happen again.

They need to forgive lest bitterness and resentment corrode their souls.

"Like soldiers, we continue to work on the front line, sometimes feeling unarmed, in hopes that our health and safety needs are met, and that the culprits are apprehended," Dena Briscoe, president of a postal worker support group called Brentwood Exposed, told a gathering of postal employees at a memorial service last week. "We are not offered an apology from our government leaders for their hesitant reactions during the anthrax attacks, putting the mail first and leaving many still wounded."

The contaminated letter had been addressed to then-Senate Majority Leader Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.). The anthrax was discovered after it was opened by one of his staff members Oct. 15. Almost immediately, more than 3,000 Capitol Hill employees were methodically tested for anthrax exposure. But at the Brentwood facility, which sorts mail for the House and Senate, it took days before any of the more than 1,000 postal employees were tested -- and then only after one of them had become ill, from anthrax poisoning.

Making matters worse was the obvious racial disparity: the Capitol Hill employees were predominantly white; the postal workers, predominantly black. Moreover, health officials did not go to the postal workers as they did to those on Capitol Hill; instead, the postal workers were directed to government offices miles away, where they had to line up and wait to get a nasal cavity swab. Curseen and Morris never made it.

The memorial service was held at Israel Baptist Church, not far from the Brentwood postal facility, which has been renamed for Curseen and Morris.

Postal worker Robert Finney sang a stirring rendition of the Lord's Prayer ("And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us"). Sylvia Berry, a former postal worker who is now a minister in North Carolina, followed up with a message of redemption through forgiving.

"It's easy to have bitterness in your heart when you believe life has been unfair," Berry said. "Some find it difficult to let go. Some never forgive. But now is a time for healing. We must learn to forgive and to love one another."

The challenge of forgiveness was highlighted by a letter from Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) that was read to the gathering. "I can't believe that we still don't know who is behind these attacks," she wrote. "It is unacceptable that we still have no leads."

DOJ_NMG_0086042

But recent expressions of concern, regret and solidarity from Mikulski and others might have advanced the process.

Rep. Albert R. Wynn (D-Md.) told the gathered postal workers: "You have our condolences, which may sound like empty words, given all that has happened. The government has failed you. To this day, we bear a measure of guilt."

And in an op-ed column for The Washington Post last week, Daschle, now a lawyer in private practice, wrote: "Five years later, the alarm I and many others experienced on that dark day has been replaced by a deep discouragement and dismay. The investigation trail has gone cold. Physical evidence that might have been gathered in the first days and weeks after the attacks is long gone. While the FBI has made gains in its scientific capabilities and understanding of anthrax, its slowness to move and its lack of direction in the early stages of the investigation led to missed opportunities."

At the memorial service, Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director of the FBI's Washington field office, told the postal workers that law enforcement agents had worked extremely hard, round-the-clock, and that the failure to solve the crime had caused much grief and frustration.

"We are federal employees, with families, just like you," he said. "We want to do our jobs and do them well."

His humility seemed to soften the crowd. "The FBI now has a human face," Briscoe said.

But the wounds inflicted five years ago are still raw. And it probably doesn't help the healing that some postal workers still feel terribly vulnerable to attack.

Traveler Program In Demand (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Ten of the USA's busiest airports have asked the federal government if they can start Registered Traveler programs that would give pre-screened passengers a shortcut through security lines.

Those programs could begin by the end of the year, launching a much-delayed effort to expedite security for travelers who pass background checks.

Atlanta, Chicago O'Hare and Los Angeles airports — the nation's three busiest — have asked the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to let them run voluntary Registered Traveler programs, along with 19 other airports.

The TSA released a list of interested airports for the first time after a Freedom of Information Act request by USA TODAY. The agency must approve airports and companies that would enroll passengers, provide fingerprint-embedded ID cards and usher registered travelers through security.

Carter Morris, a vice president at the American Association of Airport Executives, said programs could start by the end of the year and expand quickly. “It will be a strong start,” Morris said.

Registered Traveler has faced repeated delays since Congress suggested it shortly after the 9/11 attacks. A recent TSA proposal that would have forced participants to pay about $200 a year prompted an uproar. The annual fee is now likely to be about $100.

People in Registered Traveler would go through reserved security lanes that may waive procedures such as removing shoes and coats. Airports and travel groups say the program must operate at a significant number of places to attract millions of passengers nationwide.

Steven Brill, CEO of a New York company that would run Registered Traveler programs, said 10 large airports would provide a “critical mass to ensure this program launches and flourishes.”

However, some airports that have applied have not decided whether to start the Registered Traveler program, including Baltimore and Washington's Dulles and Reagan.

A dozen small to midsize airports that have applied to start Registered Traveler, including Albany, N.Y., and Huntsville, Ala., “are looking at a way to differentiate themselves and attract business travelers,” said Larry Zmuda, a partner at Unisys, a Pennsylvania company that would run the program.

More 9/11 Remains Found At Ground Zero (AP-Y)

By Sara Kugler

AP, October 25, 2006

Mayor Michael Bloomberg acknowledged Tuesday that the city pushed for a swift cleanup at the World Trade Center but said the fast pace was an effort to return remains to victims' families quickly.

Meanwhile, 36 more bone fragments were found Tuesday in subterranean cavities along the edge of the site as workers continued burrowing into areas that were apparently missed during the initial cleanup.

Bloomberg spoke a day after The Associated Press reported that some officials handling the cleanup in 2002 had recommended a more thorough search for remains but felt rebuffed by a city agency that just wanted to finish the job.

DOJ_NMG_0086043

The agency in charge of the excavation, the Department of Design and Construction, was applauded for its efficiency in 2002 after it whisked away the 10-story pile of trade center rubble in less than a year.

"Were we under time pressure? Absolutely," Bloomberg said Tuesday. "I don't know any family member that didn't want to find out whatever they could about the loved one that they lost. And we did it as fast as we could, consistent with safety and completeness."

Some victims' relatives dismissed the mayor's explanation for the quick cleanup.

"It had very little to do with the families," said Monica Gabrielle, who has no identified remains of her husband, Richard. "This is another spin — it's a diversion away from the issue, which is that management failed, not the workers. And management needs to be held accountable."

Among the officials who said they raised objections during the nine-month recovery effort was Lt. John McArdle, ground zero commander for the New York Police Department.

"There came a point in time when they said, 'We gotta try to wrap this up,' and they tried to expedite it as much as possible, and they jumped the gun, and now you have all of these families hurt, and they're finding all these body parts," he said.

Several large bones were accidentally discovered last week after a utility crew opened up a non-working manhole. Since then, the city has been tearing up the pavement and examining other underground pockets in the same vicinity, which is a service road along the western edge of the 16-acre site.

In the past few days, more than 100 bones and fragments have been recovered. The medical examiner's office is working to match them to victims.

Thousands of pieces recovered during the main excavation still have not yielded matches, leaving more than 40 percent of the attack's 2,749 victims without any trace of remains.

The newly discovered bones are just the latest finding of overlooked remains. Hundreds of bone fragments have been found on the roof of a building just south of the trade center site, and officials are eyeing whether other buildings need to be combed again.

Analysis: Whites Challenged Katrina Insurers More (USAT/AP)

By Rukmini Callimachi And Frank Bass

USA Today, October 25, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The Little and Kitchens families watched helplessly as Hurricane Katrina battered their homes. Both families waited patiently for an insurance adjuster to settle their losses. And both were sorely disappointed with the outcome.

Then, their paths diverged.

Richard and Cindy Little, a white couple living in a predominantly white neighborhood, filed a complaint with the Louisiana Department of Insurance. Eventually, they won full reimbursement.

Doretha and Roy Kitchens, a black couple living in New Orleans' overwhelmingly black Lower 9th Ward, simply gave up and took what their insurer gave them. They didn't know they could appeal to the state.

Though poor and minority neighborhoods suffered the brunt of Katrina, residents living in white neighborhoods have been three times as likely as homeowners in black neighborhoods to seek state help in resolving insurance disputes, according to an Associated Press computer analysis of Louisiana's insurance complaints settled in the first year after Katrina.

“The blacks didn't complain 'cause they got tired,” said Doretha Kitchens, 58, who recalls numerous phone calls to her insurer. Ultimately, she accepted her insurer's offer of about $34,000 for damage that actually totaled more than $120,000.

The insurance industry and state regulators say they made special efforts to reach out to poor and minority neighborhoods.

“The message doesn't get to everyone,” Louisiana Insurance Commissioner Jim Donelon said.

More than 700,000 insurance claims were filed for Hurricane Katrina damage in Gulf Coast states and to date, only $14.9 billion of $25.3 billion in insured losses has been paid, the national risk modeling company ISO estimates.

In Louisiana, more than 8,000 residents have filed Katrina-related complaints with the state insurance office. The AP obtained the files of more than 3,000 settled complaints and analyzed the outcomes.

Nearly 75% of the settled cases were filed by residents currently living in predominantly white neighborhoods. Twenty-five percent were filed by households in majority-black ZIP codes.

Donelon said his department made an extra effort to reach as many people as possible and let them know the agency was willing to press their case with insurers.

That message never reached the water-stained stoop of Doretha Kitchens' house, which was enveloped in a 9-foot surge of muddy water.

Kitchens didn't know she could appeal Allstate's settlement offer to the state, but doubts it would have changed anything. Her husband, she said, simply lost faith that anyone would help.

"My husband didn't want to be bothered. I asked him, 'Why don't we sue the insurance company?' He said, 'They ain't gonna do nothing no way.' "

Richard and Cindy Little's home in Slidell had extensive damage. When their insurer agreed to pay two-thirds of the repair cost, the Littles used their savings to cover the construction, then began battling Allstate over the settlement. Eventually, their efforts paid off.

"We had money in the bank so we could wait them out," said Cindy Little, 50.

Mike Trevino, a spokesman for Allstate, said the state agency treated minority and white homeowners equally. The figures obtained by the AP support his contention.

Aloyd Edinburgh, 75, who lives in the Lower 9th Ward, couldn't wait it out.

Insurers gave him $35,000 out of a policy worth $85,000.

"The best thing I can do is take the money I did receive and go to work," he says.

Safer, Stronger, Smarter (USAT)

By Norman C. Francis

USA Today, October 25, 2006

On Aug. 29, 2005, the world watched as federal levees failed our city of 450,000 people — leading to 1,400 deaths and flooding tens of thousands of our homes and businesses. Following the most catastrophic engineering breakdown in U.S. history, the Army Corps of Engineers acknowledged that its levees failed in a storm they were engineered to withstand.

In response to this tragedy, we in Louisiana have pledged to acknowledge our risks and rebuild safer, stronger and smarter. This isoftentimes an unpopular position, but we've stuck to that commitment. Governor Kathleen Blanco, the Louisiana Legislature and the Louisiana Recovery Authority went far beyond what was required of us. We adopted a tough, new statewide building code and FEMA's new flood elevation guidelines. With funding from President Bush and Congress, we created programs to allow families to sell us their flood-damaged homes or elevate as they make repairs.

These incentives are helping people do the difficult work of rebuilding to a higher standard of safety.

Nobody lives risk-free in this world. But federal investments of nearly $6 billion to repair and strengthen our levees, combined with our adoption of the international building code and FEMA's flood guidance, means that we are using the best available science to reduce that risk to a manageable level.

What if Washington, D.C., were hit by a hurricane? Would we question whether to rebuild? What if the levees protecting Sacramento failed as ours did? What good is levee protection if homeowners are not allowed to build behind them? The question that should be answered in cases like ours is not whether to rebuild Louisiana, but how to do so safely.

We are answering these questions as we buy out houses in flood-prone areas and help families elevate in compliance with the best flood guidance available. In doing so, we echo the president's adviser on Gulf Coast recovery, Donald Powell, who said, "These advisories will provide a greater degree of certainty and confidence to the citizens of New Orleans, who are anxious to rebuild their homes and businesses … and to help them make sound rebuilding decisions."

Norman C. Francis is chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority.

New Orleans Plan: Rebuild In Flood Zones, Hand You The Bill (USAT)

USA Today, October 25, 2006

The definition of insanity, according to Benjamin Franklin, is doing the same thing over and over and expecting different results.

Ben, welcome to New Orleans.

Nearly three-quarters of 14,534 New Orleanians who've applied for federal grants say they'll rebuild their Hurricane Katrina-damaged homes in flood areas — even though city restrictions are unlikely to protect their homes if the levees fail again, USA TODAY's Anne Rochell Konigsmark reported last week.

The latest plan calls for the Louisiana Recovery Authority to dole out grants of up to $150,000 to cover uninsured losses, which residents can use to rebuild or relocate. To qualify, homeowners in and around the city must raise their homes by at least 3 feet and purchase federal flood insurance.

So let's see. Federal taxpayers will be subsidizing reconstruction in flood areas, underwriting the insurance on those homes and will no doubt have to bail out the flood insurance program if the homes get wiped out again. The program collected only $2.2 billion last year in premiums but will pay out more than $20 billion in Katrina claims, leaving taxpayers on the hook for the rest. Worse, the program encourages development in areas subject to flooding — not just in New Orleans, but everywhere — by offering insurance at bargain rates in areas where private insurers fear to tread. That increases the population in vulnerable areas, leading to more costly disasters.

DOJ_NMG_0086045

It is an absurd use of taxpayers' money, to which New Orleans is adding an expensive new twist.

Certainly, the homeowners in and around New Orleans deserve some assistance because of the magnitude of the disaster and the failure of federally constructed levees to protect them. But encouraging rebuilding in the most flood-prone areas is foolhardy.

The 3-foot rule, adopted Sept. 1 by the New Orleans City Council, makes little sense and is a poor substitute for a comprehensive rebuilding plan. An extra yard of elevation isn't needed in areas that didn't flood after Katrina, and it's too low in areas that saw as much as 20 feet of water. Just ask those who had to be rescued from their rooftops. If there's another catastrophic event, thousands of homes could flood again under the new rules, says Federal Emergency Management Agency Deputy Director Doug Bellomo.

To prevent such an event, $6 billion is being spent to upgrade the 350 miles of levees around New Orleans. But parts of that system remain suspect, and work won't be done until 2010 at best. This year's tame hurricane season is no reason for complacency. The truth is, New Orleans won't be safe from a Katrina-scale storm for many years.

Recovery after Katrina is a mammoth undertaking that should be managed at the municipal and state level. But if local authorities allow residents to rebuild in the most dangerous areas, it should be at their own risk. Asking taxpayers around the USA to subsidize, underwrite and bail them out again fits Franklin's definition of nuts.

WAR NEWS:

General Weighs 2nd Troop Shift To Calm Baghdad (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 24 — The top American military commander in Iraq said Tuesday that it was possible he might need to call for an increase in American troop levels in Baghdad to reinvigorate a plan to recapture the capital's streets from insurgents and death squads.

In a news conference held after a week of largely bad news from Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad sought to reassure an increasingly restive American public that the war was still winnable.

Mr. Khalilzad laid out a timetable for political measures he said the Iraqi government had agreed to take that the Americans see as crucial to tamping down sectarian violence, and General Casey predicted that Iraqi troops would be able to take over the main burden of the war in 12 to 18 months, allowing American troops to move to a support role. [Military analysis, page A8.]

But the two men, America's top officials in Iraq, did not address what would happen if the government failed to meet the timetable, which includes measures meant to address some of the most intractable issues plaguing the country, including the sectarian militias that have been responsible for much of the worst violence this year.

General Casey declined to specify steps he would take to adjust the Baghdad security plan, which military officials acknowledged last week had failed to stem the violence in the capital. But he said troop increases — on top of several thousand additional American troops deployed when the Baghdad crackdown began in August — were among the options to secure the capital.

"Now, do we need more troops to do that?" he said. "Maybe. And as I've said all along, if we do, I will ask for the troops we need, both coalition and Iraqi."

He said his options could include deploying more Iraqi soldiers, bringing in more American troops to Baghdad from the 141,000 already in Iraq, or getting reinforcements from American troops deployed outside the country.

To increase combat forces further might require calling in some troops on standby in the region or extending the tours of units nearing the end of their 12-month tours in Iraq, which in turn could mean calling up reserves. Such a move would be politically unpopular, particularly in the run-up to an election in which the war has become a highly charged issue.

General Casey said earlier this month that he might need more troops in Iraq, but he gave no indication Tuesday, nor have other senior commanders, that such a request had been made.

Civilian deaths in Baghdad have been at near-record rates, and American casualties are running at their highest level in two years, with 90 troops having lost their lives so far in October. On Tuesday, American troops intensified their search for a soldier the military said had been abducted while visiting relatives in Baghdad on Monday.

In the past 10 days, two Iraqi cities, Balad and Amara, have been briefly taken over by militia gangs after American and British forces withdrew, and the civilian death toll across the country in October has remained at close to the record levels of the summer months, when it reached an average of about 100 a day. The situation has fed uncertainty about the war in the United States, prompting President Bush to reaffirm his commitment to the war, but to express a readiness to adjust tactics as the situation demands.

DOJ_NMG_0086046

Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, commander of the Fourth Infantry Division who is the operational commander for Baghdad, said in an interview with The New York Times earlier this week that his first requirement was more Iraqi troops. He said the Iraqis had promised four battalions for the Baghdad operation, and committed only two. The general said he had not asked for more American troops.

General Casey and Mr. Khalilzad said that Iraqi leaders must set aside sectarian differences to unite behind "a national compact" within the next 12 months that will help overcome sectarian divisions driving the war. Mr. Khalilzad said the crucial issues to be settled included demobilizing sectarian militias, a fair division of national oil revenues, amendments to the 2005 Constitution to guarantee all Iraqis equal rights, and a new deal for former Baath party members to balance "accountability and reconciliation."

Also required, he said, was an increase in the "credibility and capability of Iraqi forces," whose performance, desertion rates and unwillingness to deploy outside their home areas has continued to disappoint American commanders.

"The recent sectarian bloodshed in Iraq causes many to question whether the United States and the Iraqis can succeed," Mr. Khalilzad said in his opening statement. "My message today is straightforward: Despite the difficult challenges we face, success in Iraq is possible and can be achieved by a realistic timetable." But he added a crucial proviso: "Iraqi leaders must step up to achieve key political and security milestones on which they have agreed."

A copy of the timeline Mr. Khalilzad said had been agreed to by Iraqi leaders was made available to The New York Times by American officials. Entitled "notional political timetable," it sets a seven-month schedule, running from this September to March 2007, to complete a 16-point agenda on divisive issues.

But the document provides deadlines only for the Iraqis to establish the legislative and executive framework for action on the most decisive issues, not for the implementation of policies that American officials believe is urgent if the tide in the war is to be reversed. A case in point is the sectarian militias, whose involvement in the killings of thousands of Iraqis this year has been identified by American officials as the most pressing issue of all. Without an end to the militia threat, they have said, no military action by American and Iraqi forces can win the war.

The timeline provided by the Americans sets a December deadline for Iraq's Parliament to pass laws setting terms for an amnesty for those willing to renounce bloodshed, and for other measures governing the demobilization of militias and means of reintegrating their members into civilian life. Iraqi leaders have promised to move against the militias since Iraq resumed sovereignty in June 2004, but three prime ministers, including Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who took office in May, have repeatedly deferred action.

Even as American and Iraqi troops have battled sectarian militias in the Baghdad crackdown, Mr. Maliki has held firm, saying that persuading the powerful political groups that control the militias to disband them requires a political consensus, not the tough military action favored by American commanders.

For the prime minister, the issue is one of political survival, since the political groups whose power is underpinned by the two main Shiite militias, the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, both identified by American commanders as operating death squads, are key partners in the Shiite alliance that controls the government.

The news of the timetable drew reactions in Washington that ran mostly along party lines.

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina and a member of the Armed Services Committee, called the statements from General Casey and the ambassador "encouraging."

"They understand the security situation is lacking and working with our Iraqi allies, they understand the need to get it right," he said.

But Representative Ike Skelton of Missouri, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee said: "After three and a half years of training, this timetable is too long." He said he had been telling the administration to set a timetable for two years and called General Casey's statements, "a sobering assessment from our top military commander of how much farther Iraq's forces still have to go."

Like Mr. Khalilzad, General Casey alluded to the growing popular and Congressional restiveness toward the war, saying, "I'm sure for the folks back in the United States trying to look at this, it looks very confusing and hard to understand." He said the war had reached "a difficult situation" that was "likely to remain that way over the near term," but offered a more hopeful projection for 2007 and 2008, a period that would carry American troops here to the fifth anniversary of the invasion that overthrew Saddam Hussein.

The American commander said the rebuilding of Iraq's security forces was about 75 percent complete. He said almost 90 of the 112 American-trained Iraqi Army battalions are "in the lead" across Iraq, meaning that they have taken over the primary combat role from Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0086047

"Make no mistake about it, we are in a tough fight here in the center of the country and in Anbar Province" to the west of Baghdad, base to much of the Sunni insurgency, the general said. "But I think it's important to remind people that 90 percent of the sectarian violence in Iraq takes place in about a 30-mile radius from the center of Baghdad, and that, secondly, 90 percent of that violence takes place in five provinces" of the 18 that make up Iraq. "This is not a country that is awash in sectarian violence."

General Casey said that American troop withdrawals can and must be made as Iraqi forces improve. But he refused to set any hard-and-fast deadlines, saying that withdrawals would depend on developments in the war. "The Iraqis are getting better," he said.

"I still very strongly believe that we need to continue to reduce our forces as the Iraqis continue to improve, because we need to get out of their way," the general said.

In other developments on Tuesday, the American military command said that four more American troops had died in rebel attacks in Iraq. With a week to go, October has already become the deadliest month for American troops in 12 months and is on pace to become the third deadliest month of the conflict. Three troops — two marines and a sailor — were killed Monday in Anbar Province, the military said, and a soldier died early Tuesday from wounds he sustained when his patrol was struck by a concealed bomb in Baghdad.

In Falluja on Monday, American troops, responding to a report that a fire truck had been hijacked by insurgents, stopped a fire truck matching the description, the command reported. As the truck's four occupants "exited quickly," the statement said, the troops opened fire, killing them.

American troops later found that the men were actually firefighters responding to an emergency call and were not riding in the hijacked truck.

In Baghdad, an intensive military search continued Tuesday for an American soldier who was reported missing late Monday. Military officials said that the soldier, who is of Iraqi descent and works as an interpreter, appeared to have left the fortified Green Zone on Monday afternoon to visit with family members in Baghdad. A military statement, citing witnesses, said the soldier was at a relative's house when men wearing "dark-colored rags over their noses and mouths" pulled up in three cars, handcuffed the soldier and took him away in one of the vehicles.

The kidnappers later called a relative of the soldier using the victim's cellphone, the statement said.

Hundreds of American and Iraqi security forces, backed by attack helicopters and unmanned aerial surveillance drones, surged into the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karada on Monday night, sealing off roads and bridges, searching vehicles, and raiding homes and offices.

The sweep continued all day Monday, snarling traffic throughout the center of the capital. The American military said that among other locations, its troops had raided the Al Furat television station, which is owned by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite party; and Saeed Adrees Mosque, a Shiite mosque.

American officials vowed to continue the search until the missing serviceman was rescued. "We will leverage all available coalition resources to find this soldier," said General Thurman.

More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 24 -- The top American commander in Iraq said Tuesday that he may call for more troops to be sent to Baghdad, possibly by increasing the overall U.S. presence in Iraq, as rising bloodshed pushes Iraqi and American deaths to some of their highest levels of the war.

The commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., also said he now believed Iraqi forces would be ready to take over security responsibility from the Americans no sooner than late 2007 or early 2008. The announcement of a 12- to 18-month target again pushes back the withdrawal of the bulk of the 145,000 or so U.S. troops in Iraq.

Casey spoke alongside U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad at a rare joint news conference in Baghdad's Green Zone, aiming to show that U.S. and Iraqi leaders were confronting surging sectarian violence. Both men acknowledged that both the course and nature of the war have changed this year, as Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority and Sunni minority battle for power, resources and, lately, survival.

"Make no mistake about it: We are in a tough fight here in the center of the country and in Anbar province," Casey said, emphasizing that the worst of the bloodletting was in Baghdad.

"This is not a country that is awash in sectarian violence," Casey said. "The situation's hard, but it's not a country that's awash in sectarian violence."

Casey said later that any additional troops for Baghdad could come from a variety of sources, including from the Iraqi military, from U.S. forces elsewhere in Iraq or from outside the theater.

DOJ_NMG_0086048

Khalilzad framed the Iraqi conflict as part of the struggle for security in the Middle East, which he called "the challenge of our age." He sought to rally flagging public support in the United States for the war and answer calls -- led by Democrats -- to set a timeline for American withdrawal.

"The recent sectarian bloodshed in Iraq causes many to question whether the United States and the Iraqis can succeed," Khalilzad said. "My message today is straightforward: Despite the difficult challenges we face, success in Iraq is possible and can be achieved on a realistic timetable."

But events inside and outside the Green Zone on Tuesday highlighted the stubbornness of the basic problems with which U.S. forces have struggled since the 2003 invasion: security and infrastructure. Killings by insurgents in the western province of Anbar helped push up the October death toll among American troops in Iraq by four service members to 91, the U.S. military said Tuesday, the highest monthly total for American forces in the country in 12 months.

And Casey and Khalilzad, the top U.S. military and civilian leaders in Iraq, were left for several minutes to deliver their remarks in darkness illuminated only by the battery-powered lights of TV camera crews. One of Baghdad's frequent power outages cut electricity to the converted parking garage that houses the U.S. military press center, briefly knocking the internationally broadcast conference off the air.

For Casey and his predecessors, the question of whether President Bush dedicated enough troops to the Iraq war has been one of those most frequently asked -- and hotly debated. While Casey has raised troop strength temporarily as high as 150,000 for Iraqi national elections, his stock answer has been that if he felt additional troops were needed, he would ask for them.

On Tuesday, Casey said he might ask for them. If Iraqi leaders can resolve their differences and if Iraqi security forces improve, "I think [we] can put Iraq in a very good place in 12 months.

"Now, do we need more troops to do that? Maybe."

It is not clear whether Iraqi or U.S. forces in Iraq, which already are stretched thin, could provide substantially more troops for duty in the capital, however.

American commanders have complained, usually privately, that the Iraqi government has failed to provide many of the Iraqi troops they requested earlier to try to stabilize Baghdad. In September, commanders had a weeks-old request for 3,000 more Iraqi troops for the capital; only a few hundred arrived, Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, the U.S. commander for Baghdad, said last month. Some Iraqi battalions have mutinied rather than answer orders to deploy to Baghdad.

U.S. commanders moved at least 6,000 more American troops to Baghdad over the summer for Operation Together Forward, an effort to arrest the violence in the capital. To get those extra troops, commanders had to take the unpopular step of extending one unit's deployment just as it was going home to its base in Alaska, as well as calling in emergency reserves based in Kuwait.

In all, about 15,000 American troops and 9,000 Iraqi soldiers are now deployed in Baghdad for the special security operation.

Despite the concentration of efforts in the capital, violence here has climbed more than 43 percent since midsummer. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. spokesman in Iraq, said last week that attacks had climbed 22 percent in the first two weeks of the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, which began in late September, compared with the preceding two weeks.

The toll is highest among Iraqi civilians. More than 2,660 Iraqis were killed in Baghdad last month alone, the highest such figure for the war. The average daily number of attacks on Iraqi security forces is also at a high, the U.S. Defense Department said in a report in late August.

Casey said U.S. and Iraqi authorities would adjust their Baghdad military plan to combat the rising attacks. He declined to give specifics.

Iraqis and Americans here face "a difficult situation, and it's likely to remain that way over the near term," Khalilzad said.

U.S. and Iraqi leaders were adjusting political goals in Iraq as well, Khalilzad said, to cope with a conflict that has expanded from an insurgency alone to an insurgency increasingly overshadowed by sectarian violence.

Khalilzad said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had agreed to timelines for accomplishing several specific goals, including developing a plan to deal with militias and reforming Iraq's Interior Ministry by the end of the year.

Militias connected to the Shiite religious parties that lead Iraq's government are accused by U.S. officials, Iraqi Sunnis and others of being lead players in increasingly brazen attacks on Sunnis. In the south, where Sunnis are few, Shiite militias fight each other.

According to Khalilzad, Maliki told U.S. officials that Moqtada al-Sadr, the Shiite cleric who leads the most feared militia, had agreed to the creation of a plan for disarming militias.

However, Sadr has said he does not consider his armed followers to be a militia, and thus sees them as outside any plan to break up the militias, according to one diplomat here. It was not clear if Sadr's alleged commitment to Maliki superseded that.

DOJ_NMG_0086049

On Tuesday, Sadr called for an end to religious killings.

"I totally reject any Shiite-Shiite fighting or Sunni-Shiite sectarian fighting in Iraq under any pretext," he said in a speech in the southern holy city of Najaf. "Protecting Iraq is our main goal, and the expulsion of the occupation troops from the country is our objective, too."

Armed bands claiming to be part of Sadr's militia have kept up the violence despite similar calls from Sadr in recent months. At least in part, Sadr appears not fully in command of the thousands of armed men claiming allegiance to him.

Iraq's Interior Ministry also is controlled by the Shiite religious parties, and U.S. commanders concede it is heavily infiltrated by the Shiite militias.

Khalilzad said Iraqi leaders have agreed that, over the next 12 months, they will come up with a national compact for reconciliation and a plan that fairly shares Iraq's oil wealth, have a program on militias in place and work on Iraq's security institutions.

Since taking office in May, Maliki has postponed promised action on militias and on national reconciliation, frustrating American officials as the U.S. toll rises and Iraq's divisions deepen. Khalilzad on Tuesday urged Iraqi leaders to "step up" to their responsibilities.

American commanders also have repeatedly set rough dates for when U.S. troops might start to withdraw, only to roll back those dates as Iraq's troubles worsened.

Casey said last year that he hoped for "fairly significant" withdrawals by spring 2006, but he said Tuesday that rising sectarian violence had made such a drawdown impossible.

In Washington, some Democrats responded to Khalilzad's and Casey's messages by demanding that the United States pull out troops if Iraqis miss their deadlines.

"We need to make clear that American troops will be leaving within a year to force Iraqis to make the tough compromises," Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) said in a statement. "Only then do we have a chance to make Iraqis stand up for Iraq and bring our troops home."

"We must accelerate the timeline of training Iraqi security forces" and double the number of U.S. trainers, said Rep. Ike Skelton (Mo.), ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee. "American force readiness is at critically low levels and will only fully recover when significant numbers of personnel and equipment can begin to redeploy from Iraq."

Iraqis To Plan Timeline For Reducing Violence (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The top U.S. military commander in Iraq said today that more U.S. troops might be needed to quell sectarian violence raging in the capital.

In a news conference with the American ambassador, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. said he was open to requesting more American troops given the conflict's complexity and seriousness, especially in Baghdad.

During October, U.S. and Iraqi forces have come under increased attacks, with at least 90 U.S. troops killed in the highest American monthly death toll this year. Another 300 Iraqi troops have also been killed during the holy month of Ramadan, according to Casey. Most of the U.S. and Iraqi casualties have been killed in Baghdad.

The war in Iraq is a key issue in the Nov. 7 U.S. election and the Bush administration has been keen to play down any shift in Iraq policy. At the same time, President Bush has dropped the refrain that the United States will "stay the course" in Iraq, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow confirmed Monday.

"He stopped using it," Snow said of the phrase, suggesting that it left the impression the administration was not adjusting to conditions in Iraq.

Last week, military spokesman Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV described the continued violence in Baghdad as "disheartening," suggesting that the military was recasting its strategy.

In the past, military officials have described the strategy in Baghdad as "clear, hold and build." While the U.S. military is able to clear neighborhoods of insurgents, holding and building has proved more problematic.

"Do we need more troops to do that? Maybe," Casey said at the news conference. "If we do, I'll ask for the troops we need, both coalition and Iraqis."

There are now 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

Casey acknowledged that he had initially projected a significant reduction of troops this year but that, by late June, it became clear that more U.S. forces were needed to augment Iraqi security forces still being trained.

"It's going to take another 12 to 18 months or so till I believe the Iraqi security forces are completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security," Casey said, repeating a statement he made last month.

DOJ_NMG_0086050

During the same news conference, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad emphasized a political timetable, saying the Iraqi government has agreed to begin resolving fundamental disputes through a "national compact."

Iraqi politicians differ on issues such as disarming militias and insurgents, revenue sharing and constitutional amendments. "Iraqi officials have agreed to a timeline for making these difficult decisions," Khalilzad said.

However, it was unclear what will happen if the Iraqi politicians fail to meet the agreed upon timeline.

Khalilzad also said the Bush administration has approached some of Iraq's neighbors for help.

"We are reaching out to Arab states, such as Saudi Arabia, the UAE [United Arab Emirates] and Jordan, to help by encouraging these groups to end the violence and work for a united and independent Iraq and to work against Al Qaeda," he said. "These countries have promised to be helpful."

Other neighbors have not been helpful, he said, pointing to Iran and Syria. "Both Iran and Syria continue to be decidedly unhelpful by providing support to the different extremists groups operating in Iraq," Khalilzad said.

U.S. Shifts Onus To Iraqis To Find Political Solution (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

With few military options left to counter the violence across Iraq, top U.S. officials are shifting more of the onus onto Baghdad's beleaguered political leaders to broker compromises they hope might stem the rising bloodshed.

In a sign that Washington is turning up pressure on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to act, U.S. officials in Baghdad and Washington yesterday said progress on resolving Iraq's ethnic and religious rifts must come soon.

The focus on Baghdad's fledgling government follows the U.S. military's admission last week that its four-month-old plan to secure the Iraqi capital by concentrating U.S. and Iraqi forces there hasn't worked as hoped. It also comes amid congressional-election campaigns in which Republicans and Democrats are pressing the Bush administration to radically change its approach in Iraq.

But little in Iraq over the past three years offers reason for optimism that the renewed pressure on Mr. Maliki will produce better results. Over that period, the U.S. has tried various military tactics -- having U.S. troops take the lead, having them step back from major cities, inserting them deep into urban conflict zones or having them stay on the perimeters -- only to see the security situation worsen steadily. At the same time, American officials have been disappointed in Mr. Maliki, considering him too passive in addressing Iraq's deep political rifts and too timid in confronting the militias that increasingly pose serious security problems.

Mr. Maliki took office in May after almost five months of postelection political wrangling among Shiite Muslims, Sunni Muslims and Kurds. From the outset, U.S. officials knew his "unity government" had a weak grip on power and a limited ability to achieve deals on exceedingly divisive issues such as distribution of oil revenue, amnesty for Sunni insurgents and the dissolution of Shiite militias.

As sectarian violence worsened during the summer, top U.S. officials decided to flood Baghdad with troops and checkpoints in an effort to stem the chaos and help the weak Maliki government build some much needed credibility with the Iraqi people. According to the plan, helping the government appear stronger would make it easier for Mr. Maliki to forge much-needed compromises that would in turn enhance security. But the crackdown's failure and the lack of good military options that remain are prompting a renewed emphasis on repairing some of the deep sectarian rifts sooner rather than later.

Recent events suggest it will be hard for Mr. Maliki, who took office with support from radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, to force the changes the U.S. wants. For example, less than two days after Mr. Maliki met with Mr. Sadr and Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Mr. Sadr's militia stormed the city of Amara and clashed with local police forces and a rival Shiite militia. The violence was seen by many Iraqis as a sign of Mr. Maliki's inability to bring Mr. Sadr and his militia under control.

Democrats pounced on the shift announced yesterday as a sign of political desperation. "Today, it is no small irony that Republicans -- who desperately fear the voters' wrath in elections just two weeks from today -- have excised 'stay the course' from their vocabulary and announced that the Iraqis have agreed to a timetable for achieving political and security benchmarks," said Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer, the second-ranking House Democrat.

In a joint news conference in Baghdad, Gen. George Casey and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the top two U.S. officials there, said Iraqi leaders have agreed to the outlines of a plan to stabilize the country. The goal would be for Iraqi forces to take full control of security in the country in the next 12 to 18 months with "some level" of American support.

Mr. Khalilzad mentioned several areas in which progress would be measured that depend heavily on Iraqi leaders to reach political compromises on such contentious issues as the distribution of oil revenue, the disarming of militias and some sort of reconciliation program to bring warring Sunni and Shiite Muslims together. He also called for Iraqi leaders to improve the capability and credibility of their police and army forces -- with U.S. help.

DOJ_NMG_0086051

"Iraqi leaders have agreed to a timeline for making the hard decisions needed to resolve these issues," Mr. Khalilzad said. He stopped short of laying out specific dates for the milestones. U.S. officials also have rejected suggestions that the U.S. would threaten to withdraw troops if the goals aren't met.

The apparent shift toward achieving a political solution stems from the limited military options available to the U.S. and Iraqis. Since August, thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops have been concentrated in Baghdad to quell violence by insurgents and sectarian death squads. The hope was that tamping down violence in the capital would make it possible to bring the rest of the country under control and give Mr. Maliki's government a much needed boost.

In a way, officials now are describing a strategy that reverses the priorities the U.S. had set for itself and its allies in the Iraqi government. Bush administration officials had long theorized that Iraq's security situation needed to be stabilized before its fledgling government would have the breathing space to solve the difficult sectarian splits and regional feuds. Now, the U.S. is proposing that Mr. Maliki needs to do more to establish a government worth defending before a security force can be built to do that job adequately.

In Washington, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley echoed the message to Mr. Maliki and his government to act now. "I think they've got to do more and they've got to do it faster," Mr. Hadley said in a radio interview at the White House. "And I think if you talked to Prime Minister al-Maliki, he would say to you the same thing."

October has been the deadliest month this year for American forces. The military yesterday announced four more U.S. troops had been killed, raising the U.S. death toll for the month to at least 91 so far. After a brief dip in late August and early September, the number of Iraqis killed in Baghdad also seems to be building again to levels similar to those before the stabilization campaign.

Despite rising casualties, Gen. Casey suggested the extra troops are making a difference. Currently there are about 15,600 American troops, 10,000 Iraqi army troops and 30,000 Iraqi police involved in Operation Forward Together, the joint military effort in the capital. Gen. Casey suggested he might ask for more soldiers to help hold onto areas of Baghdad that the U.S. had cleared of Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads.

"Do we need more troops to do that? Maybe. And as I've said all along, if we do, I will ask for the troops I need, both coalition and Iraqis," he said.

But it isn't clear whether more troops would indeed be available in large numbers. The U.S. has a relatively small force available in Kuwait that it could call on if needed. But the U.S. Army is so stretched right now by missions in Iraq and Afghanistan that it has few active-duty troops ready and equipped to flow into Iraq. Democratic Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island warned in a Senate hearing in August that two-thirds of the Army's active force is unready, while the remainder of the force is largely deployed.

Calling up National Guard troops to ease the pressure is also a problem. To increase significantly the size of the reserve force the Bush administration would have to change longstanding Pentagon policies that allow the Army to call up National Guard and Army Reserve troops for a second Iraq tour. Such a move would be politically unpalatable and could spark further calls from Congress to shift the plan in Iraq. Some U.S. officials also worry that sending in more American soldiers may not help much, unless they are partnered with reliable Iraqi troops who know the terrain.

In addition to laying out political milestones, Gen. Casey also said American and Iraqi officials believed that in 12 to 18 months, Iraqi security forces would be "completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security. That's still coupled with some level of support from us."

The performance of the Iraqi army and police forces in the current Baghdad security initiative has been mixed. U.S. officials have complained that the police have been significantly infiltrated by Shiite militias. And only two of the six army battalions the Iraqis pledged to the effort have been delivered, according to reports in the New York Times. Some U.S. officials say the performance of the Iraqi forces likely will remain uneven without progress on the political front.

"An insurgency is a political struggle," said Kalev Sepp, a professor at the Naval Postgraduate School who has advised U.S. commanders in Baghdad on counterinsurgency strategy. "You can't create security forces if they don't have a government to fight for."

No Major Troop Cut In Iraq For A Year (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — U.S. officials said Tuesday that Iraq's security forces won't be able to stand on their own for another 12 to 18 months, meaning substantial numbers of U.S. forces will likely remain in Iraq through next year.

DOJ_NMG_0086052

U.S. officials had previously expected to begin significant U.S. troop withdrawals by the end of this year. The reassessment follows an upsurge in sectarian violence in Baghdad and fighting in Anbar province in western Iraq. There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

So far in October, 91 American troops have died, making it the deadliest month for U.S. forces this year.

"It is going to take another 12 to 18 months or so till I believe the Iraqi security forces are completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security," said Gen. George Casey, the ranking U.S. commander in Iraq.

The U.S. military will provide "some level of support" after that, he said.

He did not rule out bolstering the 15,400 American troops now in Baghdad.

In Washington, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said commanders continually reassess U.S. troop levels in Iraq based on the strength and capability of Iraqi armed forces.

"Back in August and July, we thought we might be able to reduce the size of U.S. forces by this Christmas," Pace said. "And then the violence in Baghdad increased."

In 2005, Casey said "substantial reductions" in troop levels were possible in 2006.

Casey and other U.S. officials typically qualify their forecasts by saying plans depend on the enemy and abilities of Iraqi forces.

Two weeks before congressional elections, the Bush administration has been under fire from some Republicans and Democrats for not making a course correction in the face of renewed violence in Iraq.

On Tuesday, Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad held a rare news conference in the Green Zone to discuss progress in training Iraqi forces and building the nation's government.

The officials said Iraq's leaders have agreed to establish benchmarks by the end of the year that will measure the fledgling government's progress.

The milestones include cracking down on militias, creating a law to share oil wealth and persuading Sunni insurgents to lay down their arms.

The benchmarks are designed partly to pressure Iraq to move quicker to reach a political solution. Iraq's government is attempting to reach an agreement with militias and some insurgent groups to lay down their weapons. A political agreement is seen as key to ending religious warfare.

"A lot of what we're seeing right now is hasty knee-jerk reaction to the serious deterioration of Iraq," said Wayne White, who formerly headed the State Department's Iraq intelligence team and is a scholar at the Middle East Institute.

Iraqi Takeover Target Set (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

The top U.S. military commander in Iraq set a timeline yesterday of 18 months for the Iraqi security forces to take over war operations in all the country's provinces "with some level of support from us."

Army Gen. George Casey did not commit to a timeline for removing 147,000 U.S. troops, as House Democratic leaders have demanded and as President Bush has resisted. But achieving Gen. Casey's new benchmark would assuredly mean a smaller American force in Iraq, where about 2,800 U.S. service members have died since the March 2003 invasion. Iraqi forces now control operations in just two of 18 provinces.

At the same Baghdad press conference, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad announced that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has agreed to a series of benchmarks for reaching a "national compact" within 12 months to end Sunni-Shi'ite violence and equitably divide the country's wealth.

Mr. Khalilzad said Mr. al-Maliki also has agreed to come up with a plan for controlling various militias, such as the Mahdi Army of firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, by year's end. But Mr. Khalilzad offered no specifics on how Mr. al-Maliki will accomplish a task he has so far resisted.

"Iraqi leaders must step up to achieve key political and security milestones on which they have agreed," he said. "The prime minister has a timeline of developing a plan by the end of the year, and we support that."

The joint press conference capped a week of intensified rhetoric on Iraq as the Bush administration urges the al-Maliki government to move faster to take over security chores and let U.S. forces go home.

Pressed by Democrats and some Republicans to change course as more than 90 U.S. troops have died in Iraq this month, Mr. Bush telephoned Mr. al-Maliki last week to convey a sense of urgency. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld declared last week Iraq must take over more security missions "sooner rather than later."

Gen. Casey, who boosted U.S. troop levels in Iraq from 132,000 to 147,000 in the face of war breaking out in Baghdad, offered no concrete assurances that yesterday's announced plan would result in reductions. He said his forces face a

DOJ_NMG_0086053

"fundamental change" in the enemy from a year ago. Added to the al Qaeda suicide bombers and Iraqi Sunni insurgents is an outgrowth of armed groups under no one's central control who roam the Baghdad area killing civilians.

Gen. Casey's chief spokesman declared last week that a huge influx of security forces into Baghdad the past three months had failed to reduce violence. Gen. Casey took a different view yesterday.

"The Baghdad security plan continues to have a dampening effect on sectarian violence," he said. "The situation is hard, but it's not a country that's awash in sectarian violence."

There are today more than 300,000 Iraqis security forces. The military says six of 10 army divisions are "in the lead," which means they can conduct operations on their own but need U.S. support.

Mr. Khalilzad predicted that by November 2007 he will have a "national compact in place" that better defines the division of oil wealth among Sunnis, majority Shi'ites and Kurds. The compact also would include changes to the ongoing "de-Ba'athification" program to promote reconciliation among some of Saddam Hussein's old party members.

Two other parts of the overall plan are to induce Iraqi political leaders to get armed groups in Baghdad to disarm, and have moderate neighboring states to persuade Sunni leaders to end their insurgency.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California was not impressed.

"General Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, confirmed this morning that staying the course -- no matter what slogan this administration chooses to attach to it -- means it will be another 12 to 18 months before the Iraqis will be able to provide security for their country," the Democrat said. "With the war in Iraq now more than 3½ years old, Iraq engulfed in chaos, and U.S. casualties continuing to mount, this is simply unacceptable."

The general made his announcement after a Saturday teleconference from Baghdad with Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Mr. Rumsfeld and other leaders. His announcement is the closest the administration has come to setting a timetable without changing overall war strategy, as critics demand.

Gen. Casey got advice yesterday from House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter of California and 32 other House Republicans. In a letter to Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld, they urged the two to order more Iraqi battalions into Baghdad.

"Combat experience is gained by one thing -- combat," the letter said. "There is no reason why Iraqi military forces currently deployed in relatively quiet regions of Iraq should not immediately be sent to the fight in Baghdad."

U.S. Says More GIs May Be Needed In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, October 25, 2006

Two weeks before U.S. midterm elections, American officials unveiled a timeline Tuesday for Iraq's Shiite-led government to take specific steps to calm the world's most dangerous capital and said more U.S. troops might be needed to quell the bloodshed.

U.S. officials previously said they were satisfied with troop levels and had expected to make significant reductions by year's end. But a surge in sectarian killings, which welled up this past summer, forced them to reconsider.

At a rare joint news conference with the American ambassador, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, said additional U.S. troops could come from inside or outside Iraq to "improve basic services for the population of Baghdad."

"Now, do we need more troops to do that? Maybe. And, as I've said all along, if we do, I will ask for the troops I need, both coalition and Iraqis," Casey said. There are currently 144,000 U.S. forces in Iraq.

The military has expressed disappointment over its two-month drive to cleanse the capital of Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia fighters and death squads. But the Americans also say that for the situation to improve, the Iraqi government must make political concessions to minority Sunnis.

The timeline grew out of recent Washington meetings at which the Bush administration sought to reshape its Iraq policy amid mounting U.S. deaths and declining domestic support for the 44-month-old war. The plan was made public a day after White House press secretary Tony Snow said the U.S. was adjusting its Iraq strategy but would not issue any ultimatums.

U.S. officials revealed neither specific incentives for the Iraqis to implement the plan nor penalties for their failure to do so. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Iraqi leaders had agreed to the timeline, benchmarks heavily laden with enticements to Sunni insurgents.

The lack of any real political consensus even among Shiites, however, has made it extremely difficult for Iraqi leaders to keep deadlines; for example, they missed targeted dates on naming a government and in moving forward on constitutional amendments. Moreover, Tuesday's declarations lacked specifics on how to accomplish the goals.

At the news conference with Casey, Khalilzad said the timeline would require Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government to set dates by the end of the year for completing six key tasks.

DOJ_NMG_0086054

Five of the markers are clearly designed to mollify Sunni Arabs, the Muslim sect that makes up the bulk of the insurgency and is responsible for most American deaths in Iraq.

The plan seeks deadlines for passing a law that would guarantee the sharing of Iraq's oil wealth, amending the constitution, turning an anti-Baathist organization into a reconciliation body, disbanding Shiite militias and setting a date for provincial elections — all key issues for Sunnis.

The de-Baathification Commission was established after the toppling of Saddam Hussein to ensure that members of the dictator's political organization did not hold government positions.

The sixth measure called for "increasing the credibility and capability of Iraqi forces."

Casey said Iraqi forces would be "completely capable" of controlling the country within the next 1 1/2 years.

"We are about 75 percent of the way through a three-step process in building those (Iraqi) forces," the general said. "It is going to take another 12 to 18 months or so until I believe the Iraqi security forces are completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security. That's still coupled with some level of support from us."

Casey's estimate of when the Iraqi army will be ready was noteworthy because it has not changed even as the security situation in the country has deteriorated. Iraqis are now being killed at a pace of more than 40 each day in sectarian fighting and revenge killing.

Complicating the matter has been the recent outbreak of sustained Shiite-on-Shiite violence in the once relatively calm south of the country.

To curb the spreading and increasingly brutal killings, Khalilzad said the United States was "inducing Iraqi political and religious leaders who can control or influence armed groups in Baghdad to agree to stop sectarian violence," an apparent reference to recent secret talks the United States has conducted with Sunni insurgents.

Al-Maliki has repeatedly said he would rein in Shiite militias but so far has taken little public action beyond a decision to move aside two police commando leaders. He issued a statement on Monday saying the military had been ordered to take action against any illegal armed group, but the declaration, like the timeline introduced on Tuesday, lacked detail.

His national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, sought to add weight to the prime minister's directive in an interview with CNN. He was, however, equally fuzzy about what action would be taken.

"The Iraqi security forces are going to take on anyone who challenges" them," al-Rubaie said.

Khalilzad said he had assurances from al-Maliki that radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr would disband his Mahdi Army. But al-Sadr draws much of his power from his control over the heavily armed fighters. And al-Maliki draws much of his support from al-Sadr.

For that reason, disbanding the feared militia group appears to be a promise that is unlikely to be kept in the near term. Such a move would leave the other main Shiite militia, the Badr Brigade of the Supreme Council for the Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, in a dominant position.

Al-Sadr and SCIRI leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim maintain a sharp rivalry for power over Iraq's Shiite majority. Logic dictates that both militias be disbanded simultaneously, which appears highly unlikely.

While Shiite militias and death squad violence represent a major security problem, curbing them would still leave the other half of the equation unsolved — the continued vibrancy of the Sunni insurgency that has been attacking Americans with a vengeance since summer 2003.

The timeline appeared, therefore, largely directed at luring the Sunni establishment away from violence and into the political process.

October has been the deadliest month this year for American forces. The military Tuesday announced the deaths of two more U.S. Marines, a sailor and a soldier. Since the start of the war, 2,801 U.S. service members have died in Iraq, according to an Associated Press count.

Also Tuesday, the military said it had found no sign of a U.S. Army translator missing after he was believed to have been kidnapped the night before in Baghdad. Troops continued to search the city's downtown on foot and by air.

The military said the soldier, a linguist who was not identified by name, was last seen inside Green Zone on Monday. He was then believed to have left to visit Iraqi relatives in the city.

He was apparently at the relatives' house when three cars carrying masked gunmen arrived. The soldier was handcuffed and driven away. One of the kidnappers then called one of the relatives using the kidnap victim's cell phone, the military said. It didn't say if ransom was demanded.

Across the country, police reported that 11 Iraqis, including two policemen and a soldier, were killed in bombings and shootings; authorities said 14 bodies were found dumped or pulled from the Tigris River.

Iraqi Realities Undermine The Pentagon's Predictions (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0086055

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 24 — In trying to build support for the American strategy in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. said Tuesday that the Iraqi military could be expected to take over the primary responsibility for securing the country within 12 to 18 months.

But that laudable goal seems far removed from the violence-plagued streets of Iraq's capital, where American forces have taken the lead in trying to protect the city and American soldiers substantially outnumber Iraqi ones.

Given the rise in sectarian killings, a Sunni-based insurgency that appears to be as potent as ever and an Iraqi security establishment that continues to have difficulties deploying sufficient numbers of motivated and proficient forces in Baghdad, General Casey's target seems to be an increasingly heroic assumption.

On paper, Iraq has substantial security forces. The Pentagon noted in an August report to Congress that Iraq had more than 277,000 troops and police officers, including some 115,000 army combat soldiers.

But those figures, which have often been cited at Pentagon news conferences as an indicator of progress and a potential exit strategy for American troops, paint a distorted picture. When the deep-seated reluctance of many soldiers to serve outside their home regions, leaves of absence and AWOL rates are taken into account, only a portion of the Iraqi Army is readily available for duty in Baghdad and other hot spots.

The fact that the Ministry of Defense has sent only two of the six additional battalions that American commanders have requested for Baghdad speaks volumes about the difficulty the Iraqi government has encountered in fielding a professional military. The four battalions that American commanders are still waiting for is equivalent to 2,800 soldiers, hardly a large commitment in the abstract but one that the Iraqis are still struggling to meet.

From the start, General Casey's broader strategy for Iraq has been premised on the optimistic assumption that Iraqi forces could soon substitute for American ones. In February 2005, General Casey noted that in the year ahead the United States would begin to "transfer the counterinsurgency mission to the increasingly capable Iraqi security forces across Iraq."

In June 2006, General Casey submitted a confidential plan to the White House projecting American troop withdrawals that would begin in September 2006 and which, conditions permitting, would lead to a more than 50 percent reduction in American combat brigades by December 2007. Iraq's security forces were to fill the gap. In keeping with that strategy, American forces cut back their patrols in Baghdad during the first half of 2006.

It did not take long before the plan had to be shelved and American forces increased to try to tamp down the sectarian killings there. Still, General Casey continued to portray the current surge in fighting as a difficult interlude before the Iraqi security forces could begin to assume the main combat role and some variant of his withdrawal plan for American forces could be put back on track.

As he said Tuesday, "It's going to take another 12 to 18 months or so till, I believe, the Iraqi security forces are completely capable of taking over responsibility for their own security, still probably with some level of support from us, but that will be directly asked for by the Iraqis."

Certainly, the Iraqi security forces have made some gains. The Iraqi military is larger and better trained, and has taken control of more territory in the past year. Some Iraqi soldiers have fought well. But in Baghdad, which American commanders have defined as the central front in the war, it is still a junior partner.

To improve the Iraqi forces, the American military is inserting teams of military advisers with Iraqi units. American officials also say their Iraqi counterparts are trying to use the lure of extra pay to persuade reluctant troops to come to the aid of their capital.

But longstanding problems remain. A quarter or so of a typical Iraqi unit is on leave at any one time. Since Iraq lacks an effective banking system for paying its troops, soldiers are generally given a week's leave each month to bring their pay home.

Desertions and absenteeism are another concern. According to the August Pentagon report, 15 percent of new recruits drop out during initial training. Beyond that, deployment to combat zones, the report adds, sometimes results in additional "absentee spikes of 5 to 8 percent."

As a result, the actual number of Iraqi boots on the ground on a given day is routinely less than the official number. In areas where the risks and hardship are particularly great, the shortfall is sometimes significant. In fiercely contested Anbar Province in western Iraq, the day-to-day strength of the Seventh Iraqi Army Division in August was only about 35 percent of the soldiers on its rolls, while the day-to-day strength of the First Division was 50 percent of its authorized strength.

Another complication is that the even-numbered divisions in the 10-division army have largely been recruited locally and thus generally reflect the ethnic makeup of the regions where they are based. So, much of the Iraqi Army consists of soldiers who are reluctant to serve outside the areas in which they reside. Several battalions have gone AWOL rather then deploy to Baghdad, an American military officer said.

DOJ_NMG_0086056

The Iraqi government is well aware of such problems. Its plan is to increase the overall size of the military by 50,000, calculating that if it assigns extra troops to each unit they can be maintained near full strength when soldiers go on leave or are otherwise absent.

The difficulties with the Iraqi police, who are supposed to play a major role in protecting cleared areas under the Baghdad security plan, are considerable and include corruption and divided loyalties to militias. According to the Pentagon report, the Interior Ministry also lacks an effective management system. The Americans know how many Iraqis have been trained to work as police officers but not how many are still on the job.

The National Police have been a particular worry. One National Police unit has been withdrawn from duty in Baghdad because it was linked to sectarian killings. National Police brigades are now being removed from duty one by one for retraining with an eye to changing, as General Casey put it, the "ethos of these forces."

In the final analysis, the problem is more one of institution building than numbers. Until Iraq has a genuine unity government that its own forces respect and are willing to fight for, it seems likely that the American military will continue to shoulder most of the burden.

More Troops Means More Targets For Snipers (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Sniper attacks on U.S. troops have risen dramatically as more Americans have been pulled into the capital to patrol on foot and in lightly armored vehicles amid raging religious violence.

Sniper attacks, generally defined as one or two well-aimed shots from a distance, have totaled 36 so far this month in Baghdad, according to U.S. military statistics.

That's up from 23 such attacks in September and 11 in January.

The figures were confirmed by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the No. 2 commander of U.S. forces in Iraq. "The total numbers are elevated, and the effectiveness has been greater," he said.

At least eight of the 36 sniper attacks in Baghdad in October have been fatal, according to accounts by hometown newspapers reporting on the deaths of individual soldiers and Marines. Snipers have also killed four U.S. servicemembers in Anbar province this month.

Pentagon practice has been to withhold specifics about the cause of death from news releases about casualties to avoid letting enemy fighters know whether their tactics have been successful. The releases typically attribute deaths in such cases to "small-arms fire" or "combat operations." The military, however, often informs family members of the circumstances of a fatality.

Even with the growing number of sniper attacks, the single largest cause of fatal casualties remains roadside bombs, which the Pentagon calls "improvised explosive devices." The Army has reported 234 deaths this year attributed to IEDs, alone or with other causes, and 57 attributed to "small-arms fire," which includes snipers. The Marines do not report such details.

There have been 621 U.S. troop deaths this year.

Attacks by snipers have increased since June, when the U.S. command shifted troops to Baghdad and assigned them to aggressive joint patrols with Iraqi forces as part of a security crackdown called Operation Together Forward.

There are 15,400 U.S. troops in the capital, up from about 9,000 in July. On Tuesday, Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said more U.S. troops could be sent to Baghdad.

The dense city environment has given snipers the opportunity to fire on U.S. troops and slip away. U.S. troops often can't return fire without risking civilians' lives.

"That could turn the mood of the city against us," said Lt. Col. Steve Stover, a spokesman for U.S. forces.

The upswing in attacks by snipers "is definitely the result of working in an urban area — with many, many more targets out there — that's made the effectiveness of that particular form of attack higher this month than we've seen before," Chiarelli said.

Insurgent groups have prepared instructional manuals and videos to train more snipers. Training materials obtained by U.S. intelligence show that snipers are urged to single out medics, engineers and chaplains for attacks on the theory that those casualties will demoralize entire units.

The manuals have been posted on the Internet. U.S. Central Command has verified the authenticity of at least one such training guide.

One recently captured insurgent sniper had a hole in the trunk of his car, which allowed him to fire at U.S. and Iraqi troops while hidden in the vehicle, said Brig Gen. David Halverson, deputy commander of U.S. forces in and around Baghdad. The sniper also mounted a video camera on his car's rear window.

DOJ_NMG_0086057

Enemy snipers in Iraq have improved their skills, and their attacks have become "well-aimed and well-disciplined," said Col. Michael Beech, commander of the 4th Brigade Combat Team in central Baghdad. His brigade has lost two soldiers to sniper fire since September, he said.

In an attack Oct. 2, a sniper shot and killed a soldier in the turret of a Humvee supporting an Iraqi-led operation in Baghdad's Karradah neighborhood, said Maj. Mark Cheadle, a 4th Brigade spokesman. Days later, another soldier was shot in the face while on patrol. The round passed through his sinus cavity and exited his nose, but he survived, Cheadle said.

Military commanders and other U.S. officials met Monday in Baghdad to discuss how to respond to the increase in sniper attacks, Chiarelli said. He declined to talk about details of the meeting. He also declined to identify any factions responsible for sniper attacks.

The U.S. military has dispatched countersniper teams and advised soldiers to be extra vigilant on patrols, Beech said. Countersniper teams consist of specialists trained to spot enemy snipers and kill them before they can attack.

"You're out on the street, and you take one or two rounds at your patrol that's (on foot), and you look out there and it could come from literally several hundred different windows," Beech said. "And you don't have any idea which one. That's what makes the sniper threat in an urban terrain, in a three-dimensional battlefield like Baghdad, so difficult."

Envoy Says Not All Is Bad In Iraq (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad insisted Tuesday that things are not all bad in Iraq, citing the growing number of satellite dishes on rooftops and consumers with cell phones as signs of economic progress.

"Economically, I see an Iraq every day that I do not think the American people know about — where cell phones and satellite dishes, once forbidden, are now common, where economic reform takes place on a regular basis, where agricultural production is rising dramatically, and where the overall economy and the consumer sector is growing," the American envoy told a Baghdad news conference.

Some Iraqis saw things differently.

"We'd prefer he take those back and return just 10 percent of our prewar life," said Mohammed Ibrahim, a 50-year-old government employee from Baghdad. "Saying things like that shows the Americans' contempt for us Iraqis."

Analogies between conditions in Iraq now and life before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq are common among Iraqis, angered over what they see as the failure of successive Iraqi governments and their American backers to provide security, services or jobs.

Khalilzad spoke at one of the lowest points in America's involvement in Iraq.

An average of more than 40 Iraqis are being killed every day in October, according to an Associated Press count that is based on AP reporting and considered a minimum. The violence has forced nearly 1 million Iraqis to flee abroad since 2003 and as many as 300,000 more have become refugees in their own country because of sectarian killings.

Mobile phones were introduced in Iraq in 2004 and proved to be an instant hit, with about 1 million subscribers in the Baghdad area alone now. Similarly, satellite dishes, prohibited under Saddam Hussein, also proved popular, and there is hardly a rooftop in Baghdad or elsewhere in Iraq now without at least one.

The advent of the two came as part of the free market economy that spontaneously sprang up in Iraq in the chaos and freewheeling period after Saddam's ouster, filling markets with everything from South American bananas to South Korean electrical goods, Finnish telephones and Iranian biscuits.

But after nearly 13 years of U.N. sanctions that reduced millions of Iraqis to destitution, not everyone was able to enjoy the fruits of the free market. Government employees, about 1 million nationwide, have been the biggest spenders since 2003, thanks to pay raises as high as 100 percent.

Amrah al-Badawi, a Shiite lawmaker and a member of parliament's economic committee, chuckled when told of Khalilzad's comments.

"Iraqis longed for mobile phones and satellite television, but their availability now are of little relevance to the economy," she said. "What we need is economic ventures, and these are not going to happen with security the way it is."

Without substantial economic activity, Iraqis continue to suffer 30 percent unemployment and double-digit inflation.

The price of gasoline, which is often scarce, has increased 12-fold since 2003. Bread prices are up by nearly five-fold and fresh meat by more than 100 percent. Tenuous security means that less farm produce reaches retail markets, causing prices to rise.

Most Iraqis continue to depend on their Saddam-era food ration cards, but many holders say key items like sugar and rice are sometimes unavailable for as long as three months.

DOJ_NMG_0086058

The wide access to satellite dishes and mobile phones also hold some unpleasant ironies.

Mobile phones have been widely used to set off many of the bombs that kill and maim across much of the country, with U.S. and Iraqi forces their primary victims. Satellite dishes also have enabled Iraqis to watch programs perceived to have anti-U.S. content, such as Qatar-based al-Jazeera television and Hezbollah's al-Manar TV.

Baghdad residents say they are spoiled by the large number of channels available on satellite TV, something that keeps them entertained when they huddle at home, afraid to go out for fear of falling victim to the violence.

But killing time in front of television needs electricity and that's one of Iraq's big postwar problems. Power outages in Baghdad are a daily occurrence, and they can last up to three days.

Khalilzad, however, rejected the analogy some Iraqis use on life before and after Saddam.

"The important fact to keep in mind is that, of course, a lot of innocent Iraqis are getting killed, and that's a source of concern to us and to the Iraqis," he said. "But during Saddam, thousands upon thousands of Iraqis were killed as a result of a government policy."

For Alaa Makki of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni party: "We ended up with a worse-than-before dictatorship. We now have slaughter, kidnapping and disenfranchisement."

Associated Press writers Sinan Salaheddin, Bushra Juhi and Qassim Abdul-Zahra in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Gen. Pace Optimistic About Iraq Progress (AP-Y)

By Lolita Baldor

AP, October 25, 2006

The top American general said Tuesday he is not discouraged by what other U.S. commanders have described as disappointing progress in securing Baghdad, but he predicted no quick turnaround.

Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told a Pentagon news conference that his optimism about Iraq's future is based on his belief that most Iraqis want peace and stability. He also said Iraqis have plenty of incentive to halt the sectarian violence that threatens to tear their country apart.

"The great incentive inside of Iraq with the Iraqi people is their own self-pride and determination that they want to stand on their own; they want to be free; they want to determine their own way ahead," Pace said.

While military commanders may not be discouraged, Republicans fighting to keep control of Congress are frustrated with the lack of progress in Baghdad so close to the Nov. 7 elections.

In a letter released Tuesday, 33 House Republicans urged Bush to send into Baghdad any proficient Iraqi units available. Five of the Republicans — Reps. Thelma Drake of Virginia, Marilyn Musgrave of Colorado, Geoff Davis of Kentucky, Rob Simmons of Connecticut and John Doolittle of California — are in tight political races.

"It is crucial that both the U.S. and Iraqi governments recognize that as the battle in Iraq has intensified, so has the need to send Iraqi battalions into the heart of battle," the lawmakers wrote. "Now is exactly the time to do so."

Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser, said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the fledging government are starting to take steps aimed at quelling the rising sectarian violence and moving Iraq toward prosperity and peace.

"I think they've got to do more and they've got to do it faster," Hadley said in a radio interview at the White House. "And I think if you talked to Prime Minister (Nouri) al-Maliki he would say, to you, the same thing."

Asked if the U.S. is winning in Iraq, Pace responded in terms of the broader war on terrorism that includes Afghanistan and efforts elsewhere in the world to defeat al-Qaida and other terrorist networks.

"Winning in this war on terrorism is having security in the countries we're trying to help that allows for those governments to function and for their people to function," he said.

In Baghdad, U.S. officials said Iraqi government leaders have agreed to develop a timeline by the end of the year for progress in stabilizing Iraq and reducing violence that has killed 300 Iraqi troops during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan alone.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander who appeared at a news conference with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, said Iraqi forces should be able to take control of security in the next 12 to 18 months with minimal American support.

Pace said there was not yet a U.S.-Iraqi agreement on specific benchmarks for progress; he said discussions are ongoing with regard to benchmarks in the political, economic and security areas. Pace said it would not be wise to set specific dates for meeting certain markers.

"Having a very precise date I think is not useful, either from the standpoint of forcing yourself to do something too soon or from giving your enemies too much information," he said.

Casey also said he felt the United States should continue to focus on drawing down the number of American forces in the country, adding that he would not hesitate to ask for more troops if he felt they were necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0086059

"We're not making the progress we would like and that's why we have to look at what we are doing and see what we need to change to get the kind of progress that we need," Hadley told National Public Radio. "You don't need a timetable to be able and willing to say to the Iraqis, `Look, if this is going to work and succeed, you have to step up and make some very difficult choices.'"

He predicted that stability and security will not be achieved in Iraq before Bush leaves the White House.

"Is there going to be peace? Is there going to the end of any violence? Of course not. This violence is going to go on for a long time," Hadley said. "But what you hope for is a situation where Iraqi governmental institutions and Iraqi security forces can manage and contain the violence so that it does not threaten the integrity of the Iraqi state and the ability of the Iraqi state to bring prosperity and economic life to its community."

Democrats said Tuesday the suggestion of a timeline has come too late. "While it is helpful to lay out a timeline for the training of the Iraqi forces, after three and a half years of training, this timeline is too long," said Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton, top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee.

Lawmakers Warm To Plan For Divided Iraq (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 25, 2006

As more Republicans join Democrats in pushing for a change of strategy in Iraq, lawmakers and candidates are signaling new openness to dividing the war-torn nation into three autonomous regions, a plan closely associated with Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.).

Biden, one of his party's most trusted foreign policy voices, has turned up the spotlight on his plan for largely self-governing regions in Iraq. The ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee even launched www.planforiraq.com this month to marshal support for the five-point proposal he co-authored with Council on Foreign Relations President Emeritus Les Gelb.

The dearth of specific alternatives to the current course in Iraq, where U.S. troop deaths are close to a two-year high, has given Biden's plan and his nascent presidential bid for 2008 an infusion of political capital. Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.) has endorsed a similar policy for Iraq in his Senate campaign, calling for three Iraqi regions dominated by Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, respectively, with a pact to share oil revenues.

Republicans are also beginning to echo Biden's suggestions in the politically pressurized pre-election environment, whether to praise the plan or simply urge that it remain "on the table." This puts GOP lawmakers at odds with the president, who has ruled out any regionalizing of Iraq.

"I think this idea of maybe the three autonomous regions within one country may be the one that we start to move more and more towards," Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) said during an appearance last week on CNBC.

Brownback used the former nation of Yugoslavia, which was regionally divided by the 1990s Balkan war, as an example of the strategy's potential. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) also cited the Balkans in telling reporters last week that autonomous regions could be the solution to the violent insurgency that threatens to consume Iraq.

Foreign Relations panel Chairman Richard Lugar (R-Ind.) has spoken positively about greater autonomy in Iraq, while stopping short of endorsing Biden's approach. Lugar says U.S. policymakers should ensure the Iraqi parliament moves on the federalism law it passed Oct. 11 over the objections of many Sunni leaders, who fear losing oil revenues.

"All sorts of people, whether they're Republicans or Democrats or independents, believe there's a strong consensus that we need to change course," said a Biden aide. "It's obviously different for them to come out and say this two, three, four weeks before an election."

Other Democrats have hailed the prospect of dividing Iraq in three, including Eric Massa, the retired naval officer challenging Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.), and Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), who offered the solution before Biden and Gelb published their first commentary on it in May.

Schumer's office did not return a request for comment on whether his position on autonomous Iraqi regions has changed. Hutchison spokeswoman Jamie Loftus said that the GOP leadership hopeful views a federalist strategy as "one option in Iraq" and prioritized revenue sharing as well as cooperation with Iraq's neighbors.

House Armed Services ranking member Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), speaking with reporters Friday after a dozen House and Senate Democratic leaders released a letter imploring President Bush to change course in Iraq, called the Biden concept "intriguing" and said the plan should be considered despite potential sticking points.

"It would work in some areas, but what do you do with places such as Baghdad, with the three different ethnic groups there?" Skelton said. "How do you allow the Sunnis to share in oil revenues?"

DOJ_NMG_0086060

That Democratic letter points to the Iraqi government's "failure to achieve a political reconciliation plan" without overtly addressing the Biden plan. In the early stages of internal positioning for 2008, any perceived imprimatur from leadership could enflame tensions among other Democrats weighing a White House run.

"Democrats have coalesced around a core set of principles for what we should do. We didn't think it was appropriate in that kind of letter that so many people were signing onto to endorse a particular Democrat's plan," one senior Democratic aide said, adding that Biden concurred with the approach.

Other lawmakers in Biden's party have sought to temper growing talk of the plan's viability. Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a senior Armed Services Committee member who has served as his leadership's point man on Iraq issues, listed several drawbacks to the federalism approach yesterday at a Center for American Progress event.

"[A] deliberate, conscious policy to separate the country with the idea that this is going to make things easier and let us leave is probably inaccurate," Reed said. He acknowledged that the Iraqis are moving toward their own regional divisions, but expressed "severe reservations that this should be the deliberate policy of the United States."

Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), said via e-mail that Biden's willingness to seek an alternative solution underscores Democrats' commitment to resolving the crisis in Iraq.

"It's a thoughtful plan, and an effort to change course, something the president has been unwilling to do," Manley said. "Senator Biden is for change, President Bush is for more of the same. …"

Yet despite Biden's rising stock on Iraq, his emphasis on a bipartisan approach to Iraq could turn off some of the same anti-war Democrats who have criticized Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) for her unwillingness to disavow her vote to authorize the war.

"I'm not sure how it plays for the base of our party — bipartisanship is probably a dirty word for some of them," said a Democratic aide. "I can understand it, because we've been so beaten over the head by [Republicans]."

The Beltway Retreat (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

"We need to be realist but not defeatist. We need to understand that there is a need of utmost urgency to deal with many of the problems of Iraq but we must not give in to panic."

So said Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih on Monday, in a BBC interview while in London for talks with Tony Blair. If only such statesmanship prevailed on this side of the Atlantic, where election politics and a spate of critical new books have combined to paint an increasingly desperate -- and false -- picture of what's happening in Iraq.

As the critics describe it, all of Iraq is in chaos, its new government isn't functioning, the U.S. is helpless to act against these inexorable forces, and it is only a matter of time before we must pack up and leave in abject defeat. "We're on the verge of chaos, and the current plan is not working," declares Senator Lindsey Graham, in one of the purer expressions of this elite inconstancy. Just what Mr. Graham would do about this, he doesn't say; but in the land of blind panic, the sound-bite Senator is king.

Yes, the Iraq project is difficult, and its outcome dangerously uncertain. The Bush Administration and its military generals have so far failed to stem insurgent attacks or pacify Baghdad, and the factions comprising Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government have so far failed to make essential political compromises. But the American response to this should be to change military tactics or deployments until they do succeed, and to reassure Iraqi leaders that their hard political choices will result in U.S. support, not precipitous withdrawal.

The current American panic, by contrast, is precisely what the insurgents intend with their surge of October violence. The Baathists and Sadrists can read the U.S. political calendar, and they'd like nothing better than to feed the perception that the violence is intractable. They want our election to be perceived as a referendum on Iraq that will speed the pace of American withdrawal.

The Bush Administration hasn't helped matters of late with its own appearance of indecision, asserting on one day that we must avoid "cut-and-run" while leaking on another that the forthcoming Baker-Hamilton report might be an opportunity for a strategic retreat. President Bush has sounded resolute himself, but many of his own advisers seem to be well along in their own electoral run for cover.

A measure of rationality at least came yesterday out of Baghdad, where General George Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad tried to put the violence in some larger context. The Iraq government is in fact "functioning," as Iraqis continue to get their food rations, and as more than a million civil servants, Iraqi security force members and teachers continue to show up for work every day and get paid. Just this weekend, Iraq's oil minister announced that production had surpassed pre-war levels.

"Economically, I see an Iraq every day that I do not think the American people know about -- where cell phones and satellite dishes, once forbidden, are now common, where economic reform takes place on a regular basis, where agricultural production is rising dramatically, and where the overall economy and the consumer sector is growing," said Mr. Khalilzad, who for this attempt at hopeful realism will be derided in some quarters as a Pollyanna.

DOJ_NMG_0086061

As for security, two provinces have already been turned over entirely to the control of Iraqi forces, with a total of six or seven scheduled to be under Iraqi control by January. While the police forces remain unreliable, the Iraqi army is making notable progress. The joint Iraqi-U.S. operation to make Baghdad safe hasn't succeeded so far, but Iraqis we talk to say the situation in many specific neighborhoods of the capital has been vastly improved.

And while every terrorist success is broadcast far and wide, acts of bravery by Iraqi forces go unheralded. Only 10 days ago, insurgents staged a huge attack on government and police offices in Mosul, but it was successfully repulsed by Iraqi forces. Dozens of insurgents were killed or captured, and one heroic Iraqi police officer gave his life successfully defending others against a suicide truck bomber.

The truth is that the Sunni insurgents are still capable only of hit-and-run attacks, are slaughtered whenever they gather en masse, and have held down no permanent territory since Fallujah was cleaned out in late 2004. Nor have they been successful in their other goal of keeping their fellow Sunnis out of the political process. Sunnis continue to sit in the current government and parliament, despite being labelled "collaborators" and marked for death.

As General Casey observed yesterday, "we've seen the nature of the conflict evolving from what was an insurgency against us to a struggle for the division of political and economic power among the Iraqis." One of the main challenges now is to reassure the Sunnis that it is safe to compromise with Shiite and Kurdish leaders on issues such as the distribution of oil revenue and the shape of Iraqi federalism. Mr. Maliki must also demobilize -- or at least neutralize -- the militias that grew in his own Shiite community in response to Sunni violence.

But the political truth is that none of this will happen any sooner if Americans look like they are heading for the exits. Timetables and deadlines may sound like realpolitik, but they only feed suspicions that the U.S. will abandon Iraq's leaders once they have walked out onto a political limb. Iraq is not yet in a state of "civil war," and it has a functioning, if imperfect, government. If changes of tactics or force levels are needed, by all means make them. But what Iraqis most need from Washington is reassurance of support for the tough decisions and battles that lie ahead.

Insult To Injury In Iraq (WP)

By Frederick W. Kagan

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

It's been coming for a long time: the idea that fixing Iraq is the Iraqis' problem, not ours -- that we've done all we can and now it's up to them.

Such arguments have been latent in the Bush administration's Iraq strategy and explicit in Democratic critiques of that strategy for some time. Now Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has declared: "It's their country. . . . They're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

The implication of these arguments is clear: The United States should prepare to leave Iraq, after which the Iraqis will work out their own troubles -- or they won't. In any event, we can no longer help them. This notion is wrong and morally contemptible, and it endangers American security around the world.

The current crisis in Iraq is no more just an Iraqi problem than it has ever been. The U.S. military destroyed Iraq's government and all institutions able to keep civil order. It designated itself an "occupying force," thereby accepting the responsibility to restore and maintain such order. And yet U.S. Central Command never actually made establishing order and security a priority. Its commander throughout the insurgency, Gen. John Abizaid, has instead repeatedly declared that America's role is primarily to train Iraqi forces to put down their own rebellion and maintain order.

By allowing violence and disorder to spread throughout the country, the Bush administration has broken faith with the Iraqi people and ignored its responsibilities. It has placed U.S. security in jeopardy by creating the preconditions for the sort of terrorist safe haven the president repeatedly warns about and by demonstrating that no ally can rely on America to be there when it counts.

A rapid U.S. withdrawal would lead to catastrophe in Iraq. The presence of American troops is vital to restraining Iraqi soldiers -- the Iraqis know not to participate in death squad activities when Americans are around. The fact that large numbers of U.S. troops are not embedded with the Iraqi police is a main reason for the participation of those forces in the killings. When the U.S. troops go, the Iraqi army will probably go the same way.

Nor is there any likelihood that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will be able to simultaneously accomplish all the tasks now demanded of him, especially without American help. These include reforming the Interior Ministry and the police, disarming Shiite militias, fighting Sunni Arab insurgents, establishing functioning local and regional governments connected to the central government, and rooting out corruption. What are his chances if U.S. forces leave, sectarian violence rises and Iraqis grow ever more pessimistic about the success of their democratic experiment?

DOJ_NMG_0086062

Americans believe that all problems are soluble and therefore that people who aren't solving their problems must not be trying. They need to be "incentivized," either through promises or threats. Many on the left have long been advocating a withdrawal of U.S. forces, or the threat of it, as just such an incentive for the Iraqis. But what if even then Iraqis cannot accomplish the goals we have set for them? Can we then declare that, by establishing the Iraqi army and helping Iraq elect and establish its government, we have done all that honor requires?

No, we can't. Both honor and our vital national interest require establishing conditions in Iraq that will allow the government to consolidate and maintain civil peace and good governance. It doesn't matter how many "trained and ready" Iraqi soldiers there are, nor how many provinces are nominally under Iraqi control. If America withdraws its forces before setting the conditions for the success of the Iraqi government, we will have failed in our mission and been defeated in the eyes of our enemies. We will have dishonored ourselves.

Our enemies watched the debacle in Somalia and drew conclusions: America is weak, unable to stomach even the smallest level of casualties and willing to lose rather than fight. The invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq changed the equation. Al-Qaeda leaders did not expect us to attack, and they regarded their unanticipated defeat as a catastrophe. Iran's leaders and North Korea's Kim Jong Il saw the invasion of Iraq as the first phase of an attack on the "axis of evil" and were fearful. But the protracted insurgency and the apparent weakening of U.S. will are emboldening them once again.

In 1991 the United States encouraged rebellions against Saddam Hussein and then abandoned to his inhuman vengeance the Kurds and Shiites who answered the call. That abandonment, still fresh in the minds of many Iraqis, is one reason for the suspicion with which the United States was greeted in 2003. What will happen if we abandon the progressive forces of Iraq once again with the hypocritical declaration that the resultant failure is their own fault? What reasonable moderate in the Muslim world -- or anywhere -- will ever again rely on America?

The comparison is often made between Iraq and Vietnam. One implication is that just as it was possible to lose Vietnam and still win the Cold War, so it is acceptable to lose Iraq. But in the Cold War, Vietnam was a sideshow. Iraq is in the heart of the Muslim world and at the center of the struggle against radical Islamism.

It is also worth keeping in mind that as indirect consequences of America's defeat in Vietnam, the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, the Sandinistas seized power in Nicaragua and Ayatollah Khomeini seized Tehran and American hostages. The "decent interval" between our withdrawal and the collapse of South Vietnam didn't help. Neither will the implausible deniability the Pentagon is now trying to establish in Iraq.

Those who have criticized the administration for failing to send enough troops to fight the war, failing to plan adequately for the postwar crisis and failing to react properly when it came are right. But Democrats should not be so quick to embrace these attacks unless they are willing to accept the corollary: Just because Bush did the wrong thing in 2003 doesn't mean that we can do the wrong thing now.

The writer is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Success In Iraq Possible, Say US Officials (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

Top US officials in Baghdad on Tuesday said Iraqi forces should be “completely capable” of taking responsibility for security within 18 months. The assertion came as Republican support for the White House strategy on Iraq continued to erode just two weeks ahead of November’s congressional elections.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador, and General George Casey, the top US commander in Iraq, in a rare joint press conference, delivered a unified message: that, despite the images of daily carnage in Baghdad, success was still possible.

In a sign of the growing violence in Baghdad, however, Gen Casey acknowledged that he may have to request more troops. US commanders have previously said they would ask for more soldiers if necessary. But the comments come at a sensitive time for the White House, as October shapes up to be one of the deadliest months for the US military in Iraq.

Reflecting increased pessimism among Republicans that the Iraq war could cost them control of one or both houses of Congress, the White House on Monday said President George W. Bush would no longer use the phrase “stay the course”.

Mr Khalilzad emphasised that the US goal of bringing democracy to Iraq had not changed. He said Iraqi leaders had agreed to develop a timeline of progress on both security and economic issues, including changes to the constitution and disbanding militias.

“They have committed themselves to a timetable for making some of those decisions,” said Mr Khalilzad, adding that he expected significant progress in the coming 12 months.

DOJ_NMG_0086063

Stephen Hadley, the White House national security adviser, on Tuesday said the Iraqi government needed to act more quickly to help improve the situation in the country, although he warned that violence would continue for some time.

"The violence is going to go on for a long time," Mr Hadley told National Public Radio. "But what you hope for is a situation where Iraqi government institutions and Iraqi security forces can manage and contain the violence".

In the latest sign of Republican disatisfaction with the White House, Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican senator and strong supporter of the war, on Tuesday said "We're on the verge of chaos, and the current plan is not working."

Gen Casey dismissed suggestions - most recently by Republican senator Arlen Specter - that Iraq had descended into civil war, insisting that 80 to 90 per cent of the sectarian violence happened in a 30-mile radius of the centre of Baghdad.

The attempt to win back the debate over Iraq comes as the loss of faith in the war reached new highs among the American and British public. A recent CNN poll found that a record 64 per cent of Americans now oppose the conflict.

Officials and analysts in the Middle East have been warning for months that Iraq has been gradually sliding into an uncontrollable civil war, as killings by Shia militias escalate at a faster pace than attacks by Sunni insurgents. Last week, Iraqi Shia and Sunni clerics were invited to the holy city of Mecca in Saudi Arabia to sign a declaration forbidding the shedding of Muslim blood.

The White House has been increasingly forced on to the back foot over Iraq since John Warner, the Republican chairman of the Senate armed services committee, who has been a strong backer of the administration, recently said the situation in Iraq was going "sideways", before warning last weekend that the violence was getting worse.

James Baker, the former secretary of state and Bush family confidante who is leading a bipartisan commission on US policy in Iraq, recently prompted speculation that the White House would gradually move towards a new policy by suggesting that "stay the course" and "cut and run" were not the only two options for Iraq.

The growing doubts about Iraq policy were also aggravated by revelations that the US was increasingly frustrated by the performance of the Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki, which had failed to follow through on moves towards national reconciliation with the Sunni minority and was resisting tough action against the Shia militias.

Announcement Draws Skeptical Reaction In U.S. (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Judging from the initial reactions, Tuesday's announcement by the top U.S. commander and top U.S. diplomat in Iraq of benchmarks for progress and a loose timetable for drawing down American troops appears unlikely to influence the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

Republicans generally ignored the latest midcourse correction in Iraq, and Democrats denounced it as more of the same. Even the White House seemed to downplay the significance of the news conference by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey.

Casey said he expected Iraqi security forces to take the lead role from American troops over the next 12 to 18 months. Khalilzad said he expected significant progress in the coming year on milestones related to security, economic development and political reconciliation. Both men wrapped their comments in qualifiers and avoided firm predictions, but their tone was unmistakably optimistic.

With congressional elections two weeks away, President Bush is under pressure to ease voters' concerns about the war. A new McClatchy-MSNBC poll of eight Senate battleground states found that Iraq remains by far the dominant issue, despite weeks of news coverage about the page scandal in the House of Representatives, North Korea's nuclear test and record highs in the stock market.

That's bad news for Republicans, because voters who said Iraq was their top concern support Democrats by ratios of 2-to-1 or more. Democrats need to pick up six Senate seats to take control of the chamber, and 15 seats in the House.

"We've been hearing White House promises to turn things over to the Iraqi forces for years - in 2006, in 2005, in 2004, in 2003 - but nothing ever seems to change," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said of Tuesday's announcement in Baghdad. "I don't think the American people are going to take it very seriously."

Others accused the administration of trying to manipulate public opinion for the election.

"Two weeks before the election they're confusing the public by making these conflicting statements. The only thing that's going to change the public's perception of Iraq is a redeployment of our troops and forcing the Iraqis to work this out themselves," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa.

Pollsters said voters were much more likely to be influenced by events in Iraq than by policy pronouncements from either political party.

DOJ_NMG_0086064

"Whatever it is the president says has to be backed up by reality on the ground showing things getting better," pollster John Zogby said.

Bush and his allies made no effort to draw attention to the remarks in Baghdad. The president focused on the economy while campaigning for Republican candidates in Florida. Vice President Dick Cheney didn't mention the benchmarks or the timetable in a friendly interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity.

Administration officials are all too aware that timetables and predictions can come back to haunt the person who makes them. On May 31, 2005, Cheney said the Iraq insurgency was in its last throes.

"I think that was premature," he acknowledged last week in an interview with Time magazine.

Another Bin Laden Victory (WT)

By Michael F. Scheuer

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

In a world where leading Western experts have consigned Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda to near-irrelevant status, the gangly Saudi is on the verge of seeing the forces he leads and inspires knock off their third infidel government. Not bad for a guy running from rock to rock and cave to cave.

First was the defeat of Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar's conservative government after the Islamists' 2003 attack on Madrid's train station. Spanish voters ousted that rarity, a European leader who recognized bin Laden led much more than a criminal gang, and that Islamists would have to be confronted and smashed with a heavy, prolonged application of Western military power. Sadly, Mr. Aznar allowed himself to believe Washington's delusion that war in Iraq would be an effective, tide-turning extension of the battle against Islamist militancy. He paid the ultimate electoral price for indulging that lethal pipe dream, and the West lost a man who had accurately gauged the severity of the Islamist threat.

Next down the drain was the government of Thailand via last month's military coup. After the coup, rumors of deposed Premier Thaksin Shinawatra's corrupt activities spread, but at base the Thai generals seized power because of the increasing intensity of the Islamist separatist revolt in Thailand's three Muslim-dominated southern provinces. Nearly 2,000 people have died there since 2003, the central government is losing its grip in the region, and Mr. Thaksin's military response to the unrest was making little progress.

The Thai generals named a Thai Muslim as the new premier, and he has said it is time to slow military operations and talk about autonomy for the Muslim south. As always, what seems reasonable to the West and the westernized Thai will be seen by Thai Islamists and their backers as a long step toward victory that requires more military aggressiveness.

Bin Laden, his lieutenants and their allies are no doubt pleased by the destruction of the Spanish and Thai governments and the exhilarating message it sends to the worldwide Islamist movement: The infidels are weak, politically divided, terrified of using full military power and think we can be appeased. In short, war works; keep at it.

Even so, bin Laden, et. al, know the biggest prize looms just ahead — the chance that the Republican Party will be ousted from one or both houses of Congress. There are many factors contributing to this possibility: the Foley abomination, other corruption cases, the trumped?up "crisis" over First Amendment rights and the administration's ill-informed and ham-fisted handling of the Iraq and Afghan wars. If the Republicans are ousted, pundits on both sides of the aisle will find the causes strictly in America's navel.

But what will bin Laden and his Islamist allies think? Well, if Republican defeat comes to pass, they will first thank the Almighty — "Allahu Akhbar!" or "God is the greatest!" — for tangible proof of approaching victory. In Spain, Thailand, and Britain — where Prime Minister Tony Blair suffered the fate of Messrs. Aznar and Thaksin for the same reason, but is leaving gracefully — al Qaeda and its allies see politicians winning power who argue: "The military option has been tried and it has failed. We must seek other-than-martial means to defuse the Islamists' appeal and power." As in Europe and Thailand, this has been the refrain of Sens. Nancy Pelosi, Harry Reid, Charles Schumer, Hillary Clinton, Rep. Jane Harman, and a swath of Republicans who value their seats more than U.S. security.

If Americans vote for what sounds like sweet reason from the Democrats, bin Laden and company will rejoice. What they will hear is the death knell for any prospect of effective U.S. military resistance to militant Islam. With the Republicans out, the Islamists will be confident that Democrats will deliver the best of both worlds: less emphasis on military force and a rigid maintenance of U.S. foreign policies that are hated with passion and near-unanimity by 1.3 billion Muslims. If Osama approved of music, he would be whistling "Happy Days Are Here Again!"

What the enemy thinks is not the sole reason on which to base a vote. I will vote for Republicans, as I always do, because some know unborn babies are human beings who should not be murdered with the Democrats' joyful zeal. Enemy perceptions are worth remembering, however, because if Americans elect Democrats believing them likely to defeat al Qaedaism, history suggests they will be wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0086065

The combination of Democratic rhetoric and the indelible fact of the Clinton administration's relentless refusal to try to kill bin Laden — preferring to protect its Arab, arms-buying buddies at the cost of American corpses — ensures that voters will receive what Clinton-era Democrats are best at giving: barely disguised pacifism that has and will continue to allow al-Qaeda and its allies to steadily destroy U.S. security.

Michael F. Scheuer, a 22-year veteran with the CIA, created and served as the chief of the agency's Osama bin Laden unit at the Counterterrorist Center.

Calling Again For Troop Withdrawal (WP)

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

During the years that he led opposition to the Vietnam War, former senator George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) says, he consoled his family with the proposition that the United States would never again commit such a "tragic mistake," as he put it. But McGovern said in an interview last week that America is headed down "the same road" in Iraq.

McGovern, the 1972 Democratic nominee for president, is out with a new book prescribing what the country ought to do to turn things around. The title neatly summarizes his advice: "Out of Iraq: A Practical Plan for Withdrawal Now."

Co-written with William R. Polk, a former professor and State Department Middle East expert, the 142-page volume calls for a phased withdrawal of 140,000 U.S. troops beginning by year's end and finishing by June 30. The authors say the Iraqi government should request the presence of an international force, including Arab and Muslim troops, to help keep order after the departure of the Americans.

McGovern and Polk call for an aggressive program of U.S. reconstruction aid to rebuild the Iraqi infrastructure destroyed in the war. Among other steps, the two say the United States should "express its condolences" to the Iraqi people for the large number of Iraqis killed, incapacitated, incarcerated or tortured. "A simple gesture of conciliation would go far to shift our relationship from occupation to friendship," they write.

In a telephone interview from his Mitchell, S.D., home, McGovern cast doubt on the assertion by President Bush that withdrawal would embolden U.S. enemies and create a haven for terrorists in the heart of the Middle East. It is the American presence in Iraq, he and Polk believe, that is fueling much of the violence. Their proposal is based on the conviction that the United States will eventually be forced out. Better to leave "in an orderly way" and "in a manner that will prevent further damage to American interests," they write.

At 84, McGovern remains active in civic affairs, speaking on college campuses and addressing the cause that remains his life's passion: world hunger and malnutrition. Along with former senator Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.), McGovern has been promoting an effort to create school lunch programs in developing countries.

Last week, McGovern spent about 50 minutes talking about his ideas for Iraq. Here are excerpts from the telephone interview:

-- Michael Abramowitz

QTell me a little about how this book came about.

AI found that lots of thoughtful people had come to the conclusion that the war was a mistake, but they would say now that we are there, we can't pull out. It's the same argument I combated for 15 years during the Vietnam War. . . . We concluded that instead of reducing terrorism, the [Iraq] war was aggravating it -- that we were in a more dangerous position with regard to Iraq and other countries as a consequence of the invasion.

You interviewed military folk?

Yes, [Polk] did. These are people who are on the job, so they are not eager to have their names attached to a withdrawal plan right now. What he found is that top people in the military don't think this war can be won. . . . How do you end this? You begin to plan a systematic withdrawal. We're not talking about a stampede for the border -- none of this silly business of cut and run.

Reports from Iraq are that the nature of the violence has changed, from a Sunni insurgency to more sectarian violence. Do you think that the book is a little out of date in the sense that any U.S. withdrawal would not affect this kind of violence?

It's possible. We say in the book that we are not promising stability, but . . . we think you are never going to have stability in Iraq as long as a foreign army is in that country.

What are the kinds of similarities that you see between Vietnam and the situation in Iraq?

I think one obvious similarity is that neither Vietnam nor Iraq constituted a threat to America's security in the world. . . . Secondly, we didn't know much about either one. We didn't even have people ready to go into Iraq that spoke Arabic. . . .

All those years we were in the jungle of Vietnam, losing 58,000 young Americans and probably being responsible for a couple of million Vietnamese deaths, my four daughters and my son used to get discouraged about ever ending that war. They would say, "What good does that do? You keep sounding off. You run for president, you got smashed in the election, what good does it do?"

DOJ_NMG_0086066

I would say: "Look, I am an old history teacher. . . . Even bad things in history usually have some good factor. And in Vietnam, the good thing about it is that it is such a tragic mistake we will never again do that again." . . . But I didn't count on terrorism. . . . I really think we are following the same road in Iraq. This time the fear is not communism -- it is terrorism.

Why do you not see the threat the same way [as Bush]?

I see terrorism as a threat to the United States, but I think it's growing worse in the way we are trying to handle it. That's a problem that is not essentially a military problem. . . . I do fear the terrorists. I feel more threatened by six years of the Bush-Cheney-Rumsfeld plan for fighting it than I did before.

Would you have been okay with an effort to just get rid of Saddam Hussein and leave?

I think it's good that he is gone. Now, having said that, I also wonder if, on balance, we improved our own security. We got rid of an SOB -- we all know that. . . . But what has happened as a consequence of that, Iraq is now in a civil war. People say if we pull out, we'll have a civil war. Well, they have got one going now. Saddam Hussein, for all of his viciousness, would not have permitted that to happen.

Is it your point that we should never try to overthrow a bad guy?

I don't like what is happening in the Sudan now. I don't like what happened in Rwanda. . . . It is a very tough, agonizing issue. But frustrating as it is, I still think we're better off trying to work through the United Nations. It's a frustrating organization. It's bureaucratic. But I still think that's the forum where we ought to press these issues.

What would be your advice to the Democratic Party?

They have got to be more assertive. They can't lay down and go along with policies that many of them know are mistaken. . . . I am disappointed in my old colleagues in the Senate, not all of them. . . . But by and large, the Democrats seem to have been intimidated into silence or kind of a mushy policy on foreign questions.

Is there any figure out there you see as someone who is promising for the Democrats in '08?

I haven't settled on anyone yet. . . . I don't think we have really brought our alternative positions into clear focus yet for the American public.

Running Against Themselves (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Things have become so dire for the Republicans that now even Bush is distancing himself from Bush.

The president is cutting and running from the president.

In a momentous event at the White House on Monday, Tony Snow made a major announcement about an important new strategy for Iraq. The president will no longer stay the course on the rallying cry “stay the course.”

A presidency built on message discipline (Message: “Stay the course”) is trying to salvage itself with some last-minute un-messaging (Message: “No more stay the course”).

Of course, the administration has never really said what “the course” is, so it was never really apparent what “staying” it meant, anyhow.

It was a wacky moment for Tony Snow, who renounced the slogan while sticking to the policy. “It left the wrong impression about what was going on,” the press secretary said, “and it allowed critics to say, ‘Well, here’s an administration that’s just embarked upon a policy and not looking at what the situation is,’ when, in fact, it’s just the opposite.”

The important thing was that the cliché sounded good to Republicans, strong and virile, for a while. But pollsters for the White House seemed to be the last to learn that even many of the party faithful had soured on the phrase, deeming it inflexible and stupid. Has Karl Rove, who urged G.O.P. candidates to keep the Democrats on the defensive on national security, lost his magic?

In a White House with a Fox News all-spin sensibility, officials don’t think they need to change the strategy as much as they need to change their slogan.

The overworked Bush phrase suggested “burying your head in the sand,” Steve Hinkson, political director at Luntz Research Companies, a G.O.P. public opinion firm, told The Washington Post’s Peter Baker. “The problem is that as the number of people who agree with remaining resolute dwindles, that sort of language doesn’t strike a chord as much as it once did.”

Unwilling to admit mistakes or face the urgent need to go past semantic changes in a protectorate that has fallen into a vicious civil war, in which Americans are merely referees and targets, the White House is falling back on marketing. Just as Andy Card rolled out the war as a marketing event, the Bush team now thinks that all it needs to do is come up with a catchy and chesty new advertising pitch.

DOJ_NMG_0086067

Bay Buchanan assured Wolf Blitzer that the president still intended to stay the course and seek victory, he just wouldn't use that phrase, because it gave people the impression that W. was unwilling to change tactics.

After all, Dick Cheney told Rush Limbaugh last week that the inept Iraqi government was doing "remarkably well."

But given the Republican meltdown, it's obvious that Democrats are having better luck mocking the Republicans for staying the course than Republicans are having mocking the Democrats for cutting and running. But Democrats have no ingenious ideas about how to extricate ourselves from this nasty war either.

Yet W. once more accused the Democrats of wanting to cut and run in Iraq at a campaign stop in Sarasota, Fla., yesterday.

Many frantic Republican lawmakers are also running against themselves, either reneging on their support for the war they started, or railing against Washington, the town they absolutely control, claiming that the capital has forgotten their values, or making ads denouncing the Democrats' "homosexual agenda," even though Republicans are now the party of gay scandal.

It's a hilarious spectacle of a whole party re-enacting the classic scene in Mel Brooks's "Blazing Saddles," in which the sheriff holds the gun to his own head to take himself hostage.

The Bushes don't connect words with action. Action is something that's secretly plotted with the inner circle behind closed doors. The public should stay out of it. The Bushes just connect words with salesmanship. Poppy Bush never meant it when he said "Read my lips: no new taxes" at the 1988 convention. It was just a Clint Eastwood-sounding line in a Peggy Noonan speech, meant to pump up his flighty image.

Just so, his son never paid any mind to his campaign promise not to nation-build, and he didn't come through on his bullhorn pledge to catch the perpetrators of 9/11 or his tough-guy vow to bring in Osama dead or alive.

To W., the words he says to Americans don't matter as much as the words Dick Cheney says to him. He just has to hope that daddy's friend, James Baker, the smooth fixer who is co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group and who has already suggested moving past the meaningless partisan jargon of "cut and run" and "stay the course," comes up with a plan to rescue Junior from a fine mess one more time.

The Hard Way Out (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Some months ago, former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski was explaining to a senior Bush administration official his plan for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq over 12 months, in consultation with the Iraqis. "We're going to do the same thing," the senior official confided, "but we're going to call it victory."

This week it became official: The Bush administration's Iraq policy is no longer "stay the course" but, in the phrase of White House spokesman Tony Snow, "a study in constant motion." The reality, as near as I can tell, is that the administration isn't sure yet where to move after the November elections. Nor are most of the administration's critics. Major newspapers carried editorials or op-eds this week advocating some version of "change the course," but they were vaporous when it came to details.

So what are the right guideposts for a gradual American withdrawal from Iraq? How can the United States, in its search for an exit, avoid compounding the mistakes it made in invading Iraq? To help light the way, we are blessed with a deus ex machina in the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and ex-congressman Lee Hamilton.

A starting point is to understand what the United States is actually doing in Iraq now. A strategy of phased withdrawal is already underway -- on paper. The latest affirmation was yesterday's proposal by Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey of a security timetable to transfer control to the Iraqis in 12 to 18 months. The plan envisions a "national compact" among Iraq's different factions. By the end of this year, they would agree on terms for demobilizing militias, sharing oil revenue and easing de-Baathification rules. It all looks sensible -- on paper.

The problem is that this approach hasn't been working. Since January Khalilzad has been prodding Iraqi leaders in the Green Zone to make precisely these compromises. But out in the real world, the hopes for reconciliation have fallen apart, for a simple but terrifying reason: Iraq's Sunnis and Shiites are so enraged that they have stopped believing compromise is possible.

How will withdrawal plans deal with the reality of this sectarian hatred? The administration's answer has been to try to build up the Iraqi military so it can impose a monopoly of force. But that hasn't been working, either. The Iraqi troops simply can't match the brutality of the insurgents and death squads. The U.S. military can do the job, but the cost in American lives is becoming unacceptable. If we are serious about a withdrawal timetable, we will have to accept Iraqi solutions, ragged and violent though they may be.

In the weeks after the election, the debate in Washington will focus on two promising exit ramps. But it's important not to attach unrealistic hopes to either one.

DOJ_NMG_0086068

The first path is a more federal Iraq -- with power devolved to the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. But this presupposes a national government strong enough to formulate rules for, say, the sharing of oil revenue. If such a national framework existed, Iraq wouldn't be such a mess in the first place. Another tricky problem is stabilizing the Sunni areas that would be a potential safe haven for terrorists. If the Iraqi army can't control these areas, the only alternative may be, in effect, a Sunni militia drawn from the ranks of the insurgency. U.S. officials have been meeting secretly outside Iraq with insurgent leaders in an effort to draw them into such a framework.

The second exit ramp passes through Iran and Syria. Talking with Tehran and Damascus could be helpful in stabilizing Iraq, but we should recognize at the outset that their influence is limited -- and that it may carry an unacceptable price. Iran's goal in Iraq is a decisive Shiite victory and Sunni submission, but that's a formula for continuing civil war -- and in any event, it's not an agenda the United States should endorse. Syria could be helpful in curbing al-Qaeda in Iraq, but there are limits and drawbacks to Syrian power -- as was clear during its long and brutal occupation of Lebanon.

The real opportunity presented by the Baker-Hamilton process is that it's bipartisan. To get most American troops out of Iraq over the next year will require more patience at home, and a lot less partisan bickering. And our politicians will need strong stomachs: They must manage an orderly retreat under fire. There is a path out of this mess, but we will be lying if we call it victory.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues.

'All Over The Place' (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

The president has fled the field from "stay the course," signaling not just the unwinnability of his war but the bankruptcy of his political strategy. For as the president and his party grope for an alternative plan of action in Iraq, Karl Rove's bright line between Republican resolve and Democratic defeatism has become irreversibly fuzzed.

"Stay the course," after all, was never intended to have a free-standing existence. Republicans invoked it only in dialectical contrast to "cut and run," their caricature of the Democrats' preference for a phased withdrawal from Iraq, or for partitioning it into three separate quasi-nations, or for redeploying our troops to neighboring states -- or, more simply, of the Democrats' mounting conviction that our presence in Iraq was growing more pointless each day.

In a strenuous attempt to make lemonade from lemons, George Bush attacked the Democrats for failing to articulate a clear, compelling alternative to his war, though his war created so cosmic a debacle that there were no compelling alternatives. Appearing last week with Don Sherwood, one of many embattled Republican congressmen in Pennsylvania, Bush accused the Democrats of being "all over the place" on Iraq.

Over the past several months, though, more and more Republican candidates have taken to voicing the same doubts and suggesting the same alternatives as those Democrat Defeatocrats. Wobbly Joe Biden has been joined by staunch Kay Bailey Hutchison -- Republican of Texas, Bush's own senator -- in calling for a tripartite partition. "People say, 'Well, that would balkanize the country,' " she told the editorial board of the Dallas Morning News. "Well, things are pretty stable in the Balkans right now."

Or consider George Allen, Virginia's own Mr. Malaprop, who as recently as last month was preaching the gospel of Stay the Course and disparaging those who would "second-guess" his votes for the war. In just the past couple of weeks, Allen has allowed as how "mistakes have been made, and progress has been far too slow."

Earlier this month Bush stood alongside Allen at a Richmond fundraiser and complained that the Democrats "would have our country quit in Iraq before the job is done. That's why they are the party of cut and run. We will fight. We will stay. We will win in Iraq." But after Bush left, Allen told reporters he didn't embrace all the president had said: "The president has his ideas on Iraq. John Warner has his, and I have mine."

As Iraq descends into a Hobbesian bloodbath, it's every man for himself within the Grand Old Party. In Connecticut, Rep. Chris Shays, after his 14th visit to Iraq, announced he was "losing faith in how we are fighting this war." In New Jersey, senatorial candidate Tom Kean Jr. called for Don Rumsfeld's resignation. Most wondrous of all, in suburban Philadelphia, Rep. Curt Weldon, vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, suggested that the right to make decisions about the future deployment or redeployment of our troops in Iraq should be left to the generals there, rather than remain with Bush, Vice President Cheney and Rumsfeld -- in whose judgment, we must presume, Weldon has lost all confidence. Weldon is under investigation by the FBI over some alleged financial dealings that he and his family have had with Russian businesses. While they're at it, the agents might inquire if Weldon has ever read the Constitution, which designates the president as commander of our armed services.

DOJ_NMG_0086069

If a Democrat offered Weldon's remedy for Iraq, the Republicans would flay him alive. When Weldon went woozy, however, they reacted by continuing to funnel money into his coffers. "Stay the course" has been replaced by "anything goes" -- so long as it helps the Republicans cling to power.

Idle Contractors Add Millions To Iraq Rebuilding (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Overhead costs have consumed more than half the budget of some reconstruction projects in Iraq, according to a government estimate released yesterday, leaving far less money than expected to provide the oil, water and electricity needed to improve the lives of Iraqis.

The report provided the first official estimate that, in some cases, more money was being spent on housing and feeding employees, completing paperwork and providing security than on actual construction.

Those overhead costs have ranged from under 20 percent to as much as 55 percent of the budgets, according to the report, by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. On similar projects in the United States, those costs generally run to a few percent.

The highest proportion of overhead was incurred in oil-facility contracts won by KBR Inc., the Halliburton subsidiary formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root, which has frequently been challenged by critics in Congress and elsewhere.

The actual costs for many projects could be even higher than the estimates, the report said, because the United States has not properly tracked how much such expenses have taken from the $18.4 billion of taxpayer-financed reconstruction approved by Congress two years ago.

The report said the prime reason was not the need to provide security, though those costs have clearly risen in the perilous environment, and are a burden that both contractors and American officials routinely blame for such increases.

Instead, the inspector general pointed to a simple bureaucratic flaw: the United States ordered the contractors and their equipment to Iraq and then let them sit idle for months at a time.

The delay between “mobilization,” or assembling the teams in Iraq, and the start of actual construction was as long as nine months.

“The government blew the whistle for these guys to go to Iraq and the meter ran,” said Jim Mitchell, a spokesman for the inspector general’s office. “The government was billed for sometimes nine months before work began.”

The findings are similar to those of a growing list of inspections, audits and investigations that have concluded that the program to rebuild Iraq has often fallen short for the most mundane of reasons: poorly written contracts, ineffective or nonexistent oversight, needless project delays and egregiously poor construction practices.

“This report is the latest chapter in a long, sad and expensive tale about how contracting in Iraq was more about shoveling money out the door than actually getting real results on the ground,” said Stephen Ellis, a vice president at Taxpayers for Common Sense in Washington.

“These contracts were to design and build important items for oil infrastructure, hospitals and education, but in some cases more than half of the money padded corporate coffers instead,” he said.

Although the federal report places much of the burden for the charges squarely on the shoulders of United States officials in Baghdad, the findings varied widely over a sampling of contracts examined by auditors, from a low of under 20 percent for some companies to a high of over 55 percent.

One oil contract awarded to a joint venture between Parsons, an American company, and Worley, from Australia, had overhead costs of at least 43 percent, the report found. One contract held by Parsons alone to build hospitals and prisons had overhead of at least 35 percent; in another, it was 17 percent.

The lowest figure was found for certain contracts won by Lucent, at 11 percent, but the report indicates that substantial portions of the overhead in those cases could not be determined.

The report did not explain why KBR’s overhead costs on those contracts — the contracts totaled about $296 million — were more than 10 percent higher than those at the other companies audited. Despite past criticism of KBR, the Army, which administers those contracts, has generally agreed to pay most of the costs claimed by the company.

Melissa Norcross, a spokeswoman for KBR, said in a written reply to questions, “It is important to note that the special inspector general is not challenging any of KBR’s costs referenced in this report.”

“All of these costs were incurred at the client’s direction and for the client’s benefit,” she said, referring to the Army Corps of Engineers, which is in charge of the oil contract.

DOJ_NMG_0086070

But a frequent Halliburton critic, Representative Henry A. Waxman, a California Democrat who is the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Government Reform, disputed those assurances. “It’s incomprehensible that over $160 million — more than half the value of the contract — was squandered on overhead,” Mr. Waxman said in a written statement.

The majority leader of the same committee, Thomas M. Davis III, a Virginia Republican, declined to comment.

A spokeswoman for Parsons, Erin Kuhlman, said the United States categorized overhead and construction costs differently from contract to contract in Iraq, making it difficult to make direct comparisons. “Parsons incurred, billed and reported actual costs as directed by the government,” she said.

In Iraq, where construction materials are scarce and contractors must provide security for work sites and housing for Western employees, officials have said they expect the overhead to be at least 10 percent, but the contractors and American officials have grudgingly conceded that the true costs have turned out to be higher.

But even the high of 55 percent could be an underestimate, Mr. Mitchell said, because the government often did not begin tracking overhead costs for months after the companies mobilized. He added that because of the haphazard way in which the government tracked the costs, it was not possible to say how well the figures reflected overhead charges in the entire program.

The report’s conclusions were drawn from $1.3 billion in contracts for which United States government overseers actually made an effort to track overhead costs, of the total of $18.4 billion set aside for reconstruction in specific supplemental funding bills for the 2006 fiscal year.

When all American and Iraqi contributions are added up, various estimates for the cost of the rebuilding program range from $30 billion to $45 billion. Language included in the Defense Authorization Act, signed by President Bush last week, states that the inspector general’s office will halt its examination of those expenditures by October of next year.

Maj. Gen. William H. McCoy, who until recently commanded the Persian Gulf region division of the Corps of Engineers, disputed some of the inspector general’s findings in a letter appended to the report. Things like “waiting for concrete to cure” could still be taking place during what seem to be periods of inactivity, General McCoy wrote, so a quiet period “does not mean that the project is not moving forward.”

But many of the delays came during 2004 and took place in response to political developments in Iraq, the inspector general’s report says. The American occupation government, the Coalition Provisional Authority, mobilized many of the companies early that year.

After the authority went out of existence in June 2004, handing sovereignty to the Iraqi government, top American officials then kept the companies idle for months as the officials rewrote the rebuilding plan, and ran up costs as little work was done.

Halliburton Cited For Iraq Overhead (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Administrative overhead accounted for more than half the costs that a Halliburton Co. subsidiary passed on to the government under a key contract to restore Iraq's oil industry, a figure that critics said was unusually high.

A report released yesterday by the inspector general's office overseeing Iraq spending found that at least 55 percent, or $163 million, of $296 million in total costs rung up by Halliburton unit KBR went to expenses such as back-office support, transportation and security. That percentage was significantly higher than it was on work by other firms in Iraq, and experts said it is far above what is typically found on a government contract.

The findings are the latest that call into question KBR's work under the deal, which required the company to rehabilitate oil facilities in southern Iraq. Under the contract's terms, KBR is reimbursed for its costs and then receives a percentage for profit on top, an arrangement that critics contend has given the firm an incentive to run up its bills.

According to internal government documents released in March, auditors found that the company had repeatedly overcharged the government by, among other things, billing for work it didn't actually do and paying suppliers more than they were owed. Meanwhile, work schedules slid and company officials balked at requests for accurate cost estimates. At one point, officials threatened to terminate the deal. Instead, KBR -- which has received more money from the Iraq war effort than any other firm -- was allowed to keep the contract and is now winding up work.

In a statement, Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross defended the company's administrative spending. "All of these costs were incurred at the client's direction and for the client's benefit, and they have been extensively audited and deemed allowable and legitimate," she said.

The Army Corps of Engineers -- which oversaw the contracts -- acknowledged that some of the administrative costs were high. But in a response to the inspector general's findings, the Corps argued that important work was getting done even when money was being spent on administrative matters rather than directly on Corps projects.

DOJ_NMG_0086071

In government contracting, administrative rates can vary widely depending on the kind of work being done and on the circumstances.

Work in Iraq, for instance, often involves high security costs that inflate overhead.

Yesterday's report by the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction does not directly say whether KBR's overhead costs were excessive. But it does offer a more comprehensive look than was previously available at where the money has gone on the firm's oil contract, as well as on deals involving other companies to construct hospitals and schools. In many cases, contractors have failed to meet expectations, leaving the job of rebuilding critical services in Iraq to the Iraqis.

The United States has devoted more than $20 billion to rehabilitate Iraq, but critics contend that much of the money has been wasted as contractors used the government's checkbook to spend lavishly on hotels, food and employee salaries. Halliburton has come under particularly intense scrutiny because of the volume of work it has done in Iraq and because Vice President Cheney was once the firm's chief executive.

"Halliburton was given a blank check by the Bush Administration and the Republican Congress did nothing to stop the hemorrhaging of taxpayer dollars," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), a frequent Halliburton critic, in a statement.

Yesterday's report cites one contract in Iraq that had administrative rates of between 2.3 percent and 17 percent. Of the five contracts that auditors reviewed in depth, rates ranged from a high of 55 percent for the KBR deal to a low of 11 percent. The report cautions, however, that all of the estimates may be too low because of the way they were tabulated.

KBR's "rates are high," said Scott Amey, general counsel of the watchdog group Project on Government Oversight. "They would send up a red flag for me." But Amey said it would take a more thorough review of exactly where the money went to know how much was wasted.

In addition to noting KBR's overhead costs generally, the report focuses on a nine-month stretch between February 2004 -- when KBR was directed by the government to gear up for work -- and November 2004, when substantial work actually began. During that period, KBR spent $53 million on overhead and $13 million on direct project costs.

Report authors said that was due to "poor planning" by the government, which had asked the company to mobilize before key decisions had been made about which projects would be funded.

Halliburton stock jumped $1.58 yesterday, to close at $30.84 after news that the company had beaten Wall Street's expectations for third-quarter revenue and profit.

Halliburton had previously announced that it garnered $611 million in profit last quarter, up from $499 million in the comparable quarter last year.

KBR took in $1.2 billion in revenue for the quarter from Iraq-related work, though the company said the profit margin on that work was just 3.7 percent before corporate expenses and taxes.

Halliburton, which does most of its work in energy services, filed documents yesterday with federal regulators to spin off a portion of KBR as a public company.

Halliburton officials have said in the past that the unit is a drag on the parent company's earnings and share price.

Halliburton Will Sell 17% Of Its KBR Unit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

HOUSTON -- Halliburton Co. will sell 17% of its Kellogg, Brown & Root engineering unit in an initial public offering of stock later this year, according to an updated Securities and Exchange Commission filing by the oil-field services company.

The unit, known as KBR, also reported in the IPO filing that an investigation by a magistrate or a public prosecutor in Algeria "may be pending" regarding sole-source contracts awarded to Brown & Root-Condor SpA, a joint venture with Condor Engineering SpA in which KBR had a 49% interest as of June 30. The company didn't offer further details on the matter.

Halliburton, which put its planned IPO of KBR on hold this summer during a tough period for new stocks, said earlier this week that it wants to go ahead with the deal by the end of 2006 now that market conditions have improved. After selling 27.8 million shares to the public, Halliburton will own the remaining 83% of KBR; it plans to spin that stake off to Halliburton shareholders in April.

Iran's Supreme Leader Seeks Calm In Iraq (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei on Tuesday called for an end to the bloody sectarian conflict tearing apart neighboring Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0086072

"The Iraqi people should do everything to avoid sectarian conflict," Khamenei told a crowd of thousands, including senior government officials, ringing in the first day of the Eid al-Fitr holiday at a mosque in Tehran. The celebration marks the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

Iraq's Shiite Muslim-led government has maintained close ties with Washington, as well as Shiite-dominated Iran since the fall of Saddam Hussein's overwhelmingly Sunni Arab regime.

But Iraq teeters on the brink of civil war with Sunni and Shiite factions launching daily attacks against each other and carrying out reprisal killings. The violence has displaced thousands of Iraqis, turning once-mixed neighborhoods into ethnic enclaves.

Many Iraqis believe Tehran has played a role in the unrest since Iran has ties to Iraq's largest Shiite political parties and their militias.

That view was echoed hours after Khamenei's speech when Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, lambasted Iran and Syria for trying to undermine the American effort to stabilize Iraq. Casey said both countries had been "decidedly unhelpful."

In his address, Khamenei warned other Middle Eastern countries against cooperating with American initiatives that may be designed to divide the Middle East for Israel's benefit.

"Our nation should be aware. The Lebanese nation should be aware. The Palestinian nation should be aware. Arab nations in the region, Iraq and other Muslim nations should be careful not to play along with these U.S. plots," the supreme leader said, adding that the biggest priority for the U.S. in the Middle East was protecting Israel's interests.

"What is considered success for the U.S. is harming all Islamic nations," Khamenei said.

No Word On Soldier Missing In Baghdad (AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

AP, October 25, 2006

The U.S. military carried out house-to-house searches in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood for an Army translator missing after reportedly being kidnapped, but said Tuesday they had found no sign of him.

The military said the U.S. soldier, who was not identified by name, was last seen Monday in the heavily guarded Green Zone in central Baghdad, after which he was believed to have left to visit relatives elsewhere in the capital.

U.S. and Iraqi forces threw a security cordon around the central Karradah district Monday night and Iraqis seeking to pass through the downtown area Tuesday were turned away at roadblocks. Army Kiowa OH-58 reconnaissance helicopters circled the area in pairs.

American soldiers patrolling Karradah showed photocopies of the missing man's photograph to residents in a search for leads as they checked houses and buildings across the area, which lies in a bend in the Tigris river.

The military said the soldier was a linguist with the Provincial Reconstruction Team in Baghdad. American troops who raided Baghdad's al-Furat TV on Monday said they were looking for an abducted American officer of Iraqi descent who went to join relatives in Karradah.

"We will leverage all available coalition resources to find this soldier," Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman said in a statement. "Our thoughts and prayers go out to his loved ones, and we are working for his safe return."

The soldier was reportedly at a relative's house when he was grabbed by masked men who handcuffed him and forced him into a vehicle. One of the men then called a relative with the soldier's cell phone, the military said. It did not say whether a ransom demand was made.

The last time U.S. soldiers were reported missing in Iraq was in June, when two Americans were captured in an attack on their checkpoint south of Baghdad. The soldiers were later found dead, their bodies brutalized, the military said. Al-Qaida in Iraq claimed responsibility.

Few American soldiers have been abducted in Iraq, due largely to strict military procedures for those on patrol or at checkpoints.

The U.S. military has rules for soldiers operating outside their bases that are designed to ensure they are under supervision and also to protect them. Soldiers leaving base are supposed to be accompanied by a noncommissioned officer and travel in at least two vehicles.

Military Mounts Search For Missing U.S. Soldier (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086073

BAGHDAD, Oct. 24 -- U.S. forces scoured central Baghdad on Tuesday looking for a missing U.S. soldier who was presumed kidnapped by insurgents while visiting his Iraqi relatives. The troops went door-to-door, manned checkpoints, stopped and searched cars and showed pedestrians a picture of their missing comrade, hoping to generate leads on his whereabouts.

The U.S. military said in a statement that the soldier, who was not identified, was an Iraqi American who was assigned to a provisional reconstruction team as a translator.

The soldier apparently has family in Baghdad and left the Green Zone -- the heavily fortified area in the city that is headquarters for the U.S. military, several embassies and the Iraqi government -- to visit relatives Monday to celebrate Eid al-Fitr, one of the biggest holidays of the Muslim year.

While he was at a relative's house, the statement said, three cars pulled up and men with rags over their faces "handcuffed the soldier and forced him into one of the vehicles."

A relative "who claimed to be at the residence when the abduction occurred was reportedly contacted by the kidnappers using the soldier's cell phone," the statement said. It did not say whether a ransom had been demanded or other demands had been made.

"We will leverage all available coalition resources to find this soldier," said Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, commander of coalition forces in the capital. "Our thoughts and prayers go out to his loved ones."

"The search is ongoing," said Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a spokesman for the U.S. military command in the city. "We are committing all available coalition resources to find him."

The military said it searched the offices of al-Furat TV in Baghdad on Monday night. The station is owned by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the country's top Shiite political party and the dominant party in the government.

An employee at the station told the Associated Press afterward that the soldier's wife, also an Iraqi American, reportedly was in the capital visiting family.

A U.S. military spokesman said the soldier was not authorized to be outside the Green Zone for the visit. His duty status has been listed by the military as "whereabouts unknown," the statement said.

The last time a U.S. soldier was abducted was in June, when two soldiers were seized during an insurgent ambush of a U.S. checkpoint south of Baghdad. The mutilated bodies of the two were found three days later. Al-Qaeda in Iraq asserted responsibility for the attack, in which a third U.S. soldier also was killed.

In an unrelated matter, U.S. forces in Fallujah shot and killed four Iraqi firefighters Tuesday, mistakenly believing that they were insurgents who had commandeered a firetruck, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The statement said that after reports had aired that insurgents had hijacked a truck and crew, soldiers spotted a firetruck responding to a call and pulled it over for an inspection. As the firefighters were quickly exiting their truck, "coalition forces thought they were armed" and opened fire, killing them all, the statement said.

A few minutes later, the statement said, the hijacked firetruck was spotted and pulled over, and the occupants fled.

At least five people were killed and more than 30 were wounded in violence in Baghdad on Tuesday.

Troops Fortify Hold On Plant That Once Housed Insurgents (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

YUSUFIYAH, Iraq, Oct. 24 -- When U.S. troops effortlessly occupied an enormous power plant that had been used by insurgents, they found blankets littering the steel risers, one room with the air conditioning running and a pot of tea ready to pour, and machine-gun cartridge cases strewn about. They saw cages -- one containing a pair of shoes and what appeared to be human feces -- on the bottom floor, what U.S. commanders said they believe is an indication that prisoners had been held there and possibly tortured.

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers on Tuesday began fortifying their position inside the plant in this Euphrates River town as part of a concerted effort to deny insurgents a safe haven scarcely 10 miles from Baghdad's southern edge.

The power plant is a half-finished relic. Though it never came close to being operational, it was a major target for the 2nd Brigade Combat Team, 10th Mountain Division, because of its long-standing use as a transient base for insurgent fighters. Its smokestack juts high above the horizon, and its beautiful vistas of the lush Euphrates River valley belie the sometimes chaotic battlefield below.

The move to take the plant comes amid an aggressive operation to push the insurgents out of a haven that has existed for years. U.S. officials said that the area's string of small rural Sunni towns has played host to leaders such as the late Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and that teams of insurgents continue to intimidate the local populace while launching complex and coordinated attacks on U.S. patrol bases.

DOJ_NMG_0086074

Soldiers at the bases, which in the past three weeks have been plunked down right on the edge of the most hostile areas, are now charged with rooting out the insurgents and winning over the local people, a task they acknowledge is not going to be easy.

"We're fighting somebody very smart, a group of people who have been fighting all their lives," said 1st Sgt. David Schumacher, 37, of Watertown, N.Y., who helped lead A Company of the 2nd Battalion, 14th Infantry Regiment, into the power plant this week. "Even with everything we have, we find them and destroy them but we can't find everyone."

The insurgents have found ways to blend in easily with the surrounding communities, in part because the Sunni villagers say they are distrustful of the fledgling Iraqi army units in the area and fear the insurgents and their threats. On Thursday, a group of 20 black-clad insurgents made a run on U.S. positions near the power plant, using machine guns and mortars to attack in a very organized fashion, said Capt. Brendan Hobbs, 30, of Tampa.

On Sunday, a similar group used heavy machine guns, rockets, rocket-propelled grenades and mortars to attack a U.S. base in Rushdi Mullah, a small farming village that represents the front line for U.S. troops. One U.S. soldier was killed in that attack.

But Capt. Chris Vitale, 29, of Washington, Pa., said his B Company, 4th Battalion, 31st Infantry Regiment, is working to connect with residents who live yards away to convince them that the insurgents are their enemy, too. Vitale said that last week the residents came to his unit when a little girl accidentally drank diesel fuel and needed immediate medical attention. After soldiers helped save her, people in the streets openly thanked them.

"They're not afraid to come and talk to us now, and they say they just want to live their lives," Vitale said, adding that men in the neighborhood have recently waved the soldiers down to point out suspicious activity. "Insurgents are coming in and smacking the locals around, going on their roofs, and they don't like it. I think it's a matter of days before we start getting really good intelligence from them."

Attacks, including several powerful roadside bombs and attempted car bombings, have increased in recent days because U.S. troops have been pushing forward and trying to squeeze out the insurgents, said Col. Michael Kershaw, the 2-10 Mountain's commander.

"We've got them up against the river now, and they don't have many options," Kershaw said. He surveyed the region Tuesday from atop the power plant and visited his forward patrol bases. Special Operations Forces also were in the area Tuesday going after insurgents, using helicopters to attack a home in the late afternoon, sending up plumes of smoke visible miles away.

In the most contested region under the 2-10's responsibility, the Iraqi army battalion is still performing at a low level and is probably many months from being able to operate on its own, according to U.S. soldiers. While the Iraqi soldiers said in a brief interview Tuesday at the power plant that they are committed to the fight, the difficulty comes in winning over the local populace.

Juad Kazim, a resident in Mulla Fayyad, a tiny Sunni town a few miles from the power plant, said residents fear leaving their town because of Shiite militias. People are afraid to send their children to school because they have been told the schoolhouses will be targeted, and they fear the Iraqi army, unless they are escorted by U.S. troops, because the units are mostly Shiite.

"All we want is security and safety, that's it," Kazim said through an interpreter.

Military Trains Personnel In Advisory Roles (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

tt riley, kan. — Within the Army's tightly knit community of counterinsurgency experts, Lt. Col. John Nagl is something of a star.

When the Army and Marine Corps decided to rewrite their field manual on how to fight insurgents last year, Nagl was chosen as one of its authors. His doctoral thesis on guerrilla wars was just republished in paperback with an approving forward by the Army's chief of staff.

But when Nagl's two-year stint in the Pentagon ended this month, he did not, like most accomplished soldiers of his rank, take command of an armored battalion headed back to Iraq. Instead, he shipped out to this sprawling base in rural Kansas where the Army is attempting what some consider its most ambitious structural change since the Vietnam War.

Here, amid rolling fields dotted by scores of quickly built barracks, the Army is building a training base that by early next year will be turning as many as 2,000 of its most promising midlevel officers into military advisors every two months, most of them headed to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0086075

The mission reflects the U.S. military's vision of its long-range role in Iraq -- as advisors for local forces who will be doing the actual fighting. But it represents something of a gamble as well: The effort is sucking thousands out of their normal combat deployments at a time when American forces are facing personnel shortages and violence in Iraq is surging.

It is also a signal that, as commanders in Iraq move to re-evaluate tactics in the wake of a faltering Baghdad offensive and rising U.S. casualties, the work of military advisors is likely to emerge as a pillar of any plan to withdraw American troops. In Baghdad on Tuesday, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, said it may take more U.S. troops to quell violence in Baghdad.

Already, there are 3,600 military advisors in Iraq, training, organizing and accompanying Iraqi units into action. But as the effort at Fort Riley ramps up, Army officials acknowledge that number could grow by thousands -- and perhaps tens of thousands, once Afghanistan is added to the program -- in the coming months.

"This is much bigger than ... sending Special Forces teams down to El Salvador or Colombia to work in small groups," said Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, referring to past U.S. advisory efforts.

The size and the scope of the new effort, which began in June with the arrival at Fort Riley of the first class of prospective advisers, is a sign of how seriously the Army is now taking the mission.

"I feel like we'll be the last men standing at the end of the U.S. presence here," said Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, the Army officer sent to Baghdad in July to take over the adviser program.

The Army has begun pouring resources into the effort. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, has assigned an entire division headquarters -- the 1st Infantry, one of only 10 divisions in the Army -- to take over the training mission, and has ordered two of its combat brigades to rid themselves of all their tanks and infantrymen to devote their officers exclusively to training advisers.

"The fact he took one of his divisions, at a time he needs divisions, and two heavy brigades, at a time he needs heavy brigades, that by itself speaks volumes of how important this is," said Maj. Gen. Carter F. Ham, the 1st Infantry's new commander.

The Army in April added a series of incentives to convince its best officers to volunteer for the program. The most attractive is a guarantee that volunteers will get an assignment of their choice after a year as an adviser.

The effects of the advisor program are already visible. Kalev Sepp, an instructor at the Naval Postgraduate School, said he was taken aback when, before a recent lecture to Iraq combat veterans going through a course for captains at Fort Knox, he was repeatedly told by officers that they were headed to Fort Riley.

"I finally just said, 'How many people here are going back to Iraq as advisors?' and half the people in the room raised their hand," said Sepp, himself a military adviser in El Salvador as a Special Forces major 17 years ago. "That's extraordinary."

But until the start of the year, the Army's attention to its military advisor program was haphazard at best.

The concept itself started on an ad-hoc basis. Early in the Iraq war, some commanders adapted quickly to fighting a counterinsurgency and set up embedded military adviser teams on the fly.

Most prominently, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli -- now the commander of all ground forces in Iraq, but also the commander of the 1st Cavalry Division in Baghdad's Sadr City slums in early 2004 -- took hundreds of his soldiers from their assigned units to create 70 small teams who "lived, ate, and trained with the Iraqi Army," Chiarelli wrote in a summary of his deployment. Maj. Gen. John Batiste, who commanded the 1st Infantry Division the same year, took similar steps in the Sunni Triangle north of Baghdad.

But Chiarelli and Batiste were exceptions to the rule. Most commanders, when ordered to provide soldiers for military training teams -- dubbed MiTT teams in military jargon -- would turn over men who were not needed for essential operations.

"Some took it very seriously and picked very good people," said Pittard. "Some said, 'Well, who can we spare?' "

The result was predictable. When Sepp, who has traveled to Iraq as a counterinsurgency adviser to U.S. commanders, met military trainers in Taji as recently as December, he was "unimpressed with the quality of people."

"The lieutenant colonel that I met there, the first thing on his mind was how much longer he had before he left," remembered Sepp. "He had it down to hours. He was completely uninterested in what they were doing."

Adviser teams were thrown together and, in many cases, did not meet each other until arriving in Iraq -- a drastic change for combat units who normally spend a year together before deployment.

While the huge shift under way at Fort Riley will address many problems, it also raises some new ones.

The Army already is scrounging for soldiers to send to Iraq in combat brigades. Two senior military planners said in interviews that the move to push thousands of officers into adviser roles has exacerbated readiness problems already plaguing the Army.

The military advising mission is particularly debilitating because it is officer-heavy. The typical 11-man U.S. team sent to advise an Iraqi battalion consists of five enlisted officers above the rank of staff sergeant, and six commissioned officers.

DOJ_NMG_0086076

Cody acknowledged the overhaul of the adviser mission will "put added strain on the force." He said the Army is compensating by filling some senior officer jobs with more junior officers, particularly in units that have just returned from Iraq.Perhaps more troubling, however, is the time it has taken to make the adviser program a priority. While Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and President Bush have mentioned military advisers as central to plans to hand security duties to Iraqis, it has taken three years to begin to fix the program.

Counterinsurgency experts said that the U.S. must make a long-term commitment to the program and support the Iraqi military with money and American airpower, or risk a catastrophic, Vietnam-like collapse of the Iraqi armed forces.

But it is unclear how long the Army is willing to stay with the program. Ham, the 1st Infantry commander, said he views the training mission to be a two- to three-year commitment. Cody said he is preparing for five years.

But even that might not be long enough. Nagl, the army guerrilla war expert, recalled that the British counterinsurgency that began in 1948 in Malaya lasted 12 years.

"These are long wars," Nagl said. "These are long, hard wars."

Grass-Roots Group Of Troops Petitions Congress For Pullout From Iraq (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

More than 100 U.S. service members have signed a rare appeal urging Congress to support the "prompt withdrawal" of all American troops and bases from Iraq, organizers said yesterday.

"Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home," reads the statement of a small grass-roots group of active-duty military personnel and reservists that says it aims to give U.S. military members a voice in Iraq war policy.

"As a patriotic American proud to serve the nation in uniform, I respectfully urge my political leaders in Congress to support the prompt withdrawal of American military forces and bases from Iraq," it reads. The group, which aims to collect 2,000 signatures and deliver the message to Congress in January, is sponsored by antiwar activists including Iraq Veterans Against the War, Veterans for Peace and Military Families Speak Out.

The unusual appeal -- the first of its kind in the Iraq war, organizers say -- makes use of a legal protection afforded by the Military Whistle-Blower Protection Act, which provides that members of the military, acting in their capacity as citizens, can send a protected communication to Congress without reprisal.

"Just because you put on the uniform of our country doesn't mean you've given up your rights as a citizen," said J.E. McNeil, a lawyer for the group and executive director for the Center on Conscience & War, a Washington organization that protects the rights of conscientious objectors.

But the service members can exercise this right only while off duty and out of uniform, and they must otherwise make clear they are not speaking for the military. In addition, they cannot say anything disrespectful about their commanders, including the president, McNeil said.

Navy Seaman Jonathan Hutto of Atlanta was the first service member to sign the appeal.

"I hear discussions every day among my shipmates about the war in Iraq and how it doesn't make any sense at this point," said Hutto, who is based in Norfolk and served from September 2005 until March on a ship off Iraq's coast. "There is no victory in sight, and war is still inevitable." He said he opposes the war because of its human and economic tolls, adding that the billions of dollars should be spent on jobs and education at home.

Marine Corps Sgt. Liam Madden, 22, served in Iraq's restive Anbar province from September 2004 until February 2005 and found his opposition to the war intensified after he returned to the United States. "I don't think any more Iraqis or Americans should die because of the U.S. occupation," he said, expressing disappointment that Iraqi elections in January 2005 did not lead to a decline in violence.

"I think some things are worth fighting for, I just don't feel Iraq is one of them," said Madden, of Bellows Falls, Vt. The Quantico-based Marine plans to leave the service to attend college in January.

Madden said he and Hutton met and learned of the vehicle for expressing their views to Congress when they attended a lecture at the YMCA in Norfolk by David Cortright, the author of "Soldiers in Revolt: GI Resistance During the Vietnam War."

War Critics Try To Recruit Military (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, October 25, 2006

Anti-war groups are trying to rally active troops to speak out against the war in Iraq — a political tactic they hope will sway voters Nov. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0086077

A small group of active-duty members opposed to the war created a Web site last month intended to collect thousands of signatures of other service members. People can submit their name, rank and duty station if they support statements denouncing the U.S. invasion.

The electronic grievances are then passed along to members of Congress, according to the Web site.

"Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home," the Web site says.

Jonathan Hutto, a Navy seaman based in Norfolk, Va., who set up the Web site a month ago, said the group has collected 118 names and is trying to verify that they are legitimate service members.

There are 1.4 million troops on active duty, including members of the National Guard and Reserve.

Retired veterans have long waded into politics, including the 2004 presidential campaign when a group of veterans challenged Sen. John Kerry's war record. More recently, several retired military generals have called on Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign, contending he botched the war and put troops at risk.

Hearing publicly from active-duty troops is rare. Military laws bar officers from denouncing the president and other U.S. leaders, and regulations typically prevent service members from lobbying for a particular cause while on duty or wearing the uniform.

Legal experts who reviewed the Web site said the effort probably would not violate any rules because the site is not a personal attack on members of the administration and allows service members to quietly pass their grievance to Congress in their free time.

Backers of the Web site also cite a "whistle-blower protection" law as added protection. Under the law, service members can file complaints to Congress without reprisal.

But at least two senators — both critical of the administration's handling of the war in Iraq — said they were concerned that service members speaking out against the president may undermine the military's apolitical status.

"We expect our soldiers to follow ... the legitimate orders of their commanders," said Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, who is helping lead Democratic opposition to the war this election season.

"And if you feel a course of action is inappropriate, your choice is just getting out of the service, basically, if you can and making your comments as a civilian," said Reed, a West Point graduate and former Army Ranger and paratrooper.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, a former reserve judge for the Air Force, said vocal complaints by active-duty members represented a "disturbing trend" that threatened to erode the cohesiveness of the military.

"We've had a long tradition making sure the military doesn't engage in political debate," said Graham, R-S.C. "We don't need a Democratic Army and a Republican Army," he added.

Hutto and supporters of his Web site said they see no problem with active-duty military personnel weighing into politics.

"We're doing this on our own time," Hutto said. Also, "We're speaking as American citizens," rather than service members.

Scott Silliman, director of Duke University's Center on Law, Ethics and National Security, said he sees the increasing political noise being made from military members — active and retired — as a relatively new phenomenon resulting from an increasingly unpopular war.

"Fifteen, 20 years ago you wouldn't have seen it happen," Silliman said.

Still, Silliman said, he sees little wrong with troops speaking out on their own time so long as they are not senior-ranking officers needed to carry out the president's orders. "It depends certainly on who it is" ramping up opposition to the executive branch, he said.

Cynthia Smith, a Pentagon spokeswoman, said members can share their views with the press so long as they are not wearing the uniform and make clear that they are not speaking on behalf of the armed forces.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

Out and about

That was Margaret Carlson, the Washington editor of the Week magazine and a longtime Washington figure (she wrote for Time before that, and was managing editor of the New Republic, as well as Washington bureau chief for Esquire magazine, and editor of both Washington Weekly and the Legal Times of Washington) welcoming guests into her Northwest home last evening to toast Slate chief political correspondent John Dickerson and his new book, "On Her Trail: My Mother, Nancy Dickerson, TV News' First Woman Star."

Meanwhile, Washington's younger crowd convened late into the night at the new Hotel Palomar on P Street NW, helping Grey Goose Vodka and Capitol File magazine crown the "Best Bartender in Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0086078

And the winner, as voted by D.C. bargoers: Alex Rivera of Gua-Rapo, the popular Latin American fusion restaurant in Arlington.

Fun facts: By day, Mr. Rivera is a program officer at the Academy for Educational Development. He also was lead singer in the rock band Stars Hide Fire, once featured on MTV. His winning cocktail is called "duck, duck, GOOSE!"

No morality here

Question: What ex-lawmaker, a Newt Gingrich disciple who swept into Congress during the 1994 Republican revolution, was once a roadie for the Allman Brothers band?

Answer: former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican and centerpiece of the congressional page scandal.

Just one intriguing tidbit about Mr. Foley that Inside the Beltway learned yesterday, passed on by veteran investigative reporter Alicia Mundy, the Washington correspondent for the Seattle Times.

Miss Mundy recalled her wide-ranging interview several years ago with Mr. Foley when she worked for E! Online. He had just become Hollywood's point man on Capitol Hill as chairman of the congressional Entertainment Industry Task Force.

"Looking back, I recall wondering at the time why a conservative Republican member of Congress followed Heather Locklear and 'Dynasty.' It was different from other political interviews," she told us.

In fact, Mr. Foley told her about his personal relationships with actors Don Johnson (they used to play golf together) and Julia Roberts, and how he was star-struck with Miss Locklear.

He also spoke about his friendships with Gregg Allman, drummer Butch Trucks and guitarist Dickey Betts of the Allman Brothers (a former Palm Beach, Fla., real estate agent, Mr. Foley even sold Mr. Betts a house), and recalled the time he toured with the band.

"Yeah. It was crazy. I was on the bus. It was wild," said Mr. Foley, adding that when the tour closed, "I ended up at one of the Allman Brothers' houses in Vegas."

Mr. Foley also was asked about his vote to block fellow Republican Rep. Henry J. Hyde's so-called "culture amendment," introduced in the wake of Colorado's Columbine school shootings to curtail the extreme violence seen in some Hollywood films.

"We should not be the ones to tell the public what they should let their children see. We can't be the divining rod for what's moral or what's decent," he replied.

Asked why he didn't march more in step with other Republican leaders on such issues, Mr. Foley said: "I admire William Bennett ... and definitely John McCain. But they're trying to blame society's ills on one aspect only -- entertainment. As for their impact -- hey, I don't think anyone sees a politician as being a moral leader."

Plame game

Even if Republicans can't bring themselves to read David Corn and Michael Isikoff's new book, "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War," they might find amusing the lengthy written exchange between the latter co-author and columnist Bob Novak in the latest issue of one conservative Washington magazine.

"I was amused, to say the least, to see that my old friends at The Weekly Standard asked Bob Novak to review ... the new book I co-authored with David Corn," writes Mr. Isikoff, who wonders: "Was Scooter Libby unavailable?"

The Newsweek reporter cited "a few inaccuracies and misrepresentations" in the columnist's critique -- from events leading up to former CIA officer Valerie Plame's being "outed" to Mr. Novak's assertion that the book "comes close" to being "an unmitigated apologia" for former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, Mrs. Plame's husband and critic of the Bush administration.

Finally, Mr. Isikoff takes issue with Mr. Novak's portrayal of Mr. Corn, the Washington editor of the Nation magazine, as a left-wing polemicist more interested in furthering an ideological agenda than seeking the truth.

"If only some conservative journalists showed the same willingness to report stories that conflict with their initial assumptions," he wrote in defense of Mr. Corn.

Mr. Novak?

"I regret that my friend Mike Isikoff, in his letter, is still peddling the story of Scooter Libby and Karl Rove attempting to discredit Wilson by revealing his wife's intelligence background," the columnist writes. "Apparently, he joins David Corn in not being able to accept that the conspiracy theory was demolished by his own book."

War On West Shifts Back To Afghanistan (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

The conflict in Iraq is drawing fewer foreign fighters as Muslim extremists aspiring to battle the West turn their attention back to the symbolically important and increasingly violent turf of Afghanistan, European and U.S. anti-terrorism officials say.

The shift of militants to Afghanistan this year suggests that Al Qaeda and its allies, armed with new tactics honed in Iraq, are coming full circle five years after U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban mullahs.

DOJ_NMG_0086079

Until Sept. 11, 2001, Afghanistan was the land of jihad: hallowed ground where fighters from across the Muslim world helped vanquish the Soviet Union in 1980s, fought alongside the Taliban in the 1990s and filled training camps overseen by Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. Loss of the Afghan sanctuary scattered the networks and sent Bin Laden fleeing toward the Pakistani border region, where many anti-terrorism officials believe he remains.

After the fall of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein in 2003, Muslim extremists from the Arabian Peninsula, North Africa and Europe flocked to confront the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq. Although foreigners have been a minority in the Iraqi insurgency, militants such as Jordanian-born Abu Musab Zarqawi played a major role in suicide attacks and kidnap-killings.

But insurgent leaders in Iraq are now mainly interested in foreign recruits ready to die in suicide attacks, anti-terrorism officials say. Moreover, the conflict is dominated by violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims. In contrast, an accelerating Afghan offensive by the resurgent Taliban offers a clearer battleground and a wealth of targets: U.S. and other North Atlantic Treaty Organization troops, and the Western-backed government.

As Iraqis have solidified control of their insurgency, the movement of foreign fighters to Iraq has "significantly declined in recent months," said Pierre de Bousquet de Florian, director of the DST, France's lead counter-terrorism agency.

"There is less need for them in Iraq, because there's a need above all for kamikazes and there are not an infinite number of volunteers," Bousquet, whose agency works closely with U.S., European and Arab counterparts, said in a recent interview. "The Iraqi insurgency is now very well organized around Iraqis…. Those who want to fight, but not necessarily to die as martyrs, go elsewhere."

Simultaneously, Bousquet said, anti-terrorism agents have detected a new flow of militants heading to Afghanistan, where more than 1,000 French soldiers are among the approximately 40,000 foreign troops deployed.

Iraq attracted many Arabs, including Saudis, Yemenis and Syrians, Bousquet said. Algerians, Tunisians and other North Africans made up the second-largest group. About 100 fighters from Europe have gone to Iraq over a three-year period, he said.

"Today they return to the route of Afghanistan, or the tribal zones of Pakistan, where clearly they are thriving," Bousquet said. "Certainly there are some Europeans, but very few. In contrast, in Afghanistan there are certainly many Pakistanis and people from Arab countries and some from North Africa."

A leap in violence in Afghanistan this year has featured tactics such as suicide and roadside bombings that are trademarks of the insurgency in Iraq, according to Bousquet and other officials.

Despite decades of warfare, suicide bombings were rare in Afghanistan. But the number has shot up from six in 2004 to at least 78 so far this year.

"Clearly, methods have been transposed in Afghanistan that did not exist during previous wars in Afghanistan," Bousquet said. "Like suicide attacks. And that's directly influenced by what's happening in the Middle East, in Iraq."

Muslim extremists from North Africa make the odyssey to Afghanistan through routes that converge in Pakistan, another senior French anti-terrorism official said.

"There's a new route along which [North Africans] pass through Peshawar and down into Afghanistan to carry out operations," the senior anti-terrorism official said. "And what's new is the suicide operations. That's not at all part of the Afghan mentality."

North Africans have been detected traveling to Koranic schools in Quetta and Peshawar, said Louis Caprioli, who retired as chief of the DST's anti-terrorism division in 2004. The fighters use the schools as covers for their presence in Pakistan and as staging areas to cross into Taliban-dominated areas of Afghanistan, Caprioli said.

Foreign fighters are predominantly Sunni. They increasingly prefer fighting alongside the Taliban to getting embroiled in the Sunni-versus-Shiite bloodshed in Iraq, said Caprioli, who works closely with the intelligence community at the Paris-based GEOS security firm.

"There are a certain number of foreign jihadis who aren't interested in massacring Shiites," Caprioli said. "In Afghanistan, you have NATO troops to fight as well as Americans, all the 'crusaders.' "

In addition, veterans of combat in Iraq have made their way to Afghanistan, officials said.

"There's a definite increase in foreign fighters going to Afghanistan from all over," said a U.S. anti-terrorism official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "They go through Pakistan. Or they train in Iraq and then keep going to Afghanistan."

U.S. Special Forces officers in Afghanistan learned last year that Arabs were being trained as suicide bombers in Iraq, then traveling through Iran to Pakistan, according to an intelligence document on a computer drive smuggled out of a U.S. base in Afghanistan and sold at a bazaar in April. Extremists transported the aspiring bombers, mostly Yemenis and Syrians, from Quetta across the border into Afghanistan, according to the document on the drive.

The U.S. anti-terrorism official said that militants from as far as away as the Caribbean island of Trinidad, which has a large number of residents of South Asian origin, had traveled to Afghanistan via South Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0086080

Afghan officials blame foreigners for the escalating violence in their country. In several suicide bombings this year, witnesses and officials described attackers as Arabs.

"I think this is true that they are shifting Al Qaeda suicide attackers from Syria, and not only Syria but other countries like it, from other parts of the world, to Afghanistan through Iran and Pakistan and countries like that," said Sayed Anwar, who recently served as deputy chief of the Afghan Interior Ministry's counter-terrorism branch.

Basir Salangi, a police chief in eastern Nangarhar province, said Arabs, Chechens and Pakistanis conduct suicide and other attacks in the border regions, but that attacks in Kabul, the capital, are primarily carried out by Afghans who have been trained in Pakistan. And the combatants in Afghanistan still are overwhelmingly Afghans.

Afghan officials allege that key training centers for the Taliban are in Quetta, Peshawar and Miram Shah, and that militants use mountain routes to cross the border. "There are foreign fighters from several countries who have sanctuary and training in our neighboring country," said Gen. Zahir Azemi, chief spokesman for the Afghan army, referring to Pakistan.

Pakistani officials deny such allegations. This year, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, a spokesman for the Pakistani military, said the "sweeping statement" that Pakistan harbored training camps for cross-border Taliban networks was "absurd."

The movement of fighters to Iraq began to decline last year as insurgent leaders in Syria, who serve as a conduit to the combat zone, began screening volunteers aggressively, turning them back unless they had strong military skills or were eager to carry out suicide attacks, European anti-terrorism officials said.

Some newcomers were redirected to training camps in North Africa. Others were told to launch attacks in Europe, said a senior Italian anti-terrorism official. He described the confessions of Milan-based Tunisian and Moroccan suspects who got to Syria, but then were sent back: "They said the representative of Zarqawi's group really grilled them: 'Do you have military experience? Here's an AK-47; do you know how to use it? Have you ever fired a mortar? If not, we don't want you.' "

Instead, they were directed to bomb a basilica in Bologna because it displays a painting of the prophet Muhammad as depicted in Dante's Inferno, investigators say. Moroccan and Italian police broke up the alleged plot and arrested the group this spring.

Meanwhile, Afghanistan's historical allure for Islamic militants, the lawlessness of the Pakistani border region and the aggressiveness of the Taliban make for an ominous combination, anti-terrorism officials said.

Besides fighting in Afghanistan, Al Qaeda and its allies could once again use training venues and combat zones in the Afghan-Pakistani borderlands to groom terrorists for attacks in the West, Caprioli said. The suicide bombers who struck the London transport system last year and other British suspects in foiled terrorist plots traveled to Pakistan for training, expertise and direction, anti-terrorism officials say.

"Right now [extremists] go to Afghanistan to fight alongside the Taliban," Caprioli said. "But the concern is that we could return to a situation like the one that existed before 2001, when they went for training and then came back. We have not reached that point yet. But people are beginning to get worried."

Pakistan's Sovereignty (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Our finest foreign-policy minds have been abuzz lately trying explain how and why the U.S. and its NATO allies are, as a recent Newsweek International cover has it, "Losing Afghanistan." But no need for deep thoughts here: The largest part of the problem is neighboring Pakistan.

In September, the Pakistan government of Pervez Musharraf agreed to abandon its North Waziristan province -- which shares a long border with Afghanistan -- to the de facto rule of its "tribal elders" and the Taliban and mujahadeen terrorists they harbor. Since then, as Barnett Rubin observes nearby, the number of cross-border raids into Afghanistan has risen threefold.

It's true that the agreement the Pakistan government signed with these elders explicitly forbids such raids. But General Musharraf surely knew that the Taliban would not keep idle in Waziristan for long, especially since he also agreed to the release and pardon of all Taliban prisoners and the return of their confiscated weapons.

From day one in the war on terror, the Bush Administration has said it would make no distinction between terrorists and those who harbor them. So far, Mr. Musharraf has earned an exception to this rule by helping to capture al Qaeda suspects early on, and then by pleading that his government cannot control its unruly tribal areas. But then he cannot also refuse to allow NATO troops and U.S. Predator missiles to do the job for him.

We don't know what General Musharraf promised President Bush and Afghan President Hamid Karzai during their recent conclave in the White House. But we hope it was more tangible cooperation than we have been seeing of late. Sovereignty has responsibilities, and General Musharraf is not exercising them.

A Border Affair (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0086081

By Barnett R. Rubin

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

It will take more than a dinner at the White House -- such as the one held for Pervez Musharraf and Hamid Karzai last month -- to overcome the longstanding antagonism between Pakistan and Afghanistan. Of course, the political clumsiness on the part of the U.S. does not begin or end there. Had we paid more attention to pre-9/11 history, we might not face a rising Taliban insurgency with sanctuary in Pakistan.

U.S., NATO and Afghan intelligence agree that the Taliban leadership's safe haven in Pakistan, especially in the city of Quetta and some tribal agencies, is essential to the insurgency's ability to exploit Afghanistan's internal weaknesses. Gen. Musharraf admitted in Kabul on Sept. 7 that while Pakistan had worked against al Qaeda, "the focus had now shifted to the Taliban." In other words, Pakistan had theretofore done nothing to hinder them.

On Sept. 5, Gen. Musharraf's government signed an agreement in the North Waziristan tribal agency with tribal elders, local mujahadeen, Taliban and ulama (Islamic clergy), under which the Pakistani army would withdraw to bases, and the fighters would end attacks into Afghanistan. The number of such attacks, however, has tripled since the agreement.

Pakistan has never fully acted on U.S. demands to fight the Taliban, not because Gen. Musharraf is "against us" rather than "with us," but because the Pakistan army sees its interests in a regional context, not as part of the U.S. war on terror. The conflict between Pakistan and Afghanistan, the anomalous status of Pakistan's tribal areas, the contest between Talibanization and Pashtun nationalism in the borderlands, the struggle over military control of the Pakistani state, and the refuge for terrorists along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border are all linked, as are the policies that could address these problems.

Except for the five years of Taliban rule in Kabul, Pakistan and Afghanistan have had largely hostile relations since Pakistan was created almost 60 years ago. Even under the Taliban, Afghanistan never accepted the incorporation of Pashtun and Baluch territories into Pakistan. This dispute had led Afghanistan's monarchy to seek Soviet military aid to counter Pakistan's U.S.-aided army, and to align itself diplomatically with India.

Pakistan's military has used jihadi militants to accomplish several goals: to wage asymmetrical warfare in Kashmir and Afghanistan; to spread Islamism among Pashtuns on both sides of the border to counter Pashtun and Baluch nationalists who it feared would break up the country; and to cement its alliance with Islamist parties, whose street power intimidates and marginalizes the centrist parties that have dominated fair elections in Pakistan. The Pashtun tribal agencies (known as the Federally Administered Tribal Areas, or FATA), play a key role in this strategy: The absence of national administration or political institutions creates a space where Islamist militias can organize and train, while the Pakistani state denies responsibility for it.

Pakistan's rulers depict these tribal areas as repositories of ancient traditions, but they are actually relics of colonialism. In 1901, Lord Curzon, viceroy of India, promulgated the Frontier Crimes Regulations under which FATA is still run. The "tribal elders" of whom Gen. Musharraf speaks are not representatives of traditional society, but objects of manipulation by the government's "political agents," who wield slush funds with no accountability. Elders who oppose the Taliban are summarily executed. Such murders are so common that the term used for them, "target killings," was incorporated in English into the Urdu-language text of the Waziristan agreement. Two of these supposedly banned killings took place within a week after the agreement was signed.

Pakistan thus pursues the goal, inherited from the British Empire, of using violence and manipulation to assure that no hostile forces gain a foothold along the border, or in Afghanistan. The main force that concerns Pakistan is India, which has opened consulates in Jalalabad and Qandahar, near the Pakistan border. Pakistan charges that Indian intelligence uses agents to spy on and destabilize Pakistan, for instance by fomenting unrest in Baluchistan, where Islamabad faces the fifth insurgency since its government incorporated the area in 1947.

Gen. Musharraf's ethnic charges -- that the Afghan government is dominated by Tajiks who marginalize Pashtuns like President Karzai and the majority of his cabinet and provincial governors -- are linked to the goal of purging Afghanistan of Indian influence. By "Tajiks," Gen. Musharraf means the remaining officials (head of the intelligence agency and army chief of staff) from the Northern Alliance faction that received aid from Iran, Russia and, worst of all, India, during its resistance to the Pakistani-supported Taliban. At last month's White House dinner, President Karzai refuted these erroneous ethnic charges, while President Bush pointed out that the U.S., not India, is supporting the Afghan military and intelligence services.

This archaic border arrangement has created a space for Pakistan to allow militant parties and former intelligence agents to support the Taliban. Firm pressure to shut down the Taliban command and control must be accompanied by efforts to support democracy and civilian rule in Pakistan, which would empower the centrist and nonsectarian parties that have actually won elections in Pakistan. Democratization should be extended to the tribal areas, where political parties are now outlawed, giving radical militias a political monopoly. Several mainstream Pakistani parties have proposed such reforms.

The U.S. and Afghanistan should also recognize legitimate Pakistani concerns. The sizes of Indian consulates should be limited, and the U.S, Afghanistan and India should agree to confidence-building measures about their roles. Once Pakistan acts against Taliban sanctuaries, President Karzai should also take the courageous and politically difficult step to initiate a political dialogue in both Afghanistan and across the border over resolution of all outstanding issues, including the recognition of an open border between the two countries. In return, landlocked Afghanistan will need guaranteed access to Pakistani port facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0086082

The U.S. and other NATO countries would have to act as guarantors of this process and provide aid to develop the border area, where unemployment and illiteracy facilitate recruitment to armed groups. These policies would address the roots of instability and violence in this region, and make those on both sides of the frontier genuine partners in protecting both their own security, and ours.

Mr. Rubin is director of studies and senior fellow at the Center on International Cooperation, New York University.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

First Senior Executive Admits Options Fraud (FT)

By Kevin Allison In San Francisco And Agencies

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

David Kreinberg, the former chief financial officer of Comverse, the voicemail software company, on Tuesday became the first top executive to plead guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in connection with options backdating.

The guilty plea, part of a deal struck with federal prosecutors, came as the US Securities and Exchange Commission announced that Mr Kreinberg had agreed to pay almost $2.4m to settle civil fraud charges.

Mr Kreinberg, who has been free on $1m bail since he surrendered to the Federal Bureau of Investigations in August, was one of three former Comverse executives to be charged over backdating.

Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, Comverse's founder and chief executive, was arrested in Namibia earlier this month after being branded a fugitive from justice by US authorities. Mr Alexander, who has denied wrongdoing, is fighting extradition to the US, where he could face more than 20 years in jail if convicted.

William Sorin, Comverse's former general counsel, is also facing charges. His lawyers could not be reached for comment on Tuesday.

Mr Kreinberg entered his guilty plea in a federal courtroom in Brooklyn. He told a judge that he "knew at the time that my actions and agreements with others at the company to act as I have were wrong."

Options-granting practices at more than 150 companies have come under scrutiny in one of Silicon Valley's biggest scandals since the dotcom collapse, according to Glass Lewis, an institutional shareholder service.

The FBI and securities regulators are examining whether managers intentionally misled shareholders by manipulating the grant dates of stock options in order to inflate their value.

Mr Alexander is alleged to have led a complex scheme to manipulate the grant dates of stock options at Comverse. Among other offences, Mr Alexander is alleged to have created a secret options slush fund by awarding options to fake employees. Mr Alexander has said he plans to fight the charges if brought to trial.

Mr Kreinberg's guilty plea marked the first concrete legal fallout from the options backdating scandal. Two former top officials from Brocade Communications Systems, a networking equipment maker, have pleaded not guilty to backdating charges.

The SEC said Mr Kreinberg, without admitting or denying wrongdoing, had agreed to pay $2.4m and to accept a permanent ban on serving as a company director or officer.

Although backdating is not in itself illegal, experts say executives who changed the grant dates of stock options without disclosing the practice to shareholders may have fallen foul of securities laws.

Accounting problems arising from the practice have led dozens of companies to announce they will be forced to restate past earnings, some to the tune of billions of dollars.

Forty-five executives and directors have stepped down as a result of backdating, according to Glass Lewis.

Comverse's Former Finance Chief Pleads Guilty (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK -- The former chief financial officer of Comverse Technology Inc. pleaded guilty to securities-fraud charges stemming from a stock-options backdating scheme, making him the first executive to admit criminal wrongdoing in a wide-ranging probe involving more than 100 companies.

David Kreinberg, 41 years old, is cooperating with the government and is fingering the company's former chief executive, Kobi Alexander, as the mastermind of the backdating scheme at the New York voice-mail software maker.

DOJ_NMG_0086083

Mr. Kreinberg has told prosecutors that Mr. Alexander offered him a "name your price" bribe if he would take sole blame for the fraud, according to people familiar with the situation. The alleged bribe started with offers of $2 million and then $5 million, according to prior court documents from prosecutors.

At a hearing yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, Mr. Kreinberg admitted to helping Mr. Alexander select particularly favorable dates on which to grant options, using hindsight. "I was asked by the CEO to bring him a printout of the company's trading prices over a past year period to enable him to select the 'as of' date that would be used for the exercise price of the option grant," he said in court.

The scheme understated Comverse's compensation expenses, thus inflating net income on financial statements that Mr. Kreinberg signed and submitted to the Securities and Exchange Commission, he said in court. He added that he knew his actions were "wrong."

Mr. Kreinberg's cooperation strengthens the government's case against Mr. Alexander, who fled the country and was later arrested in the African country of Namibia. Mr. Alexander is free on bail in Namibia. The U.S. government is seeking his extradition to face a 35-count indictment that includes charges of securities fraud, money laundering and bribery.

Robert Morvillo, a defense attorney representing Mr. Alexander, said his client denies that any bribe offer to Mr. Kreinberg took place. He added that Mr. Alexander plans to contest the charges "if and when he comes back."

Mr. Kreinberg faces up to 10 years in prison for securities fraud and a maximum of five years in prison for conspiracy. Prosecutors are seeking an estimated $51 million in restitution. A sentencing date wasn't set. Mr. Kreinberg reached an agreement with the SEC yesterday to give back $2.4 million, according to his attorney, Guy Pertillo.

Mr. Kreinberg's guilty plea comes as prosecutors and regulators continue to investigate the backdating matter. More than 35 executives or directors have lost their jobs.

In addition to Messrs. Kreinberg and Alexander, Comverse's former general counsel William F. Sorin was charged in August with conspiracy to commit mail fraud, securities fraud and wire fraud. He is in plea discussions with the government, according to court papers.

Comverse Ex-CFO Names Jacob Alexander In Guilty Plea (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Patricia Hurtado

Bloomberg, October 25, 2006

Oct. 24 (Bloomberg) -- Comverse Technology Inc. ex-Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg implicated his former boss as he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in the U.S. probe of illegal manipulation of employee stock option grants.

Kreinberg, 41, is the first executive to plead guilty in the biggest probe of corporate wrongdoing since late trading of mutual funds three years ago led to $4.3 billion in penalties. Almost 150 U.S. companies have disclosed internal or government inquiries into the backdating of options.

Former Comverse Chief Executive Officer Jacob ``Kobi'' Alexander directed a scheme to systematically backdate stock option grants, Kreinberg claimed today in Brooklyn federal court. Contrary to Comverse's securities filings, Kreinberg told U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis ``the company was in fact issuing backdated options with an exercise price lower than the fair market value on the grant date.''

Alexander was arrested in Namibia last month and is the subject of a U.S. extradition request. Kreinberg, who faces a possible 15-year prison sentence, agreed to cooperate with the government in its prosecution of Alexander, and in related civil lawsuits as part of a separate $2.4 million settlement with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

The U.S. Justice Department is trying to persuade the government of Namibia to return Alexander to the U.S. to face charges related to stock-option backdating, including conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings to regulators and money laundering.

Namibian Court

Alexander, 54, was freed by a Namibian court Oct. 3 on N$10 million ($1.32 million) bail following his Sept. 27 arrest in the African nation's capital of Windhoek. Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Lacewell said in an affidavit read in Namibian court that Alexander was negotiating his surrender to U.S. authorities when he fled, eventually traveling to Namibia.

Kreinberg's lawyer, Guy Petrillo, declined to comment following today's plea hearing. Alexander lawyer Robert Morvillo, who was in the same court attempting to get access to more than $40 million of his client's assets frozen by the U.S., said the plea is ``going to have an impact -- the question is whether it's going to have a positive or negative impact.'' He declined to comment further. The judge didn't rule on his request.

At least 149 companies have disclosed investigations into their options grants, and more than 65 have said they found or expect to find additional costs tied to the awards. So far, the revisions and charges exceed $3.6 billion. More than 40 executives and directors have retired, resigned or were reassigned or fired after options probes, and about 265 lawsuits have been filed against more than 70 companies.

Low Prices

Kreinberg was originally charged on Aug. 8 with one count of conspiracy, along with Alexander and William Sorin, 56, former general counsel of New York-based Comverse, the world's largest maker of voice-mail software.

Prosecutors claim the three men backdated stock option grants so employees could buy shares at low prices and make the maximum profit, prosecutors said. Stock options typically give an employee the right to buy a specified number of company shares at the market price on the option grant date.

On Oct. 12, federal prosecutors in Brooklyn filed a new indictment against Alexander, including charges of attempted bribery and securities fraud. Alexander was accused of obstructing a federal investigation by offering ``millions of dollars'' to buy a witness's silence. That witness wasn't named in the indictment.

Extradition Papers

Alexander offered the unnamed witness $2 million, then $5 million in March, according to prosecutors. The former CEO told the witness he would leave the country instead of going to jail, prosecutors said. In her affidavit, Lacewell said Alexander told the unnamed witness there was no reason both of them ``should go down.'' Lacewell said the individual is cooperating with authorities.

Following the new indictment, U.S. officials submitted documents arguing for Alexander's extradition. Namibian authorities said yesterday they are studying the papers.

Kreinberg may help the extradition effort, said Scott Christie, a former U.S. prosecutor. Some countries, including Namibia, require testimony from someone with first-hand knowledge of the alleged crime as a requirement before granting extradition.

Concealing

``To have the cooperation of someone on the inside who can provide the most relevant and critical facts to assist in convincing the authorities of the country holding the defendant is a measurable advantage to the government,'' Christie said.

During today's hearing, Kreinberg said that, in 1999, Alexander directed the creation of a ``secret options holding account'' that would provide an ``available pool of options with which principally to address employee retention and recruitment challenges,'' Kreinberg said.

Kreinberg assisted Alexander by concealing the account from Comverse's compensation committee and from Deloitte & Touche, the company's accounting firm, he said. Some options held in the account were submitted for committee approval ``under fictitious names.'' Paul Baker, a spokesman for Comverse, wasn't immediately available for comment.

Kreinberg, who had to be prompted by the judge to state his former boss's name, admitted that he approved Alexander's omission of options information in reports to the committee.

$1 Million

Kreinberg said Alexander backdated options by ``selecting a date, with hindsight, to issue the options and notifying either the general counsel or the CEO's assistant, sometimes through me, to prepare paperwork for the compensation committee to approve the grant `as of' the earlier date.'' He didn't name the assistant.

Alexander sometimes asked him to bring ``a printout of the company's trading prices over a past period to enable him to select the `as of' date that would be used,'' Kreinberg said.

Prosecutors in Brooklyn have said they identified almost $1 million in profit that Kreinberg made from allegedly backdated options. The government claimed Sorin earned ``more than $1 million'' from the scheme while Alexander made almost $6.4 million due to backdating.

Kreinberg and Sorin both originally pleaded not guilty and were freed on $1 million bail. Prosecutors have twice asked a magistrate for a delay in the prosecution of the two men to allow for plea negotiations. Sorin's lawyer, James Brochin, wasn't immediately available for comment.

Not Guilty

Lacewell said that, as part of his plea agreement, Kreinberg faces up to 15 years in prison for both counts, fines of up to $1.25 million and restitution of $51 million.

Alexander was the second CEO to be charged in the options backdating scandal. The first was ex-Brocade Communications Systems Inc. CEO Gregory Reyes, 44. In July, federal prosecutors in San Francisco charged Reyes with securities fraud along with Stephanie Jensen, a former Brocade human resources vice president.

Reyes and Jensen, who were indicted by a federal grand jury in San Francisco on Aug. 10, have pleaded not guilty to the charges and are awaiting trial.

Kreinberg is a certified public accountant and former senior manager at Deloitte & Touche. He has an accounting degree from Yeshiva University and a master's degree in finance and international business from Columbia University.

DOJ_NMG_0086085

$2.4 Million

Separately, Kreinberg today agreed to pay $2.4 million to settle a civil lawsuit by the U.S. Securities Exchange Commission, the agency said. The SEC also permanently barred him from acting as a director at a U.S. company.

Kreinberg, who neither admitted nor denied wrongdoing in that settlement, will cooperate in other lawsuits filed by the regulator, the SEC said. The settlement is subject to court approval. The SEC claimed in its complaint that the three former Comverse executives fraudulently granted themselves and others backdated options from 1991 through 2001.

Comverse shares fell 16 cents to $21.61 at 3:29 p.m. in Nasdaq composite trading.

The criminal case against Kreinberg and Sorin is U.S. v. Alexander, 1:06-mj-00817, U.S. District Court, Eastern District of New York (Brooklyn). The case against Alexander is U.S. v. Alexander, 06-CR-00628, U.S. District Court, Eastern District of New York (Brooklyn).

Former Comverse CFO Pleads Guilty To Backdating Scheme (LAW)

By Beth Bar And Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 25, 2006

David Kreinberg, the former CFO of Comverse Technology, pleaded guilty Tuesday to helping engineer a scheme to illegally backdate millions of dollars in stock options.

"I knew at the time that my actions and agreements with others at the company to act as I have were wrong," said Kreinberg at a court hearing Tuesday before Eastern District of New York Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis.

Kreinberg, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in the Eastern District U.S. Attorney's Office, is the first person in the country to plead guilty to illegally backdating stock options. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud, and one count of securities fraud. He faces up to 15 years in prison and $1.2 million in fines when he is sentenced Feb. 23. He also could be ordered to pay tens of millions in restitution.

Kreinberg's plea clears the way for him to testify against former CEO Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, who fled the country before charges against him were filed in August. Alexander, a fugitive who was discovered in Namibia last month, has been indicted in connection with charges that include using fictitious names to generate hundreds of thousands of backdated options, which he and others then parked into a secret slush fund.

William F. Sorin, the company's former general counsel, also has been engaged in plea negotiations. Prosecutors have until Nov. 9 to indict Sorin on criminal charges.

Kreinberg has separately settled civil charges against him. As part of an agreement with the SEC, he is permanently suspended from practicing as an accountant and must pay $2.4 million in disgorgement and prejudgment interest.

Former Top Comverse Official Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud (AFP)

AFP, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK (AFP) - The former chief financial officer of software maker Comverse Technology Inc (CMVT - news) . pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud for using back-dated stock options, the US Justice Department announced. David Kreinberg pleaded guilty to a two-count felony information charging one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud, and one count of securities fraud, US Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf of the Eastern District said in a joint statement with a local FBI official. The charges "stem from the stock options backdating and slush fund schemes" at the New York-based company from 1998 to 2006, the statement read. The conspiracy charge carries a sentence of up to five years prison and a 250,000 dollar fine, while the securities fraud charge carries a maximum sentence of 10 years prison and a fine of up to one million dollars. "The charges also require restitution in an amount to be determined by the court at sentencing, currently estimated at 51 million," the statement read. The government said that Kreinberg, former chief executive officer Jacob "Kobi" Alexander, and ex-general counsel William Sorin backdated the options to days when Comverse stock was trading at a low price, and below the market price on the date when the options were actually granted, thereby maximizing their gains. The investigation was led by the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, but it was triggered in early March when a Wall Street Journal reporter became suspicious about Comverse's stock option practices.

End Of Enron's Saga Brings Era To A Close (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 24 -- The sentencing Monday of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling ended the saga of the scandal-ridden Houston energy company and effectively closed the book on an era of high-profile corporate malfeasance.

DOJ_NMG_0086086

Skilling's sentence capped a string of lengthy prison terms handed down to top executives for economic crimes, including WorldCom Inc. founder Bernard J. Ebbers, now serving 25 years, and Adelphia Communications Corp. founder John J. Rigas, facing 15 years pending appeal.

But Enron remains that period's signature scandal. The company's December 2001 breakdown ushered in a wave of corporate collapses that roiled investor confidence and prompted the government to enlist a special band of prosecutors and FBI agents to mount the most complex business fraud investigation in history. Their pursuit of top Enron officials helped change the way corporate wrongdoing is prosecuted and spurred companies to more aggressively police themselves.

Hours after a judge sentenced Skilling to more than 24 years in prison, the leaders of the Enron Task Force announced that they would close up shop, saying their mission was mostly complete. But even as officials packed their files and prepared for other jobs in government and the private sector, there were fresh signals about the direction post-Enron corporate crime enforcement would take.

A new wave of investigations is targeting executive greed, insider trading and investment pools known as hedge funds. On Tuesday, the former finance chief of Comverse Technology Inc. pleaded guilty to covering up a scheme to trigger big paydays for employees by changing the grant dates on stock options. Meanwhile, federal prosecutors charged the former finance chief of Refco Inc. for his role in a $1 billion accounting scandal that hurled the commodities brokerage into bankruptcy proceedings.

"There is an awful lot to do in the world of corporate fraud," said Chip Burrus, assistant director in the FBI's criminal investigation division.

Policing corporate malfeasance after Enron, it seems, won't be slow -- only different. The task-force model, criticized by defense lawyers for its single-minded pursuit of Enron's top officials, is unlikely to be repeated anytime soon. But the governance changes wrought by the company's collapse mean that more chief executives are losing their jobs because of allegations of wrongdoing and that more businesses are paying for costly internal investigations to ferret out fraud on their own.

Over its life span, the Enron Task Force secured guilty pleas from more than 15 executives, including the leaders of three top Enron business units, its finance chief and its chief accounting officer. Their testimony helped win convictions in May against Skilling and company founder Kenneth L. Lay, who died weeks later, of leading an accounting fraud that cost investors and employees billions of dollars.

However, the group's record in trials against lower-level executives has been mixed, legal analysts said.

Last week, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit rejected a task-force request to re-hear its appeal in a case against former Merrill Lynch & Co. officials convicted of engaging in a sham deal to help Enron meet earnings targets in late 1999. A three-judge panel last summer threw out the conspiracy charges against the Merrill bankers, ruling that they did not deprive the investment bank of their honest services. The government still has the option of asking the Supreme Court to consider the case. The Justice Department's fraud section will pick up any remaining cases from now on, officials said.

Separately, the prosecution of executives in Enron's highly touted Internet broadband unit produced mixed results. A jury acquitted one defendant, former accountant Michael Krautz, and failed to come to a unanimous decision against several others.

Washington defense lawyer Barry Pollack, who won an acquittal in a jury trial for Krautz this year, criticized the task force for using aggressive legal theories and said the group has "precious few convictions after trial to show for its efforts."

"The task force will likely be remembered only for its success in obtaining convictions of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, but its overall record in other cases of not-guilty verdicts and reversals by appeals courts is equally part of its legacy," Pollack said.

Task-force leaders also declined to retry defunct accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP in its obstruction-of-justice case after the Supreme Court, in a serious setback, unanimously tossed its conviction in 2005. The firm's conviction four years ago nonetheless sounded alarms across the corporate landscape and spurred accountants to become more skeptical of their clients, leading to more rigorous audits and a greater number of restated financial results.

Enron became "the leading symbol of corporate scandal," in the words of U.S. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, but the shuttering of the task force will by no means mark the end of regulators' pursuit of business crime, government officials said.

The FBI's Burrus added that while Enron amounted to "an amazing criminal phenomenon," the bureau still has more than 400 open investigations in such areas as stock options backdating, political corruption and related offenses.

Already, federal prosecutors have filed criminal charges against former executives at Comverse and Brocade Communications Systems Inc. for allegedly failing to disclose schemes that triggered bigger payouts for certain employees awarded stock options, which allow workers to buy stock at a set price and a specific time.

At least 30 executives this year have lost their jobs over options scandals, as board members now appear far more willing to fire top executives for questions about the propriety of their behavior, in part because corporate accountability legislation passed after the big-name frauds clarified directors' responsibility to investors.

DOJ_NMG_0086087

But some legacies of the recent scandals may be more short-lived. In early 2002, President Bush created a government-wide panel to combat business fraud, a move that spurred federal prosecutors across the country to pour resources into such investigations. But after Richard M. Scrushy, the founder of HealthSouth Corp., was acquitted by an Alabama jury in 2004 and a criminal case against former Kmart Corp. executives in Michigan was dismissed, the difficulties of bringing and winning such cases became more clear.

As a result, there may be a natural devolution as complex fraud cases congregate once again in such hot spots as New York, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Chicago, said Leslie R. Caldwell, a former federal prosecutor and the first leader of the Enron Task Force.

Moreover, business groups already are pushing back on the regulatory crackdown, attacking accounting strictures in the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley federal law as too expensive and pushing lawmakers and securities regulators to weaken the rules. Two independent committees, including one led by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, are studying ways to change the law. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has made statements criticizing the rules, as well.

Timothy J. Coleman, a former prosecutor and Justice Department official, predicted that the legions of investigators hired by securities regulators, federal prosecutors and the FBI will pay lasting dividends because they will become a "standing army" ready to target business wrongdoing.

"Whether it's stock options, mutual funds or something else, corporate America should expect a continuing series of major, nationwide investigations for the foreseeable future," said Coleman, now a defense lawyer in Washington.

NEC Probed Over Delay In Filing Results (FT)

By Michiyo Nakamoto In Tokyo

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

NEC, the Japanese electronics group, said on Tuesday it was being investigated by the US Securities and Exchange Commission in connection with its delay in filing results for the last financial year.

NEC said it had received “a letter of informal inquiry from the SEC requesting voluntary production of certain documents” following the delay to its annual results.

The Japanese group gave no further information but said it intended “to co-operate fully with the SEC in connection with this inquiry”.

NEC earlier this month received notice from Nasdaq that it could face de-listing as a result of its failure to provide its annual report for last year. The filing was due not later than October 2 this year.

The Japanese group said it intended to maintain its Nasdaq listing but could not say when it might be able to provide last year’s results under US GAAP.

“We are working on the analysis in order to obtain an auditor’s report and maintain our Nasdaq listing,” NEC said. “At the earliest it will take until the end of November.”

According to its filing with the SEC last month, NEC’s US auditors failed to recognise revenue from certain maintenance and support services.

NEC said it had been unable “to gather the data necessary to complete the audit with respect to the vendor-specific objective evidence of the relative fair value of maintenance and support services”.

It warned further that it was unable to determine whether any adjustments to previously announced financial results would be required as a result of the review.

The group also said that its delayed results filing would reveal that its “disclosure controls and procedures are ineffective”. The filing would also show that NEC “does not have an adequate system of internal control” to ensure that material errors do not occur in the preparation of US GAAP consolidated financial statements.

It said it had identified a number of irregularities during the past two years, including “improper accounting practices for revenue recognition related to two US subsidiaries, fictitious sales transactions occurring for more than three years at a Japanese subsidiary, and several irregularities at certain other business units”.

NEC said it would change its accounting principles for consolidated financial statements for the first half in Japan from US GAAP to Japanese GAAP in order to be able to report its first-half results in Japan.

Going In-House? It Might Be A Wise Move (LAW)

By Janice K. Mandel, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 25, 2006

Corporate scandals and an increased emphasis on ethics have raised the profile of top legal officers

DOJ_NMG_0086088

Earlier this year, Judge J. Michael Luttig of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals stunned the legal world by surrendering his lifetime appointment to the bench in favor of the top legal job at Boeing Co. In his letter of resignation, Luttig called the job a "singular opportunity," one that he could not pass up. Luttig's move did not come as a surprise, however, to the in-house bar, which has noted that the career door that used to swing between government and law firms now revolves with a corporate stop as well for many top lawyers.

The demand for top legal talent in in-house departments has been growing as increased regulation and an increasing emphasis on corporate accountability have put greater emphasis on the attorney's role in helping to foster an ethical corporate culture.

In the current environment it is not enough for companies to be ethical and compliant; they have to be seen as such. As a result, companies are evaluating candidates for top in-house positions on the strength of their reputation for scrupulous ethics, judgment and objective decision-making beyond narrowly defined legal issues. In addition, law firms are seeing the benefits of seeking out new partners from in-house ranks because of the perspective on client service (and potential clients) that these lawyers can bring.

The increased demand has brought with it a rise in the stock of in-house counsel. Top lawyers are increasingly interested in exploring in-house careers because of their greater visibility and significance, combined with more competitive compensation. They also know that today, going in-house does not necessarily preclude them from returning to top jobs in private practice or public service. For instance, Deval Patrick, who was general counsel of the Coca-Cola Co. from 1999 to 2004, is now the Democratic candidate for Massachusetts governor.

THE PLAYERS

In the past 18 months, the legal profession has noted the career moves of several other prominent lawyers from noteworthy private-practice and public service positions to in-house positions at some of the nation's most prominent corporations, including the following:

· Larry D. Thompson, former deputy attorney general of the United States, became senior vice president, government affairs and general counsel and secretary at PepsiCo Inc. in early 2005.

· David G. Leitch, former deputy counsel to the president, became general counsel and senior vice president of Ford Motor Co. in April 2005.

· James B. Comey, also former deputy attorney general, was appointed senior vice president and general counsel for Bethesda, Md.-based Lockheed Martin Corp. in August 2005.

· Beth Wilkinson was appointed in February as the new executive vice president, general counsel and corporate secretary for Fannie Mae after serving as a partner in Latham & Watkins' Washington, D.C., office and as a Justice Department prosecutor.

"Although many major companies had in-house lawyers and legal functions of high stature for years, we've certainly seen the prominence of the legal function increase in a lot of companies post-Sarbanes, post-Enron," notes James Wilber, a principal with Altman Weil, a management-consulting firm.

At the same time that corporations are demanding more of their in-house lawyers in terms of managing the company's compliance, regulators and others are also expecting more. For example, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act required, for the first time, that the Securities and Exchange Commission establish formal standards of professional conduct for attorneys representing public companies. And the behavior of in-house lawyers faces scrutiny similar to that placed on other business executives. For example, in the recent scandal involving Hewlett-Packard's use of private investigators to determine the source of boardroom leaks to the press, former general counsel Ann Baskins was called before a congressional subcommittee, and Kevin Hunsaker, former HP chief ethics director and senior legal counsel, was charged with fraud and conspiracy in California earlier this month.

"Typically, lawyers have always had an enhanced concern and recognition of their responsibilities to be vigilant," says Martha Ann Sisson, a former in-house counsel at Mobil Oil Corp. and co-founder of Garrison & Sisson, an attorney-search firm that fills many in-house positions. "There is now external pressure -- board pressure and shareholder pressure and regulator pressure -- in order for that to be accomplished. It's always been a duty, but now it's a business imperative; it's a legal requirement."

MAKING 50 DECISIONS A DAY

From the attorney's point of view, in-house work offers significant attractions and challenges.

When Beth Wilkinson was hired, for example, Fannie Mae was fighting its way back from a major accounting scandal and criticism of what some characterized as an arrogant corporate culture. The offer to join Fannie Mae "kind of landed in my lap," Wilkinson says. "I wasn't sure I would like in-house work because I love trial work and making decisions." Wilkinson was one of the lead Justice Department prosecutors in the case against Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh. "Ironically, when I got here, I found I make 50 decisions every day. That, I love."

DOJ_NMG_0086089

It falls to in-house lawyers to be proactive in helping corporate clients understand what needs to be done to ensure that the company is aware of its obligations and the pitfalls it should avoid.

"On a day-to-day basis, often it falls upon the law department to help steer the company through those tricky waters encountered when running any major business," says Walfrido "Wally" Martinez. He just returned to Hunton & Williams as worldwide managing partner of the firm after serving as senior vice president and general counsel of Diageo North America, a producer of alcoholic beverages.

Martinez's move from Diageo to Hunton points out another notable change in the perceptions of the in-house career path. Now, more than before, attorneys have the chance to move between private practice and in-house practice, with law firms increasingly interested in hiring in-house counsel. Lawyers who return to law firms say their in-house experience has given them valuable insight into what their clients need from them. It is that insight that makes them particularly attractive to law firms.

Marc Martin, a partner in Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham's D.C. office, has been able to tap into his experience as founding chief legal officer of three communications companies. "An in-house lawyer has a lot to juggle," he says. "In addition to being at the top of your game substantively, you have to gain and maintain the trust of your internal clients -- who are not obligated to let you in the inner circle merely because you are on the payroll -- and manage both the internal legal team and outside counsel.

"My stint as a general counsel was an invaluable opportunity to view the world from the client's perspective and from the in-house lawyer's perspective," says Martin. This insight, he believes, makes him more effective in collaborating with in-house clients.

Steven Fabrizio agrees. He started out at top-tier firms in New York and Washington before he moved on to start and head the litigation department for the Recording Industry Association of America. There, he gained industry expertise and contacts that he then parlayed into a successful entertainment and new-media practice at Jenner & Block. Fabrizio emphasizes the value the in-house experience brings to his work as outside counsel.

"When I was in-house litigation counsel purchasing legal services, it became clear to me that even the best and most skilled outside counsel fell into two categories: those that internalized the pressures I faced and the interests of my constituents, and those that did not or could not," says Fabrizio. "I only wanted to work with the former. As simple as it sounds, that experience has made me a better private-practice lawyer."

ON THE MONEY

The increased significance of the role of in-house counsel is accompanied by an upward trend in compensation. According to the newly released 2006 Law Department Survey by the management-consulting firm Hildebrandt International, the chief legal officers from the 164 companies nationwide that participated in the survey had a median total cash compensation (salary and bonus) of more than $700,000, with bonuses making up about half of the total.

In the Washington region, chief legal officers at the largest public companies have a median total cash compensation of $1 million or more, according to data gathered from the companies' SEC filings. On top of that, most receive stock awards and stock options that can boost their total direct compensation by several million dollars. General counsel at midsize public companies may have total cash compensation of at least a half-million dollars, as well as significant stock awards and options.

Hildebrandt's data also show median total compensation for chief legal officers increasing by 8.9 percent from 2004 to 2005 and by 6.4 percent from 2005 to 2006.

More than ever before, companies are putting greater emphasis on merit bonuses, consistent with the pay-for-performance corporate model. Lauren Chung, a consultant and law-department-survey editor with Hildebrandt, expects that bonus and noncash incentives will continue to make up a greater portion of total compensation, particularly at the more senior levels of the law department. "While base salaries will rise steadily, the significant earning potential lies with bonuses and noncash or long-term incentives," she says. "Participation in long-term incentives will only increase as many more companies seek methods to retain talent and pay for performance."

No one maintains statistics on the number of in-house counsel, so it is unclear whether the raw number, or the number of companies with in-house counsel, is increasing. Martindale-Hubbell lists some 5,100 in-house lawyers and more than 1,400 organizations with in-house staff in Maryland, Virginia and the District. The Washington Metropolitan Area Corporate Counsel Association, the professional association for in-house counsel in that area, has tripled its membership in the past eight years, from 500 to almost 1,500. At the same time, WMACCA has seen an increased demand for services to meet the needs of both former law firm experts now practicing in-house for large legal departments and the general counsel of small companies.

"The current corporate environment requires sophisticated counsel who possess deep organizational knowledge. Expectations regarding corporate culture have changed, and so have the expectations for in-house counsel," says Eric Reicin, president of WMACCA and vice president and associate general counsel at Sallie Mae Inc. "More than ever before, in-house counsel need to act as business partners who bring to the table the legal perspective on potential risks."

DOJ_NMG_0086090

In the post-Sarbanes-Oxley world, increased emphasis on compliance and corporate accountability has opened doors for lawyers to move among law firms, the government and business. And the professional challenges associated with meeting those requirements help ensure that corporate America will have a high-quality pool of attorneys to draw on for in-house leadership.

Steven Fabrizio notes that in-house counsel work "puts every skill you have as a lawyer to the test every day. You get to -- in fact, you have to -- see individual legal issues as part of a broader constellation of organizational issues in ways that outside lawyers just don't. For people who like to challenge themselves, that is an attractive environment in which to practice law."

Janice K. Mandel is a North Bethesda, Md.-based feature writer who frequently explores business trends. This article was commissioned by the Washington Metropolitan Area Corporate Counsel Association.

Study Finds Options Scandal Has Cost Companies Billions (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, October 25, 2006

A financial advisory firm has released an analysis estimating the stock-option backdating scandal has cost at least 152 companies nationwide about $10.3 billion.

A recent tally by institutional shareholder advisory firm, Glass Lewis in San Francisco, found that at least 152 companies have announced internal reviews, inquiries from the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department subpoenas related to their stock options granting practices.

Glass-Lewis said its internal analysis also showed that the backdating scandal has resulted in an unadjusted initial decline of $5.1 billion in the companies' market value, based on the initial drop in their stock prices. The analysis also pegged an additional $5.2 billion in additional pre-tax compensation costs to the companies.

The firm said that at least 44 executives and directors at 24 companies have been fired or resigned to date. Of the 152 companies nationwide, 42 have headquarters in Silicon Valley.

The analysis was included as an appendix in Glass-Lewis weekly ``Trend Alert'' advisory, dated Monday. The report said the information was current as of Oct. 19.

Many of the companies face federal investigations or internal reviews to determine whether they manipulated stock options by backdating, to give recipients a head start toward profits. Backdating can also lead to overstated company profits by failing to follow the proper accounting and tax rules.

In another development Tuesday, Electronics For Imaging, a developer of technology for high-speed printers and copiers, became the latest Silicon Valley company to announce an investigation into its stock options granting practices.

The Foster City company, also known as EFI, said Tuesday it has begun an independent review of its stock options granting practices, based on errors that management discovered in a recent review of historical grants.

EFI said it has voluntarily contacted the staff of the Securities and Exchange Commission to inform them of the ongoing review. The company disclosed the internal review when it released third quarter earnings Tuesday that were slightly below Wall Street's expectations.

The company also said two shareholder lawsuits, known as derivative lawsuits brought by investors on behalf of the corporation, were filed against EFI in Superior Court in San Mateo. The suits, filed Aug. 16 and Sept. 11, allege current and past officers and directors breached their duty to EFI by backdating certain grants of EFI's stock.

In a conference call with analysts Tuesday, EFI executives declined to comment when asked whether the two lawsuits preceded the company's review of its options granting practices, or visa versa.

In trading after the regular stock market closed, EFI's shares plunged 10.5 percent, falling $2.42 to $20.60. The company also announced a disappointing fourth quarter forecast. Both the third quarter miss and the disappointing forecast were due to some delays of printer products developed by its customers, executives said. EFI develops technology for professional super-wide format printers and copiers.

Throwing Back The Big Fish (NYT)

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Among the worst impressions the Securities and Exchange Commission could foster is that it pulls punches on delicate matters involving the rich, powerful and politically connected. Now two Senate committees are investigating whether the commission staff, rather than doggedly pursuing possible insider trading by the hedge fund Pequot Capital Management, held back when it came to taking the testimony of a prominent Wall Street player.

A commission investigator, Gary Aguirre, sought permission from higher-ups to question John Mack, who had briefly worked at Pequot, about his dealings with Pequot's founder, Arthur Samberg. As Walt Bogdanich and Gretchen Morgenson reported in The Times on Sunday, the tone of the inquiry shifted drastically once it came to light that Mr. Mack was being considered for the job of chief executive at Morgan Stanley.

DOJ_NMG_0086091

A supervisor then wrote about Mr. Mack's "juice" and "political clout" in internal e-mail messages. Mr. Aguirre was not permitted to interview Mr. Mack and ultimately was fired — immediately after receiving a merit-based pay raise.

The Senate Finance and Judiciary Committees are pursuing the question of how the Pequot investigation proceeded and why Mr. Aguirre was fired. So far, there is hardly enough information available to jump to conclusions about the conduct of Mr. Mack or Mr. Samberg. The commission has informed both men that it is not seeking enforcement actions against them. What is more important to the public is not the specifics of the case as much as how easily the commission staff can be influenced, whether by reputation, connections or future job prospects.

Senator Charles Grassley, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said in a statement that additional questions had arisen because of conflicting statements and documents that had come to light over the course of the Senate panel's inquiry. "My initial concerns haven't been put to rest by what I've learned so far," Mr. Grassley said. Neither have ours. A full airing is in everyone's interest.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Hastert Wants Fast Action On Foley (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Richard Clough

Chicago Tribune, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert testified Tuesday before an ethics subcommittee investigating conflicting accounts of his handling of complaints about a Republican congressman's suggestive messages to underage male congressional pages.

The scandal over former Florida Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit electronic communications with teenage pages and House leaders' handling of reports of inappropriate conduct have threatened political support for the speaker and reverberated through the mid-term election campaign.

The testimony from Hastert and two of his top aides—one testified on Monday and the other began his testimony immediately after Hastert—indicated the panel may be wrapping up its investigation. But it is unclear whether the Ethics Committee will issue its report before the Nov. 7 elections.

Speaking briefly to reporters from a prepared statement after his testimony, Hastert said he told the panel "that they needed to move quickly to get to the bottom of this issue, including who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it."

Hastert, who testified behind closed doors for just under three hours, added that he answered investigators' questions "to the best of my ability."

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said the speaker would not answer any questions about his testimony.

Republican officials said confidence in Hastert, an Illinois Republican, has ebbed as the controversy over Foley has continued. Foley resigned last month. Though the party establishment concluded weeks ago that an ouster of Hastert prior to the election would be counterproductive, Republican officials privately indicated it would be difficult for Hastert to hold on to his leadership post afterward, even if the party retains the majority.

At least one key Hastert aide recently explored potential new employment, according to a source familiar with the discussion.

The contradictions between the public accounts offered by Hastert and his staff, and those given by other congressional officials—who have spoken publicly about warnings that Foley was behaving inappropriately toward pages—is a major focus of the committee's probe.

Hastert has said he only learned of Foley's suggestive communications as they became public on Sept. 29.

But the House Republicans' national campaign chief, Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, who testified before the ethics committee earlier in the day, has said he warned Hastert of inappropriate conduct by Foley last spring.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) also has said he informed Hastert last spring but that the speaker assured him the matter had been "handled."

Hastert has said he does not recall either conversation.

His staff has put out a timeline of events indicating his office received a complaint during fall 2005 about e-mails Foley sent to a former Louisiana page asking the boy for a photo and what he would like for his birthday. But the office's timeline indicates that the matter was handled by Deputy Chief of Staff Mike Stokke and Counsel Ted van der Mied without informing Hastert or Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer.

DOJ_NMG_0086092

The aides said they referred the matter to then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, a Republican patronage appointee, who together with House Page Board Chairman John Shimkus (R-Ill.) met privately with Foley to ask him to cease contact with pages.

Another inconsistency to be resolved by investigators involves a claim by former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham that he warned Palmer of Foley's inappropriate behavior several years ago, indicating Hastert's office had an earlier warning.

In a written statement, Palmer denied the claim, saying, "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen." But he has otherwise kept publicly silent.

Another congressman has indicated he provided a warning even earlier. Retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who was chairman of the page board at the time, said he received a complaint of a suggestive e-mail from Foley to a former page during either 2000 or 2001. He said he referred the matter to Trandahl, the House Clerk.

Palmer testified more than six hours Monday. Stokke began testifying immediately after Hastert and refused to comment after emerging five hours later.

Hastert Urges Quick Action On Foley (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 25, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert urged ethics investigators to work quickly to unravel the congressional pages scandal Tuesday, testifying before them just after a GOP lawmaker whose recollections differ from his.

The investigation is focusing on which House leaders were told about sexually explicit messages sent by Rep. Mark Foley to former pages, when leaders were told and what was done in response. Hastert and some other Republicans have suggested revelations about the messages were timed to hurt the GOP in next month's elections.

Tuesday's appearances by Hastert, R-Ill., and House GOP campaign chair Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., could signal that the four-member ethics committee is nearing the end of its testimony-taking phase. Both men testified behind closed doors as committee rules require.

Hastert said afterward that he had told the committee "that they needed to move quickly to get to the bottom of this issue, including who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it."

Hastert has said he first learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a former Louisiana page — and sexually explicit e-mails to another page — just last month as the matter became public and the Florida Republican resigned.

But Hastert's appearance followed that of Reynolds, who has said he learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to the Louisiana teen last spring and discussed the matter with Hastert.

Hastert has said he didn't recall that conversation. He has also assured conservative activist Paul Weyrich that Majority Leader John Boehner was wrong when Boehner said he and Hastert discussed Foley's problems last spring.

Hastert said he answered investigators' questions "to the best of my ability."

The Foley scandal continues to weigh on GOP poll numbers just two weeks before midterm elections that could cost the Republicans control of Congress. The ethics committee's top Democrat, Howard Berman of California, would not say in a brief exchange whether the panel would release any findings before Election Day.

What has emerged to date is a pattern in which incidents involving Foley's inappropriate behavior with former pages have been handled by a few staff aides and lawmakers, rather than being referred to the ethics committee or the full membership of the bipartisan board overseeing the page program.

The ethics panel has heard from most of the key witnesses except Foley himself. Since he resigned in disgrace, the ethics committee no longer has jurisdiction. The FBI has opened an inquiry but it's not evident that Foley broke any laws.

One of Foley's attorneys, William Taylor of Washington, declined to comment on whether Foley had been asked to appear before the panel.

There is a separate question as to when Hastert's top aides first learned about Foley's behavior toward pages. An account issued by the speaker's office describes how "over friendly" e-mails to the Louisiana page were handled last fall. Other alleged incidents have since surfaced.

For instance, Foley's former chief of staff Kirk Fordham has testified that at least three years ago he asked top GOP aides, including Hastert's chief of staff Scott Palmer, to intervene to stop Foley's inappropriate behavior. Palmer testified for more than six hours Monday; his only public comment thus far is, "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Fordham has testified about an episode several years ago in which Foley is said to have been drunk and trying to enter the page dorm.

DOJ_NMG_0086093

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl and Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., learned in 2001 or 2002 of an episode in which Foley sent an ex-page inappropriate e-mails.

The four-member investigative team is also expected to hear this week from Hastert aide Ted Van Der Meid, who was the chief contact between the speaker's office and Trandahl about House operations, including the page program.

A question for the panel to determine is whether Van Der Meid and Palmer knew of the Foley problem prior to the single incident handled by Hastert's office last fall — and if so, how other incidents were handled.

Hastert, Reynolds Testify About GOP's Handling Of Foley Case (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) spent nearly three hours behind closed doors with the House ethics committee yesterday, describing what he knew about then-Rep. Mark Foley's relationships with young male pages and when he knew it.

The extraordinary appearance came just a few hours after the House Republican campaign chief, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), went before the committee to reiterate his contention that he personally told Hastert in the spring about suspicious e-mails that Foley had sent to a Louisiana teenager. Hastert has said he has no recollection of that conversation and did not learn of the Foley matter until it surfaced in late September.

"Since I had requested prompt action by the committee, I took the opportunity to thank them for moving expeditiously to look into this matter," Hastert said as he emerged from the committee's Capitol basement hearing room. "I answered every question they asked fully and to the best of my ability."

The twinning of Hastert's appearance with that of Reynolds surprised House Republican and Democratic leadership aides, and it only heightened the drama of the committee's deliberations.

Hastert is the first House speaker to testify before the committee since Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) discussed a much-criticized book deal in 1997. But in that case, committee members scheduled Gingrich's testimony at night, sparing him a daylight walk through the throng of reporters and camera crews camped outside the hearing room.

Also unlike Gingrich, Hastert had to appear immediately after the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, Reynolds, who had already challenged Hastert's version of events.

"I was happy to voluntarily do my part to assist in their inquiry and answer any questions they had," Reynolds said yesterday. "Earlier this month I had several opportunities to answer your questions and tell you what I know, but the committee has asked us not to share the substance of our discussion.

"I would only add that a full and fair investigation of the facts is vital to ensuring the continued integrity of this institution, which is why I strongly encourage any of my colleagues who have information that may be of relevance to bring it to the committee's attention at once."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) testified last week that he also told Hastert in the spring about concerns stemming from what House leaders have termed "over-friendly" e-mails from Foley to the former page from Louisiana.

Yesterday's drama was the strongest indication yet that the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, as the ethics committee is formally known, may be nearing the end of its investigative work. The committee interviewed Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, on Monday and could call up his deputy chief of staff, Mike Stokke, and his counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, this week.

But neither Democratic nor Republican leadership aides believe that a final report will be released ahead of the Nov. 7 elections, which have been roiled by the Foley matter.

The inquiry has been focused on the handling of Foley by House leaders. As far back as 2000, Foley's advances on former pages over the Internet had come to the attention of one congressman, Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.). Kolbe had brought the matter to then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, who reported to the speaker's office.

According to sources close to Trandahl, the former clerk repeatedly brought concerns about Foley to the congressman's chief of staff, Kirk Fordham. Fordham told the committee that when he was unable to stop Foley's advances, he asked Palmer to intervene in 2002 or 2003. Palmer has said Fordham's version of events did not happen.

Aides in the speaker's office have said that the matter did not come to their attention until the fall of 2005 and that it was handled without Hastert's involvement.

Hastert tried to deflect attention from GOP leaders yesterday, suggesting, as other Republicans have, that Democrats may have known about Foley's explicit instant messages but did not report them to authorities. Instead, Republicans have said, Democrats shopped them to the news media before the elections.

Hastert said he encouraged the committee "to continue to move forward to get to the bottom of this, including finding out who was aware and when they were aware of the sexually explicit instant messages that were created three years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0086094

Two former pages who were the sources of the instant messages have told The Washington Post that they did not come forward until after ABC News published the suspicious but not the sexual e-mails. A Republican former page said he wanted to expose Foley's more outrageous actions and had no intention of sparking a wider scandal. A Democratic former page, who supplied the messages to The Post, did so several days after ABC News obtained its messages.

Speaker Testifies In Foley Ethics Inquiry (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 — Speaker J. Dennis Hastert testified before the House ethics committee on Tuesday, answering questions under oath for more than two hours about when he first learned of complaints regarding Representative Mark Foley's behavior toward Congressional pages.

On this day, two weeks before Election Day, Mr. Hastert had planned to be hopscotching from district to district across America, working to preserve Republican control in the House and protect his own seat of power. Instead, he made his way from the speaker's suite to a dim corridor in the basement of the Capitol where the committee was meeting behind closed doors.

With his speakership on the line, even if the Republicans hold their majority, Mr. Hastert hoped to move beyond the scandal by voluntarily appearing before the bipartisan panel, which is working to determine if Republican leaders and their staff members ignored repeated warnings that Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, was making advances toward the high school students who work as messengers on Capitol Hill.

"I answered all the questions they asked to the best of my ability," Mr. Hastert said after exiting the hearing room. "I also said that they needed to move quickly to get to the bottom of this issue, including who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it."

Mr. Hastert has said that he was unaware of suspicions surrounding Mr. Foley until he resigned his seat late last month after an e-mail exchange with a former page became public. Other Republican leaders, though, say they discussed the matter with him last spring.

Mr. Hastert, illuminated by camera flashes and flanked by his lawyer, declined to answer questions as he returned to his office in the Capitol. While he praised the bipartisan panel "for expeditiously looking into this matter," he urged investigators to look into whether anyone in the House — Democrats included — had known about Mr. Foley's explicit online chats with former pages.

"They need to make sure that they ask all the questions of everybody," Mr. Hastert said.

His testimony followed a three-hour appearance by Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, Republican of New York, who leads the party's Congressional campaign committee. Mr. Reynolds, whose own re-election prospects are suddenly less certain, has taken out television advertisements to distance himself from the leadership in this controversy.

Mr. Reynolds has said that he informed Mr. Hastert this year of concerns regarding Mr. Foley. The speaker has said that he cannot recall any such conversations.

As he left the hearing room, Mr. Reynolds called for a "full and fair investigation of the facts." He, too, raised the notion that the inquiry should not be focused only on Republicans, calling on "any of my colleagues who have information that may be of relevance to bring it to the committee's attention at once."

Mr. Reynolds shared a particular link with Mr. Foley: each employed Kirk Fordham as his chief of staff. Mr. Fordham stepped down this month as a senior adviser to Mr. Reynolds after saying that he warned the speaker's office about Mr. Foley's troubling behavior at least three years ago, when he worked for Mr. Foley.

As the ethics inquiry stretched into a third week, one theory was that investigators were trying to determine whether Republican leaders had not acted on concerns about Mr. Foley in part to avoid contending with an open seat in his Florida district.

But the investigation revolves around the speaker's office, which oversees the page program.

In addition to Mr. Hastert, the panel is focusing on three advisers: Scott Palmer, the speaker's chief of staff, who testified Monday; Mike Stokke, the deputy chief of staff, who was questioned Tuesday night; and the chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, who is to testify Wednesday.

Mr. Hastert said this month that members of his staff should be fired "if there was a cover-up." Yet he has also said he has no reason to believe they acted improperly after learning of a friendly, but not sexually explicit, exchange between Mr. Foley and a former page from Louisiana.

Early Tuesday evening, Mr. Hastert walked out of the Capitol for one of the last times before Election Day. The longest-serving Republican speaker in United States history, he vows to extend his streak. He said that he was leaving Washington.

His destination? The campaign trail out West.

DOJ_NMG_0086095

Hastert, Reynolds Testify To Ethics Panel (HILL)

By Amy Sherman

The Hill, October 25, 2006

Two senior House leadership officials testified yesterday to the ethics committee about what they know about the Mark Foley page scandal.

Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the National Republican Campaign Committee chairman, and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), took time out from their busy campaign schedule to meet with the ethics panel during separate appearances.

Hastert sneaked into the ethics committee, avoiding public areas of the Capitol in an apparent move to avoid reporters. As he exited his offices, he utilized the seldom-used Strom Thurmond hallway, and an esoteric attic elevator transported him to the basement.

U.S. Capitol Police officers blocked the staircase between the crypt and the basement. Hastert's entourage, which included all three members of his communications staff, three Capitol police officers and his attorney, escorted him to the ethics committee hearing room.

Hastert attempted to dodge photographers by repeatedly moving behind his staff. The Speaker testified to the ethics committee for two-and-a-half hours.

He then delivered a brief statement: "I thank the committee for promptly acting ... I answered all questions asked to the best of my ability... [I hope they] move quickly to get to the bottom of who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it."

Reynolds testified for three hours and then read a short statement to the media: " … I was happy to voluntarily do my part to assist in the inquiry and to answer any questions they had. Earlier this month, I had several opportunities to answer your questions and tell you what I know. But the committee has asked us not to share the substance of our discussions."

Lawmaker's Influence In Land Deals Probed (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

U.S. prosecutors in Arizona have opened a preliminary investigation into whether Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) twice pressured landowners to buy a 480-acre parcel owned by his former business partner, a major backer of Renzi's political campaign, according to federal law enforcement sources.

The deal ultimately netted the business partner a $3 million profit, according to Arizona land records.

Renzi is the latest lawmaker whose land deals have come under scrutiny. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) have drawn criticism from political opponents for deals with home-state business partners that netted earned them hundreds of thousands of dollars or more.

The Arizona transaction has drawn the interest of the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI's Phoenix field office. Three law enforcement officials said both are investigating Renzi's involvement in two land deals -- one of which was not completed -- designed to put the 480 acres under federal protection from development in exchange for land more fit for commercial development.

One of the officials said the inquiry is at a preliminary stage. No subpoenas have been issued, and public developments are not likely before the Nov. 7 midterm elections, said the official, who along with the other two spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation has not been publicly announced.

A spokesman for U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton in Phoenix declined to confirm or deny the existence of an inquiry. Spokesmen for the Justice Department and the FBI in Washington also declined to comment.

The inquiry was revealed by two liberal Arizona blogs last weekend.

Grant Woods, a former Arizona attorney general who is Renzi's lawyer on the matter, said neither he nor Renzi has been contacted by law enforcement officials. He ascribed any inquiry to political gamesmanship by the two-term lawmaker's Democratic opponent, lawyer Ellen Simon.

"When I was attorney general, we dealt with this all the time in the last 30 days before an election, when candidates came to us with an accusation. We had to look at it, but it was designed to use politically," Woods said.

According to sources, the investigation is focusing on whether, in exchange for political contributions and business support, James Sandlin received special treatment from Renzi for a parcel of land that earned him a $3 million profit .

Sandlin bought into Renzi's real estate firm in 2001, then paid about $200,000 for half the business and, after he was elected to Congress, $1 million to $5 million for the rest.

Investigators want to know whether Renzi twice attempted to arrange deals for Sandlin, including once by proposing legislation, two sources with knowledge of the investigations said.

According to land developer Guy Inzalaco, Renzi was approached last year by an investment group that included Inzalaco and former Arizona governor Bruce Babbitt, a Democrat. The group sought legislation that would put environmentally sensitive watershed land under federal protection in exchange for opening other federal land to development.

Renzi said he would back the legislation if the Sandlin tract was included, Inzalaco said.

Woods said Renzi was trying to include a tract of land that environmentalists had been trying to preserve for years and did not know until later that his business partner owned it.

That fall, Renzi announced he would introduce the San Pedro River Land Exchange Act, a bill that would include the Sandlin property. Within days, Sandlin sold the tract to the Inzalaco-Babbitt group, turning a $3 million profit in three years. The land-swap legislation was never enacted.

Inzalaco said yesterday that he knew nothing of Sandlin's connections to Renzi.

Congressman From Arizona Is The Focus Of An Inquiry (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 — Federal authorities in Arizona have opened an inquiry into whether Representative Rick Renzi introduced legislation that benefited a military contractor that employs his father, law enforcement officials said Tuesday.

The officials said the inquiry was at an early stage and that no search warrants had been issued, suggesting that investigators had yet to determine whether there was a basis to open a formal investigation or empanel a grand jury.

Mr. Renzi, 48, a Republican who represents the First Congressional District, is a former insurance executive and real estate investor who was first elected in 2002. Almost from the start, he has been a target of citizen watchdog groups who have accused him of ethical laxity in office.

Law enforcement officials said that the most serious accusation involved Mr. Renzi's sponsorship of legislation in 2003 that appeared to indirectly benefit the ManTech International Corporation, a communications company based in Virginia that employs Mr. Renzi's father, Eugene, a retired Army general, as executive vice president.

Representative Renzi's office did not return a reporter's telephone calls on Tuesday to discuss the inquiry. In the past, Mr. Renzi has dismissed questions about whether his efforts aided ManTech, saying it did not need any assistance from him.

Mr. Renzi's legislation, which was signed into law in November 2003, exempted the Fort Huachuca Army base in Arizona from maintaining water levels in the nearby San Pedro River, as base officials had agreed in a 2002 deal with the United States Fish and Wildlife Service. Environmentalists criticized Mr. Renzi's measure, saying it threatened water levels in one of the last undammed rivers in the West and would benefit private contractors like ManTech that operated at the base and relied on its continued operation.

ManTech has more than $450 million in military contracts at the base, which include classified military work, as well as options for more than $1.1 billion in additional contracts, according to news reports about Mr. Renzi's legislation. Employees of the company were the largest contributors to Mr. Renzi's campaign in 2002 and the second-largest in 2004.

Groups like Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington have raised additional questions about Mr. Renzi, like his employment of a top staff member in December 2005 who continued to operate a fund-raising consulting business while she worked for Mr. Renzi. House ethics rules limit outside earned income to less than $25,000 a year.

Experts: Ban Won't Stop Online Gambling (AP)

By Adam Goldman, AP Business Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Gamblers may look over their shoulder now, but experts say a new Internet gambling ban won't keep bettors from ponying up, just turn them on to overseas payment services out of the law's reach.

"It has put a terrible scare into people," said I. Nelson Rose, who teaches gambling law at Whittier Law School. "But it won't by any means wipe out Internet gambling."

The fright swept through the $12 billion industry on the heels of the recent arrests of two gambling company executives and a new law President Bush signed Oct. 13 that seeks to ban most online gambling and criminalizes funds transfers.

The law has wiped out billions of dollars in shareholder value of British companies, leaving the industry's future in doubt as U.S. lawmakers initially trumpeted they had found a way to halt bets coming from America. But serious questions remain about whether the legislation can be effective in stopping U.S. residents from playing poker or betting on sports.

DOJ_NMG_0086097

The "Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act" goes after the money, not the millions of players, which would be nearly impossible to enforce. It will essentially try to choke off the way Americans fund their gambling habits, hoping to prevent the transfer of dollars to the popular Internet sites.

It's also widely understood that the law has online poker in its gun sights, identifying it as a game of chance - something the poker companies dispute. They believe poker is a game of skill and therefore not subject to the new rules.

But they're fearful nonetheless.

"Their mission is to kill the funding of online poker, and that's what this law does," said Mike Sexton, who hosts the popular World Poker Tour and has won millions as a professional player.

Buy AP Photo Reprints

The new law comes amid an explosion in online gambling, fueled by the Texas Hold 'em craze and widespread access to the Internet. In addition, dozens of Web sites have sprouted up that allow any gambler with a credit card to bet on any sport they choose, for any amount of money they want.

Industry experts say there are an estimated 2,000 Internet sites that take bets for sports and poker. American players have fueled Internet gambling, supplying $6 billion of the $12 billion in revenues generated annually.

"The time has been one of rapid growth," said Sebastian Sinclair, president of Christiansen Capital Advisors, a gambling consultant. "This industry was well on its way to becoming mainstream in a great part of the world. Capital was tripping over itself to fund these companies."

The new law gives the U.S. Treasury and Federal Reserve, along with the Attorney General, 270 days to establish policies and procedures.

"The regulations are clearly going to prevent banks from doing electronic fund transfers to gambling sites, but that is no big deal," Rose said.

Clamping down on the banks won't serve as a panacea, Rose said. In some cases, banks simply move the money to payment processors, known as e-wallets. Non-U.S. payment processors such as the widely used Neteller then transfer the money to the Internet gambling sites.

The U.S. government has no authority over processors like Neteller that are operating legally.

Anthony Cabot, a well-known gambling lawyer in Las Vegas, thinks language used in the bill provides a loophole for the payment processors and the U.S. banks that want to be free to do business with them.

"Unless you have some fairly Draconian measures ... the likelihood of stopping payment to them is small," Cabot said.

Much damage has already been done to the offshore sports betting industry without the looming regulations.

British BetOnSports PLC folded after its chief executive was arrested in July by U.S. authorities. David Carruthers faces 22 counts of fraud and racketeering charges and remains under house arrest in the St. Louis area.

London-based Sportingbet's chairman was detained last month in New York on a state fugitive warrant charging him with illegal online gambling. He was eventually freed.

Both arrests sounded serious alarm bells for those running sports wagering sites that take American bets.

The new legislation has already had a dramatic effect. It supposedly clarifies the 1961 Wire Act, explicitly outlawing Internet gambling, including online poker.

It creates new criminal penalties, which have rattled investors and executives - although Rose said it doesn't expand the act, and there's no indication the Justice Department is about to launch a huge campaign to enforce the law.

Still, the biggest publicly traded names in Internet gambling on the London Stock Exchange and AIM, the exchange's global market for growing companies, could not afford to flout American law. When news broke earlier this month that Congress has passed the bill, Internet gambling companies traded on those exchanges lost a combined $7 billion in market capitalization.

PartyGaming PLC, once the envy of online gambling with its more than $8 billion IPO in 2005, is now trying to figure out how to save its business model. It runs what was once the world's biggest poker site, PartyPoker, and has said it will no longer take payments from the U.S., eliminating nearly 80 percent of its revenue and sending its stock plunging.

Another poker company, 888 Holdings PLC, also said it would stop taking U.S. bets, ensuring its profits will fall dramatically.

Sportingbet and Leisure & Gaming both sold their U.S. operations for a dollar. Sportingbet said its exit from the U.S. market cost it nearly $400 million.

The bleeding didn't stop there. Neteller and FireOne, which owns e-wallet FirePay, also saw their stock price plummet. On Oct. 2, FirePay announced it had stopped doing business with sites that might take U.S. bets, including PokerStars. The decision forced PokerStars, now the biggest poker site in the world and a registered business in Costa Rica, to rely on Neteller to take money for bets headed to its site.

DOJ_NMG_0086098

"There are privately owned operators that will continue to take play as long as they have payment processors that will work with them," said Sue Schneider, publisher of the online gaming magazine Interactive Gaming News. "I think the big question is whether the volume remains the same. But I don't think any of this means there will be less people playing on the Internet."

Neteller has said it is evaluating the law. If Neteller abandons PokerStars and other sites, their bottom lines, no doubt, will be hit hard.

But so far, Neteller's decision to work with PokerStars has amounted to good news for sites not afraid of scorning U.S. law.

Experts say while the new law has forced the public companies out of U.S. market, it has left poker players and bettors gravitating toward private companies.

Both PokerStars and FullTilt have already seen traffic on their Web sites surge, taking advantage of any short-term gain now that some of the competition has been sidelined. On its Web site recently, FullTilt boasted: "We're Here to Stay!" and offered bonuses to sign up.

This isn't the first time the industry has faced a serious setback. In 2001, Visa and MasterCard and other merchant banks stopped allowing money to be sent to Internet gambling sites.

Like then, Sinclair thinks Internet gambling will recover again. It's simply too lucrative.

"There will be a big hit to the industry," Sinclair said. "A big hit. But it's not going to be long term, it's transitory until somebody finds a solution to whatever roadblocks are put in their way. There's too much money for it to go away."

Ex-Refco CFO Accused Of Defrauding Investors Of $1 Billion (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, October 25, 2006

The former chief financial officer of Refco Inc., one of the world's biggest commodities brokerages, was accused in an indictment Tuesday of defrauding investors in a scheme that resulted in losses of more than $1 billion.

An indictment in U.S. District Court in New York charged Robert C. Trosten with conspiracy, securities fraud, false filings and wire fraud. It also added new charges to the case against Refco's former chief executive officer, Phillip R. Bennett.

Prosecutors said Trosten assisted Bennett in hiding hundreds of millions of dollars of debt owed to Refco by a company controlled by Bennett.

The superseding indictment also added new charges against Bennett concerning fraud against holders of Refco's bonds.

Trosten, 37, of Sarasota, Fla., was scheduled to make his initial court appearance Wednesday. Bennett, 57, of Gladstone, N.J., is free on $50 million bail and subject to electronic monitoring.

A lawyer for Bennett, Gary P. Naftalis, said: "Mr. Bennett reaffirms that he is not guilty of any of the government's charges and looks forward to his day in court."

A lawyer for Trosten did not immediately return a telephone message seeking comment Tuesday.

If convicted, Trosten could face up to 45 years in prison while Bennett could face up to 85 years in prison.

Bennett was already charged with conspiring to commit securities fraud for hiding from auditors and investors losses that Refco and its customers had incurred in the financial markets.

The indictment charged Trosten and Bennett with conspiring to defraud Refco's auditors and investors from the mid-1990s to October 2005, when Refco announced it had discovered it was owed $430 million by a company controlled by Bennett.

The announcement caused the price of Refco stock to plunge. The company, which went public in August 2005, was later delisted by the New York Stock Exchange, and it and many of its subsidiaries filed for bankruptcy a week after the announcement.

According to the indictment, Refco sustained hundreds of millions of dollars in losses through its own and its customers' trading in the mid-1990s, when Refco was privately held and controlled in part by Bennett.

To hide the losses, Bennett transferred them to appear as a debt owed to Refco by a company controlled by Bennett, prosecutors said.

The indictment accused Bennett and Trosten of manipulating the company's financial records from 1999 through 2005 to make it appear as if the debt owed to Refco was owed by a Refco customer.

The indictment charged Trosten with assisting Bennett in carrying out the year-end transactions, including defrauding the purchasers of $600 million in notes issued by Refco in 2004 by hiding from the purchasers the existence and size of the debt owed to Refco.

It also charges Bennett with defrauding the purchasers of $583 million of Refco's common stock when the company went public.

The indictment alleged that Bennett caused Trosten to receive a payment of about $48 million in August 2004, when the leveraged buyout transaction was being handled.

DOJ_NMG_0086099

Drug Raid Yields Los Alamos Documents (SFC/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 25, 2006

(10-25) 03:06 PDT WASHINGTON (AP) --

A drug bust at a trailer park in New Mexico turned up what appeared to be classified documents taken from the Los Alamos nuclear weapons laboratory, authorities said Tuesday.

Local police found the documents while arresting a man suspected of domestic violence and dealing methamphetamine from his mobile home, said Sgt. Chuck Ney of the Los Alamos, N.M., Municipal Police Department. The documents were discovered during a search of the man's records for evidence of his drug business, Ney said.

Police alerted the FBI to the secret documents, which agents traced back to a woman linked to the drug dealer, officials said. The woman is a contract employee at Los Alamos National Laboratory, according to an FBI official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the case.

The official would not describe the documents except to say that they appeared to contain classified material and were stored on a computer file.

FBI special agent Bill Elwell in Albuquerque, N.M., confirmed that a search warrant was executed on Friday night, but he refused to discuss details.

"We do have an investigation with regard to the matter, but our standard is we do not discuss pending investigations," Elwell said.

A spokesman for the Los Alamos National Laboratory, in Los Alamos, N.M., declined to comment.

Los Alamos has a history of high-profile security problems in the past decade, with the most notable the case of nuclear scientist Wen Ho Lee. After years of accusations, Lee pleaded guilty in a plea bargain to one count of mishandling nuclear secrets at the lab.

In 2004, the lab was essentially shut down after an inventory showed that two computer disks containing nuclear secrets were missing. A year later the lab concluded that it was just a mistake and the disks never existed.

But the incident highlighted sloppy inventory control and security failures at the nuclear weapons lab. And the Energy Department began moving toward a five-year program to create a so-called diskless environment at Los Alamos to prevent any classified material being carried outside the lab.

Even though Los Alamos is now under new management, Danielle Brian, executive director of the watchdog group Project on Government Oversight, said the lab has not done much to clean up its act.

"Los Alamos has always seemed to be rewarded for its screw-ups," Brian said. "We're waiting with bated breath to see if anything has changed."

The idea that police found classified documents at a home where a drug sting was being conducted is disturbing, she said.

"The problem is when you actually have those materials that are supposed to be protected inside the lab and you find them outside the lab in the hands of criminals — that should worry everybody," Brian said.

The FBI and the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque were "evaluating the information obtained as a result of the search warrant," Elwell said.

The federal charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material is a misdemeanor that carries a maximum sentence of a year in prison and up to a $100,000 fine.

___

Associated Press writers Seth Borenstein in Washington and Sue Holmes in Albuquerque contributed to this report.

Safavian Argues For No Jail Time In Abramoff Case (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Utah congressman and a former aide to a Virginia congressman have written letters in support of former Bush administration official David Safavian, who is trying to avoid jail time in the Jack Abramoff investigation.

Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was convicted in June of lying to investigators about his dealings with Abramoff.

Prosecutors are seeking a three-year prison sentence in Safavian's case, which was the first guilty verdict by a jury in the corruption probe surrounding Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist who pleaded guilty in January in a conspiracy to corrupt public officials.

DOJ_NMG_0086100

In seeking a sentence of probation or house arrest, Safavian's attorneys submitted letters from supporters including a church leader, a former congressional aide and Safavian's former boss, Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah.

"When David was my chief of staff, he worked tirelessly in my Washington office. He would come in early, stay late, and devote his undivided attention to the needs of the people in Utah's 3rd Congressional District," Cannon wrote.

The letters are sealed but Safavian's attorney referred to excerpts of some in a court filing Monday.

The list of letter-writers also included Melissa Wojciak, former staff director for Rep. Tom Davis, R-11th, at the Government Reform Committee. Wojciak wrote that Safavian "always ensured that he was responsible in managing the taxpayer's dollars."

Safavian is scheduled to be sentenced Friday. Prosecutors argue that letting him off without prison time would be a "miscarriage of justice."

E-mails presented at trial showed how Abramoff showered Safavian with trips and other perks while badgering him for information about GSA-controlled property the lobbyist wanted - including the historic Old Post Office in downtown Washington.

Defense attorneys wrote that Safavian did not harm anybody and committed no fraudulent acts. They have presented a list of past cases they believe are comparable.

That list includes: Henry Cisneros, the Clinton administration housing secretary who paid a $10,000 fine for lying to the FBI about payments to an ex-mistress; former Rep. Chris Perkins, D-Ky., who was sentenced to three months in a halfway house in 2000 for lying to a probation officer about his income; and businesswoman Martha Stewart, who received five months in prison for lying to investigators about a stock sale.

Cannon Writes Judge On Behalf Of Convicted Former Chief Of Staff (SLT)

By Robert Gehrke, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Chris Cannon is asking a judge for leniency for his former chief of staff, David Safavian, who was convicted with obstructing a federal investigation into his ties with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"When David was my chief of staff, he worked tirelessly in my Washington office. He would come in early, stay late, and devote his undivided attention to the needs of the people in Utah's Third Congressional District," Cannon wrote in a letter quoted by Safavian's attorneys in court filings.

Prosecutors have asked Judge Paul Friedman to sentence Safavian to as many as 37 months in prison. He was convicted of four

Read Cannon's letter regarding Safavian counts of obstruction of justice and false statements for lying to investigators about his relationship with Abramoff.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, argued that Safavian has been a committed public servant and family man, that his career has been ruined by his arrest and conviction, and asked the judge to impose probation or home confinement.

"The government's caricature cannot detract from the fact that, as acquaintances, supervisors, and colleagues attest, Mr. Safavian's history and character reflects dedication to his family, his community, and country," Van Gelder said.

Prosecutors said it would be a "miscarriage of justice" not to impose prison time.

Advertisement

Letters vouching for Safavian's character also were written by Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C.; Clay Johnson, deputy director at the White House budget office; and a police officer at the Maryland precinct where Safavian did volunteer work.

Safavian was convicted of misleading ethics officials, Senate investigators and the Government Service Administration inspector general about a lavish golf trip he and others took to Scotland with Abramoff and others in 2002, when Safavian was chief of staff at the GSA, which manages federal property.

E-mails used as evidence during the trial show that Abramoff provided numerous gifts and perks to Safavian who provided Abramoff information about two business deals the lobbyist was trying to make through the GSA.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to five felony counts of fraud and corruption and has been sentenced to nearly 6 years in prison. He has been cooperating in the ongoing Justice Department investigation, but is expected to report to prison in Maryland next month.

Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who also went on the trip to Scotland, also has pleaded guilty to corruption charges. Also pleading guilty was Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff and an Abramoff colleague who was on the trip.

Safavian got his start in lobbying alongside Abramoff before becoming a partner in Janus-Merritt Strategies. He took a leave of absence to become Cannon's chief of staff in 2001, leaving open the door to return to his firm.

During Safavian's tenure with Cannon, the congressman took positions that helped several of Safavian's former clients, including the online gaming industry, telecommunications firms, a media giant and an Indian tribe. Cannon's spokesman has said the two simply agreed on those issues.

E-mails introduced during Safavian's trial indicate that Abramoff was encouraging Safavian to return to lobbying in 2002 and he was in discussions with Abramoff's firm, Greenberg Traurig.

But the firm didn't immediately hire Safavian, and he was offered the position of chief of staff at GSA, hinting he could rejoin Abramoff later. Eventually, Safavian was appointed the top procurement officer at the White House budget office, where he served until just before his arrest late last year.

Suburban Mayor Enters Plea In Bribes Case (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Reports

Chicago Tribune, October 25, 2006

Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a five-count federal indictment charging him with taking more than $420,000 in kickbacks for steering local business owners to buy insurance from a longtime friend and his son.

Blase, Niles' mayor for 45 years, has been free on bail since he was arrested on his 78th birthday in June.

The charges allege that the kickback scheme originated more than 30 years ago with Blase's close friend, Ralph Weiner, who ran an insurance agency bearing his name. After Weiner's death in 2005, his son, Steven Weiner, continued to deliver the monthly bribes to Blase, prosecutors charged.

Blase, an attorney, is accused of using more than $421,000 in bribes to pay the salaries of two employees of his law firm.

Lawyers for Steven Weiner and Paul Zdon, a former employee of the Weiner insurance agency, have said both are cooperating with the FBI and expect to plead guilty to mail-fraud charges. They are scheduled to be arraigned next month.

Niles Mayor Pleads Not Guilty (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 25, 2006

CHICAGO - Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a federal indictment accusing him of pocketing more than $420,000 in a decades-long kickback scheme.

Blase is charged with coercing businesses in his northwest suburb to buy insurance from an agency operated by his friend. That friend, in return, would then pay Blase kickbacks, prosecutors allege.

He entered the not guilty plea to five counts of mail fraud before U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael T. Mason, the Chicago Sun-Times and Chicago Tribune reported on their Web sites.

Blase, who also is an attorney, has been mayor of Niles for 45 years. He is accused of using the kickbacks to pay the salaries of two employees of his law firm.

Two other men with ties to the insurance agency also were indicted.

The agency's president, Steven Weiner, and employee Paul Zdon are both cooperating with authorities and are expected to plead guilty, prosecutors and defense attorneys have said. Blase and Weiner's now-deceased father, Ralph, concocted the scheme more than 30 years ago, authorities allege.

Verdicts In Murder Of Times Reporter (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 — The second of two men accused of killing a retired reporter for The New York Times in January was convicted on Tuesday of murder, robbery and other charges that could put him in prison for the rest of his life.

The defendant, Percey Jordan Jr., 42, was found guilty in the slaying of the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, 63, who was beaten and robbed near his home in Washington on the night of Jan. 6 and died two days later. An inquiry found that the medical care Mr. Rosenbaum received had been bungled from the beginning.

Mr. Jordan faces at least 30 years in prison and a maximum of life without the possibility of parole when he is sentenced by Judge Erik P. Christian in District of Columbia Superior Court on Jan. 12.

Jurors deliberated for a day before finding Mr. Jordan guilty of first-degree murder or premeditated murder during commission of a felony; second-degree murder; robbery; conspiracy; and credit-card fraud.

The second defendant was Mr. Jordan's cousin Michael C. Hamlin, 24, who pleaded guilty on Sept. 20 to second-degree murder, robbery and conspiracy to commit robbery and testified against Mr. Jordan. Mr. Hamlin faces up to 60 years in prison when he is sentenced, on Dec. 19.

DOJ_NMG_0086102

"This isn't a happy day, really," said the victim's brother, Marcus Rosenbaum of Washington. He described the mood of the Rosenbaum family as one of relief because "justice has been served."

Mr. Hamlin testified that he stole Mr. Rosenbaum's wallet but that his cousin struck the victim over the head with a pipe. The pair divided Mr. Rosenbaum's money and used the credit cards at various stores, where surveillance cameras captured the men's images.

Mr. Rosenbaum was found lying semiconscious on a sidewalk about 9:20 p.m., having gone for a walk after dinner. Because he had been vomiting and smelled of alcohol, police officers, firefighters and ambulance workers assumed that he was drunk, according to a later inquiry by the office of the district inspector general/

The ambulance was late in reaching Mr. Rosenbaum because the driver became lost. Then, thinking that they were dealing with a drunk instead of a man with a brain trauma, the ambulance crew took Mr. Rosenbaum to Howard University Hospital instead of to a much closer hospital. One reason the Howard hospital was chosen was that it was closer to the driver's home, the inquiry found.

At Howard, Mr. Rosenbaum lay unattended to on a stretcher because doctors and nurses were slow to realize that he was gravely injured, the inquiry determined. Mr. Rosenbaum's death was attributed to blunt force trauma to his head, neck and body.

Mr. Hamlin turned himself in after seeing the surveillance-camera images of himself on television. His lawyers said he soon began to cooperate with investigators.

Mayor Anthony A. Williams and Howard University Hospital officials promised to tighten training and discipline at the agencies involved.

D.C. Man Guilty In Reporter's Slaying (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

The man accused of killing a 63-year-old journalist in a robbery this year in Northwest Washington was convicted yesterday of first-degree murder and now faces the prospect of a life sentence without the possibility of release.

Percey Jordan, a 42-year-old from Southeast Washington, had decided to take his case to trial even after his cousin, Michael Hamlin, pleaded guilty last month and admitted his role in the Jan. 6 robbery.

It was a gamble for Jordan, who knew his cousin would be testifying against him and who rejected a final plea offer from the government on the eve of his trial in D.C. Superior Court. Now Hamlin, 24, is more likely to walk out of prison one day, having pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, which has no mandatory minimum sentence.

After three days of testimony, the jury began reviewing the case Monday. Jurors deliberated about six hours before finding Jordan guilty in the death of David E. Rosenbaum, a longtime reporter and editor for the New York Times.

Struck in the head with a heavy plastic pipe, Rosenbaum suffered massive hemorrhaging and died two days later.

As the foreman read the verdict, Rosenbaum's daughter, Dorothy, wept, and her brother Dan put his arm over her shoulder.

"We obviously believe that justice has been served," Rosenbaum's brother Marcus said outside the courthouse. But he said the verdict was anything but a happy moment. "It's a lot of wasted life," he said -- his brother's, Hamlin's and Jordan's.

The crime stunned many city residents, particularly those who live in neighborhoods thought to be safe, such as the one where Rosenbaum was robbed and where such random and violent crime is rare. But the surprise and sadness gave way to outrage, as grievous mistakes were uncovered in Rosenbaum's emergency medical care.

During testimony last week, his family listened as prosecutors described Rosenbaum's final minutes "of meaningful life" -- the walk he took to try to shake the hiccups, the fleeting sensation that something was wrong and then the sudden attack shortly after 9 p.m. in the 3800 block of Gramercy Street NW.

The jurors heard the words of Rosenbaum's widow, Virginia, who not long before her death from cancer testified before a grand jury to recount how her husband went out and never came back.

Then they heard from Hamlin, who testified for more than three hours, explaining how he and his cousin ended up attacking the man on the dark, quiet street.

And on the final day of testimony, the jury heard from a drinking buddy of Jordan's who said Jordan told him about the robbery. He decided to testify against Jordan in hopes of a reward.

Defense attorney Michael Starr attacked the testimony of both men.

Hamlin, he said, turned himself in because police were on to him. Hamlin needed to help himself, but his initial lies did not fool the detectives, Starr said. Only when Hamlin implicated Jordan and explained that his cousin had struck Rosenbaum with a pipe did the detectives believe him, Starr said. That's why Hamlin stuck with that account, Starr said, calling it a lie.

The drinking buddy was similarly opportunistic, Starr argued.

But one juror said afterward that the jury largely believed Hamlin and was convinced that Jordan played a role in the robbery.

The prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines, introduced a trove of security camera surveillance footage that appeared to corroborate Hamlin's account.

The tapes showed Jordan and Hamlin soon after the robbery at an Exxon station on Connecticut Avenue NW, filling up Hamlin's Cadillac and using a credit card stolen from Rosenbaum. The tapes later showed them shopping in a CVS and a Safeway not far from their home in Southeast Washington, again using credit cards from Rosenbaum and from a woman they robbed in Silver Spring the same night.

The footage led to swift charges. About an hour after a clip showing Hamlin was broadcast on local newscasts -- with Hamlin's name visible on the work uniform he was wearing -- he went to police. He was interrogated and eventually arrested. A day later, Jordan went to police and was arrested.

Such quick detective work usually would have been lauded, but in this case the response by the D.C. Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department, D.C. police and Howard University Hospital was roundly condemned.

At the scene, Rosenbaum was misdiagnosed as an intoxicated man, leading dispatchers to send a basic care ambulance from a distant part of the city rather than an advanced care unit that was much closer. Other lapses followed, detailed in a blistering report issued by the D.C. inspector general's office.

Hamlin is to be sentenced Dec. 19. Voluntary sentencing guidelines suggest a 14- to 35-year sentence. Jordan will be sentenced Jan. 12.

Pieces Of Art Collection Were Someone Else's (NYT)

By Dan Barry

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

If it was the desire of the man who called himself William M. V. Kingsland to be remembered in the salons of New York long after he died, to be the subject of the kind of scandal-whiffed conversation he once so enjoyed, to be the one having the last loud laugh, then the man who called himself William M. V. Kingsland has succeeded.

He died in early spring in his one-bedroom apartment on the Upper East Side, surrounded by the hundreds of portraits, paintings and miniatures he admired mostly in solitude, because he allowed very few past the front door. Since then, though, his self-portrait has been peeling slowly from the canvas.

This summer his longtime friends learned that his real name was not William M. V. Kingsland — with the V for Vanderbilt — but Melvyn Kohn. Then, last week, they learned that several pieces in his private art collection were likewise of clouded provenance.

That is: pilfered; stolen; hot.

The Giacometti bust? Stolen from a Midtown gallery in 1967. The John Singleton Copley portrait of the second Earl of Bessborough? Stolen from Harvard in 1971.

The Odilon Redon? The Kurt Schwitters? The two Fairfield Porters?

Stolen, stolen, stolen and stolen.

Now the Federal Bureau of Investigation is digging into the nature of his collection, two auction houses are cleaning up the artistic mess he left behind, and the Office of the Public Administrator for Manhattan is trying to sort out the increasingly muddy Estate of William M. V. Kingsland — né Melvyn Kohn.

A central question for everyone, of course, is Mr. Kingsland's role in all this. Was he a thief, a fence, or just an innocent collector of pretty things that happened to be hot?

Mr. Kingsland died without a will, at the age of either 58 or 62. He often intimated that his blood ran blue, which would explain why he was able to lead gossip-laden walking tours of New York architecture and society. But friends could find no family to claim him, blue-blooded or otherwise.

So they arranged for his burial in April at a historic Manhattan cemetery whose soil is considered a privilege to share, perhaps assuming that this would be the last they heard of dear Will, other than in swapped stories about his slightly shabby attire, his frugal ways, his cutting wit — and his many odd jobs, from genealogical researcher to antique store employee to author of auction columns for an art magazine.

The news of his true name spurred the realization that few knew him well enough to have ever been in his small apartment at 245 East 72nd Street, where artwork covered nearly every inch of shelf and wall. In this room, American; in that room, European; everywhere, eclectic.

DOJ_NMG_0086104

Because no will was found, the public administrator took control of the estate, which included the unkempt, very dusty apartment filled with artwork. “An Aladdin’s cave,” Colin Stair, of the Stair Galleries in Hudson, N.Y., recalled. “Chockablock with interesting treasures.”

The public administrator chose Christie’s to handle the sale of dozens of pieces, including the Giacometti, and the Stair Galleries to handle hundreds of lesser pieces, including many watercolor-on-ivory miniature portraits.

Last month, experts at Christie’s discovered problems of provenance with four paintings: two by the 20th-century American painter Fairfield Porter, and one each by the French painter Odilon Redon and the German collagist Kurt Schwitters. All were reported stolen in the mid-1960’s, officials say.

The auction house also forwarded a photograph of the Giacometti bust to the Alberto Giacometti Foundation in Switzerland. The good news: the bust was indeed an authentic and valuable Giacometti. The bad news: it was stolen nearly 40 years ago.

Christie’s immediately notified an art specialist at the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Then, a couple of weeks ago, Mr. Stair conducted an auction that included hundreds of items from the Kingsland estate. Among the patrons was Alex Acevedo, the owner of the Alexander Gallery on the Upper East Side, who often saw Kingsland at auctions.

Mr. Acevedo spotted a diamond in the rough, a 1790 portrait by John Singleton Copley of the second Earl of Bessborough, and won the bid at $85,000. He said he estimated that he could make a $400,000 profit on this gem, and recalled thinking, “This is a good score.”

But the more he checked into the painting’s provenance, he said, the more the arrows pointed to Harvard as the owner. He called an F.B.I. agent he knew — the art specialist — and laid out his suspicions. As the conversation wound down, he said, the agent asked, By the way, what was the estate’s name?

“I said, ‘Kingsland,’ ” Mr. Acevedo said. “And he goes: ‘Uh-oh.’ ”

The two auction houses have canceled any sales related to the Kingsland estate. The Harvard Crimson newspaper has reported that the university is working with the authorities to secure the safe return of the Copley and another portrait reported stolen from Harvard in 1968. And the public administrator, Ethel J. Griffin, is treading carefully as she sorts out this vexing Kingsland matter.

“We don’t want to destroy the man’s reputation if in fact he acquired these paintings from someone else,” she said. Still, she added, “This is one for the books.”

Ms. Griffin’s office is also handling the auction of Mr. Kingsland’s apartment, which is being offered in “as is” condition. This includes the hundreds of nails hammered into the bare walls, marking where the previous occupant once displayed his precious pieces of art.

FBI Wants Help Finding Stolen Power Line Maintenance Trucks (AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. -- Thieves in Yuma County stole three specialized power line maintenance trucks and more than $100,000 in tools used to work on major power lines over the weekend, and the FBI is seeking the public's help tracking down the thieves.

The trucks and tools were stolen from the U.S. Department of Energy's Gila Substation Maintenance Facility sometime between 5 p.m. Friday and 3 p.m. Saturday, the FBI said. The tools and equipment are used to maintain the high-voltage power grid and specialized knowledge is needed to use them.

There is no known terror threat from the theft and young people are known to hang out in the area, said FBI Special Agent Deb McCarley. However, the specialized nature of the equipment and its possible use is raising concerns.

"We don't believe there is any threat to our infrastructure," McCarley said. "However, you don't know that until you find out who did this and why."

The FBI and the Yuma County Sheriff's Office are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the persons responsible.

The sheriff's office found one truck burned in the desert near the confluence of the Colorado and Gila Rivers. The other two trucks were a red 2005 Chevrolet 3500 with U.S. government license plate G63-1300B and a gray 2006 Chevrolet 2500 with license plate G63-2847B.

U.S. Launches Probes Into Fraud Cases (MERCN)

By Josh Funk

The San Jose Mercury News, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086105

OMAHA, Neb. - The government has launched investigations into fraud cases in which computer hackers apparently manipulated client accounts at two of the nation's largest electronic brokerages, stealing millions of dollars.

Officials at TD Ameritrade Holding Corp. said Tuesday that the fraud cost the company about $4 million in the July-September quarter. Last week, E-Trade Financial Corp. said the company lost about $18 million in a similar scheme during its third quarter.

Both companies reimbursed customers for their losses.

Ameritrade's chief operating officer, Randy MacDonald, said the fraud that his company experienced during the quarter was part of an industrywide problem and that the company was working with the FBI and other law enforcement agencies.

Ameritrade officials said the problem largely occurred overseas when clients were using either wireless networks or public computers infected with spyware, and user IDs and passwords were stolen.

"We're spending a lot of time educating our clients about the need to keep their information secure," MacDonald said. "And we're working with software vendors to develop new techniques for preventing this from even happening at their keyboard level."

Officials at Omaha-based Ameritrade and E-Trade, which is headquartered in New York, said that while hackers manipulated individual accounts, their own computer systems remained secure.

E-Trade Chief Executive Mitchell Caplan told analysts during a conference call last week that the fraud his company saw appeared to be concentrated in eastern Europe and Thailand, according to a transcript provided by Thomson Financial's StreetEvents.

"We believe that we've made a significant number of operational changes and technology changes," Caplan said during the call. "We've seen that level of fraud in the last three weeks or so reduced to almost zero as a result of the changes we're making."

Both E-Trade and Ameritrade have insurance that may cover some of their fraud losses. They reimbursed their clients because both companies offer their clients asset protection guarantees.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, like the FBI, is investigating hacking fraud throughout the online brokerage industry.

SEC spokesman John Heine in Washington declined comment Tuesday on the Ameritrade and E-Trade cases.

Officials of the SEC and other law enforcement agencies, along with representatives of online brokerage firms, were meeting Wednesday to discuss the issue, said John Reed Stark, head of the SEC's Office of Internet Enforcement.

"We've seen an increase in the number of intrusions," Stark said. "These innovative frauds often involve an intricate web of participants that are not only committing securities fraud but are also committing identity theft and hacking as well."

Ameritrade's chief executive, Joe Moglia, said he thinks this latest rash of fraud and identity theft is under control, but it's a problem the industry and society will always have to contend with.

"From the beginning of time, there's always been someone trying to take advantage of someone else," Moglia said.

Financial Firms Join Data-Security Program (WSJ)

By Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

A group of U.S. banks and insurance companies concerned about data security are expanding a program for assessing the security of online banking and related financial services.

The Financial Services Roundtable, an industry trade group, said that five banks have joined an effort to standardize how they judge the security of companies that provide online services. The new participants are Bear Stearns Cos., Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Regions Financial Corp., Wachovia Corp. and Morgan Stanley.

The program, called the Shared Assessment Program, is part of a broader effort by large businesses to pressure software and online services companies to improve security of their products.

The program sets common guidelines that suppliers will need to follow before a participating bank or insurance company will do business with the supplier, which include telecommunications companies and data-service hosting companies.

Some of the guidelines include how often data is backed up and details on other protections, including physical security at companies' data centers.

The effort formalizes procedures that have historically been handled differently by each financial institution, an approach that the members say is costly and isn't as effective in assuring a high level of security. The program was started in February by the Bank of America Corp., Bank of New York Co., Citigroup Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., U.S. Bancorp, and Wells Fargo & Co.

Service providers participating in the program include Equifax Inc., Yodlee Inc., First Data Corp., Iron Mountain Inc., SunGard Data Systems Inc., Verisign Inc.

The financial institutions' effort is part of a broader power shift between large businesses and their IT suppliers. A rash of viruses, worms and other Internet-borne attacks in recent years raised awareness among consumers and businesses to risk of online commerce. Large buyers of IT gear -- software, computers and online services are now emboldened to lean on companies like Microsoft Corp. to bolster security.

"We're seeing vendors ready to turn over information that will help us validate whether our customers are secure," said Mike Casper, a vice president at Wachovia, which has been testing the program since April.

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Web Scam (OREG)

By Bryan Denson

The Oregonian, October 25, 2006

A Florida man pleaded guilty Tuesday to heading a Corvallis-based Internet investment scam that victimized 1,500 investors in the United States and Canada.

Frank Hendricks, 46, pleaded guilty in a federal court in Eugene to wire fraud, conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud, and failing to file a U.S. income tax form for the year 2003, the U.S. attorney's office reported.

When sentenced in February, he faces as long as 26 years in prison and as much as $1.3 million in fines, plus mandatory restitution.

According to court papers, Hendricks and another man, identified as Scott Guenther, created a CD-ROM and electronic book-marketing business named Pacific Achievements International. Guenther is scheduled to plead guilty to some of the charges Dec. 5 in Eugene, authorities say.

A government indictment accuses the two men of raising $13 million in 16 months by assuring potential investors that investments of $5,859 would return $9,720 within one to three weeks, with earnings of more than $1 million a month thereafter.

Hendricks and others promoting Pacific Achievements International used new investment funds to pay off earlier investors, which drew new investors to sign up. Hendricks and another promoter were accused of diverting $2 million from the company to fund their own lifestyles, most of which went to buying homes.

In early 2004, the FBI seized two residences purchased by Hendricks in Shalimar, Fla., and two residences in Gig Harbor, Wash., from a company promoter, federal prosecutors reported.

To generate income, Hendricks and another company official invested money into "high-yield" scams in Lebanon, the Bahamas, Nevada and Texas, losing $2.7 million, according to federal officials.

Hendricks earned $778,000 in 2003 but failed to file a return, costing the government $80,000 to $200,000, officials said.

U.S. Investigates Church Music Director (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

GREENWICH, Conn., Oct. 24 — Federal authorities are investigating whether the longtime music director of a prominent Episcopal church here, who was a mentor to thousands of children, was involved in child pornography, according to people involved in the investigation.

The head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's cybercrimes squad in New Haven, Tim Egan, said "there is a pending investigation" into the matter, but declined to comment further.

Susan Marks, a spokeswoman for Christ Church, a picturesque church on East Putnam Avenue, said that Robert F. Tate, the music director, had recently resigned, and that the church's membership had been notified. She referred all other questions to the church's lawyer, Eugene J. Riccio. "All I want to say is I cannot comment on this matter at this point," Mr. Riccio said.

It was unclear whether the reputed pornographic images that piqued the criminal investigation were stored on a church-owned computer or not. "It's hard to tell whose computer was whose," said a federal official familiar with the investigation.

Investigators are also trying to determine whether Mr. Tate had any improper contact with any of the minors he may have known through the church, according to someone else familiar with the investigation.

Spokesmen for the Episcopal Diocese of Connecticut did not return calls seeking comment late Tuesday.

Mr. Tate could not be reached for comment. Several phone numbers with which he was previously associated either were disconnected, or calls to them went unanswered. A woman at a home owned by Mr. Tate said that she rented and that he was not there.

A biography of Mr. Tate that until recently was on the Web said he came to Christ Church from the National Cathedral in Washington, where he was assistant organist. He got a master's degree in 1968 from the College of Church Musicians at Washington Cathedral and then studied at the Juilliard School in Manhattan, according to the biography.

DOJ_NMG_0086107

Pornography In The Anglican Church? (NBC)

By Tim Sandler, Producer

NBC News, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK - Federal prosecutors and the FBI in Connecticut are investigating whether a high-ranking staff member at one of the country's most venerable Anglican churches possessed child pornography, sources tell NBC News.

The sources say that earlier this month the FBI searched a building on the grounds of Christ Church in Greenwich, Conn., after obtaining information that allegedly implicates the church's long-time music director, Robert Tate, in a child pornography case.

A grand jury is convening in the case, and NBC has learned that other top church officials have been called to testify. No charges have been filed against Tate or any church officials.

A church representative referred all questions to the church's attorney, Eugene Riccio of Bridgeport, who declined comment. Kevin J. O'Connor, the U.S. attorney for the District of Connecticut, also declined comment, as did the FBI.

Tate has been removed from the church's official Web site.

Located in one of the country's most wealthy communities, Christ Church in Greenwich has attracted an affluent membership since its inception in the 1830s.

Former President George H.W. Bush attended services in his youth and, as president, returned to the church in 1992 for the funeral of his mother, a church member for decades who was married to the late Sen. Prescott Bush, R-Conn.

A Christ Church minister reportedly signed the baptism records of President George W. Bush, who was born in New Haven, Conn., in 1946.

Former Trooper Expected To Plead To Luring Teen (BOSH)

Boston Herald, October 25, 2006

WORCESTER, Mass. - A state trooper charged with trying to solicit sex from an undercover officer he thought was a 14-year-old boy plans to plead guilty in federal court, according to court documents, and has resigned from the force.

Brian O'Hare was charged with using the Internet to entice an individual under 18 for sexual activity. An updated court filing this week indicated O'Hare "intends to plead guilty to the charge(s) contained in the Indictment," the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester reported Tuesday.

A State Police spokesman said O'Hare had resigned, effective Monday.

O'Hare allegedly had several sexually explicit chats with an FBI agent who was posing as a 14-year-old high school boy, and the two arranged to meet at the Medford Mall, authorities said. O'Hare was arrested by FBI agents in February after he showed up.

O'Hare lived in Lancaster and was assigned to the Holden barracks. He served in the Massachusetts National Guard in Afghanistan and Iraq from August 2002 until December 2003. EDT

Crime Drops After Increase In Officers (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Prince George's County police have attributed a decline in violent crime and property offenses this year to more officers on the streets, the availability of overtime funds to keep experienced officers working and investments in new technology.

Compared with the first nine months of last year, the number of homicides in the county has declined by 28 percent (from 128 to 92), rapes by 11.7 percent (163 to 144) and carjackings by 37 percent (from 565 to 356), police said.

In preliminary statistics compiled by the Maryland State Police that cover the first half of the year, Prince George's showed a total decline in major crimes of 15.1 percent, the largest percentage decrease among the 23 Maryland counties and Baltimore.

"I believe our vision has proven to be a sound one," Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High said yesterday at a news conference at police headquarters. "We've maintained the course for many of our initiatives that seemed challenging at the time."

He added: "What is especially gratifying for us is that our trend downward is counter to most of the nation."

Prince George's -- the state's second-most-populous county behind Montgomery -- continues to rank near the top among Maryland jurisdictions in the number of crimes committed. Through June, Prince George's led the state in rapes, larceny theft, motor vehicle theft and total crimes, the state police data show.

Last year was particularly troubling, police said, when the county had its highest homicide total ever, 173.

"We're headed in the right direction," said County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D). "We are not where we want to be. We know we have a lot of work to do."

DOJ_NMG_0086108

The decline in Prince George's reported crime started in the last quarter of 2005 and has continued, gaining strength, through three quarters this year, police said. The $28.5 million increase this year in the police budget, which is now $217 million, helped the department put more officers on the streets, High said. There are 1,393 officers in the department, up from 1,346 in the last fiscal year, according to county statistics. The county is authorized to have 1,597 officers at this point, police said.

"Anytime you have fresh resources, there's a resurgence of energy," said Maj. Daniel Dusseau, commander of the criminal investigations division. Also, the funding for overtime, a $6.5 million increase this year, helped keep more experienced officers on the streets longer, he said. "This is emergency management, it really is. You can't 9-to-5 it."

Although High didn't go into great detail, he said there have been improvements to the county's ability to electronically map crimes and focus on high-crime areas. He said police are testing technologies to detect where gunshots came from and are using license plate scanners in certain spots to track automobile movement.

Percy Alston, president of the Prince George's police union, said police have gone back to officers patrolling smaller beats, rather than the "community service areas" that were less manageable.

"We just did not have the staffing to make it work," he said. "At the beginning of this year, we went back to the strategy that is time tested, and we went back to that and we're reaping the benefits."

Some people in county law enforcement say privately that they are not convinced the crime drop is attributed to police strategy or techniques but that it could be the natural drop-off from an unusually high crime year.

Ohio Executes Cult Leader For 5 Killings (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Mccarthy, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

(AP) - LUCASVILLE, Ohio-Ohio executed a religious cult leader Tuesday for the murder of a family of five followers who were taken one at a time to a barn, bound and shot to death. The youngest was a girl just 7 years old.

Jeffrey Lundgren, 56, died by injection at 10:26 a.m. at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility for the deaths of the Avery family.

"I profess my love for God, my family, for my children, for Kathy (his wife). I am because you are," Lundgren said in his final statement.

The evidence against Lundgren was compelling.

Upset by what he thought was the Avery family's lack of faith, arranged a dinner hosted by cult members. Afterward, he and his followers led the Averys one by one - the father first, young Karen last - to their deaths while the others unknowingly cleaned up after dinner. A chain saw was used to muffle the gunfire.

Lundgren argued at his trial in 1990 that he was prophet of God and therefore not worthy of the death penalty.

"It's not a figment of my imagination that I can in fact talk to God, that I can hear his voice," he had told the jurors. "I am a prophet of God. I am even more than a prophet."

He was convicted of killing Dennis Avery, 49; his wife, Cheryl, 46; and their daughters, Trina, 15, Rebecca, 13, and 7-year-old Karen.

Lundgren formed the cult with about 20 members in the northeast Ohio town of Kirtland after he was dismissed in 1987 as a lay minister of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, an offshoot of the Mormon church.

Lundgren said God commanded him, through interpretation of Scriptures, to kill the Avery family, who had moved from Missouri in 1987 to follow his teachings.

Lundgren's attorneys had tried to put off the execution, arguing that he should be allowed to join a lawsuit challenging Ohio's use of lethal injection as cruel and unusual punishment. They said his execution had more of a chance of being painful because he was diabetic and overweight at 275 pounds.

Late Monday, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati issued an order allowing the execution to go forward. The U.S. Supreme Court refused a last-minute request to stop his execution Tuesday, and Gov. Bob Taft denied clemency.

Police Reviewing Claims Against Delegate (BSUN)

By Anica Butler

The Baltimore Sun, October 25, 2006

Anne Arundel County police are looking into whether Del. William A. "Tony" McConkey might have engaged in criminal acts during a real estate deal that he is being sued over, although a police spokesman said that the review is not "a full-blown investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0086109

Police said they are reviewing claims by Teresa Milligan, 42, that the Severna Park Republican committed foreclosure-rescue fraud, in violation of a new law that has civil and criminal penalties. She filed a civil suit Monday in Anne Arundel County Circuit Court alleging that McConkey tricked her into signing over her townhouse to him.

The office of Anne Arundel County State's Attorney Frank R. Weathersbee received a complaint about McConkey on the matter, which it forwarded to the county Police Department, according to a police spokesman.

"A detective has been assigned to conduct a preliminary inquiry to determine the facts surrounding the allegations and to determine if a criminal offense has occurred and if so, what law or laws may have been violated," Lt. David Waltemeyer said Tuesday.

After the police inquiry, Waltemeyer said, the Police Department will consult with the state's attorney's office to determine which agency would investigate.

A complaint against McConkey also has been sent to the state attorney general's office, but a spokesman Tuesday said he could not comment on whether the office is investigating.

Reached Tuesday, McConkey said that he had not been informed that police, or anyone else, were looking into the matter.

"I don't see why they would. It's a real estate matter," said McConkey. "I don't think there's any basis for this."

McConkey, 42, has denied any wrongdoing. He maintains that he acquired the home legally and is evicting Milligan and her family -- a 16-year-old daughter and an 8-month-old grandchild -- for failure to pay rent. Her suit, he said, is an attempt to stop the eviction.

The Protection of Homeowners in Foreclosure Act -- which McConkey voted for when it passed the General Assembly last year -- created criminal penalties for those found guilty of foreclosure-rescue fraud. Violating the law is a misdemeanor that carries up to a three-year prison sentence and a $10,000 fine.

In 1994, McConkey received probation before judgment on a burglary charge stemming from a dispute with tenants. In 1995, he agreed to be disbarred as a lawyer after a failed real estate deal in Prince George's County in the late 1980s.

A state delegate since 2003, McConkey is up for re-election Nov. 7. Among his opponents are Democrat Patricia Weathersbee, wife of the state's attorney. Also running in the two-member district in central Anne Arundel County are Republican James King and Democrat Paul G. Rudolph.

McConkey and Chuck Gast, chairman of the Anne Arundel County Republican State Central Committee, said they believe that the civil suit, and subsequent inquiries, are politically motivated.

"Anybody can throw out charges and allegations, and half the time they're meritless and baseless," Gast said, adding that he thought the pending case would have no effect on the election. "It's up to a judge and jury to determine the facts. ... The facts will be borne out at a trial."

A hearing on Milligan's eviction is scheduled for Nov. 2.

No court dates have been set in the civil case because McConkey has 30 days from the time he is served with the civil complaint to respond.

According to court records, McConkey faced a similar suit in July 2005. Neither the plaintiffs nor their attorneys could be reached, and the outcome of the case is unclear from court records. However, state records show that McConkey purchased the home in dispute, in the 1900 block of Tilghman Drive in Crofton, in May 2005 for $330,000 and sold it in July 2006 for $400,000.

"I won it," McConkey said of the lawsuit, without offering details. "And I'll win this one, too, but it will take time."

Creative Crooks As Shoplifters Use High-Tech Scams, Retail Losses Rise (WSJ)

By Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

William Swanberg had a thing for Legos, but it was hardly child's play.

After he was arrested last November near Portland, Ore., police investigators determined he had stolen more than $600,000 of the Danish building toys over three years from dozens of stores in at least five Western states.

He pilfered the toys by creating counterfeit bar codes that allowed $100 Lego sets, for example, to be rung up for just $19. Then he resold them on a Web site for toy collectors.

"This case was fascinating to me," says Jeff Lesowski, a senior deputy district attorney in Washington County, Ore., who prosecuted Mr. Swanberg. "With these new methods, it can take a long time for a retailer to know he's suffered a large-scale theft, so it takes so much longer to catch up with thieves."

Just as technology has given a big boost to the retail industry, making it more efficient and productive, it has also transformed retail crime. Using sophisticated tactics such as bar-code forgery and fraudulent gift cards, criminals are stealing larger amounts, and it has gotten harder to catch them. Law-enforcement officers say many of the high-tech thieves belong to organized-crime rings that have turned retail theft into big business. And the Internet has made it easier for them to find buyers for the loot.

Retail crime rose to about $37 billion in 2005 from $31 billion in 2003, according to a study conducted by the University of Florida, increasing almost twice as fast as retail sales over that period. Store employees, who have access to merchandise and familiarity with antitheft systems, account for 48% of retail-crime losses, according to the 2005 study. But professional thieves, many of them using sophisticated new methods, also are responsible for a big part, says Joseph LaRocca, vice president of loss prevention at the National Retail Federation, a trade group.

The value of merchandise snatched in the average shoplifting incident has more than tripled to $855 in 2005, from $265 in 2003, the University of Florida survey reported. In cases of organized retail crime -- where the thieves intend to sell the stolen goods rather than keep them -- the average loss was $46,353 per case in 2005, the survey said. Over that same time period, the size of the average employee theft fell 40% to $1,053, from $1,762.

Organized theft rings have been around for years. In the late 1990s, there was a rise in cases of criminal groups paying thieves to shoplift baby formula, razor blades, teeth whiteners and other high-volume merchandise, according to retailers and law-enforcement officials. The crime rings typically sold the loot to other stores or moved it in flea markets or pawn shops. Some even set up their own convenience stores.

The sophisticated schemes cropping up today generally involve more expensive items: $300 Dyson vacuum cleaners, $400 power saws and $1,000 plasma televisions. Brad Brekke, vice president of assets protection at Target Corp., estimates that more than 50% of theft at the Target chain involves some high-tech twist -- either in how the goods are stolen or how they are unloaded.

Bar-Code Scam

Over six months in 2004, Thomas Westwood, his wife, Jennifer, and mother-in-law, Kathleen Dodson, worked the bar-code scam at Target stores. Using a computer, they scanned bar codes from relatively inexpensive Target items and printed out copies. Then they returned to the store and pasted the fakes onto expensive Dyson vacuum cleaners, DVD players and phones. Cashiers dutifully rang up the wrong prices.

All told, the trio stole more than $100,000 of merchandise, law-enforcement officials say. After a cashier in one store noticed a mispriced item, Target investigators got involved and discovered a pattern of such mispricings. Using video clips, they identified suspects, and the police moved in. Earlier this year, the trio pleaded guilty in a Missouri federal court to conspiracy to commit fraud.

Last December, a Target security guard nabbed a Colorado college student after he purchased a $150 iPod that carried a bar code for $4.99 headphones, according to Mr. Brekke. The thief had fashioned the fake label with a $25 software program called Barcode Magic, which he'd downloaded from the Internet, Mr. Brekke says.

Bar-code swindlers are hard to catch, says Mr. Brekke, a former agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation. If an alert cashier points out that a bar code is ringing up the wrong price, the thief can either pay the difference or just say he doesn't want the item any more and walk out. "The risk level is very low," he says.

Mr. Brekke has been trying to persuade manufacturers to print prices on boxes or come up with bar codes in assorted sizes, which would be trickier to substitute. In the meantime, Target's loss investigators have begun to monitor sales reports for unusual patterns, trends and anomalies.

In the summer of 2005, they noticed spikes in sales of Legos. Expensive sets were being sold for a pittance. They studied hundreds of hours of surveillance tape, then devised an electronic system to alert in-store antitheft workers when big batches of Legos were rung up.

That's what happened last Nov. 17 at a Target in Hillsboro, Ore., but the security guard got the message too late. Mr. Swanberg had already made his fraudulent purchase and left, according to Mr. Lesowski, the prosecutor. The guard warned co-workers at nearby stores.

Later that day, an employee at a Beaverton, Ore., Target spotted Mr. Swanberg loading his cart with about 10 $100 Star Wars Millennium Falcon Lego sets. He slapped a phony bar code for a $19 Lego set on the top box and headed for the youngest looking cashier he could find, the prosecutor says. The cashier scanned the top box and multiplied it by the number in the stack.

Several burly Target employees surrounded Mr. Swanberg's cart, which he shoved at them in an effort to get away. They tackled him and summoned the police. In his van was a detailed daily itinerary for Target, Wal-Mart and Toys "R" Us stores he planned to hit, the prosecutor says.

Another vexing new problem, retail executives say, is gift-card fraud. Many retailers now issue gift cards in place of paper gift certificates and receipts from returned merchandise. The cards, which resemble credit cards, have been a boon to the retail industry, accounting for $60 billion in sales last year, almost one-third of it during the holiday season.

DOJ_NMG_0086111

But they've also been a boon to thieves. In one scam, crooks copy numbers from gift cards hanging on store racks. After the cards are purchased and activated, buyers use them to shop online by entering the card numbers.

So do the thieves. To figure out which cards have been activated, they phone an 800 number to check on balances for card numbers they've copied. When they discover activated cards, they use the card numbers to buy merchandise on a store's Web site, explains Dan Doyle, vice president of loss prevention at Beall's Inc., a Southeastern department-store chain.

Another swindle involves stealing merchandise, then returning it for store credit in the form of gift cards. In 2003, Herion Karbunara, a Massachusetts man in his mid-20s, paid women $50 to $200 a day to shoplift merchandise from stores ranging from Pottery Barn to Victoria's Secret and then return it for gift cards, according to the Massachusetts attorney general's office. Some stores required receipts for returns, so the women first would buy one of each product they intended to steal, prosecutors say. Mr. Karbunara would scan the receipts into a computer and print counterfeits, they say.

The Internet has emerged as a preferred method for crooks like Mr. Karbunara to unload gift cards. After fraudulently obtaining about 600 such cards, Mr. Karbunara offered them for sale on eBay. The Massachusetts attorney general's office says online sales netted Mr. Karbunara $200,000 over 10 months. In late 2004, he pleaded guilty to three counts of larceny and one count of forgery, and was sentenced to two years in state prison.

Retailers responding to a National Retail Federation survey last year estimated that 70% of gift cards sold in eBay were fraudulently obtained, either through scams like Mr. Karbunara's or purchased with stolen credit cards. Mr. LaRocca, the federation's loss-prevention chief, says the group raised a "big stink" with eBay, which eventually changed its policy. EBay now limits sellers to posting one gift card per week, with a value of no more than $500.

When the National Retail Federation scrutinized gift cards sold on eBay on Sept. 14, says Mr. LaRocca, it identified more than a dozen auctions involving sellers who had violated eBay's policy by listing more than one gift card a week. "Although we have been talking with eBay, the conversations have clearly not been fruitful to date," says Mr. LaRocca.

Hani Durzy, an eBay spokesman, says the company changed its policy in an effort to thwart criminals. Listings are policed by eBay investigators, he says, and its 203 million users also alert the company to potential violations. With upward of 100 million items for sale on eBay at any given time, and seven million new items added every day, staying on top of every listing is difficult, he says.

The Internet has become so popular for moving stolen goods that a term has been coined for the practice -- "efencing." Thieves or fences who sell loot out of a truck or at a flea market typically get 20 to 30 cents per dollar of retail value, according to a 2005 report on organized retail crime commissioned by the National Retail Federation. On the Internet, where their wares are exposed to many more potential buyers, they bring in, on average, 70 cents on the dollar, the report says.

Felonious Twist

Law-enforcement officials say the Web allows thieves to unload merchandise quicker than in the past, and in greater volume. More thieves are taking orders for items to steal -- a felonious twist on just-in-time inventory, these officials say.

"Thieves know this sort of organized retail crime is low-risk and high-profit," says Eric Ives, unit chief the FBI's major theft unit, which oversees investigations of organized retail crime.

After Mr. Swanberg, the Lego thief, was arrested, federal authorities raided the Reno, Nev., home he shared with his elderly mother. He had sold the goods over the Internet, says Mr. Lesowski, who prosecuted him. Investigators found computer records of sales he had made on Bricklink.com, a Web site for Lego fans and collectors. Target's Mr. Brekke figures Mr. Swanberg stole about $200,000 of the sets from its stores alone.

"Our Web site cannot do anything to prevent [the sale of stolen merchandise] from happening because we don't have control over the seller's merchandise," a representative of Bricklink.com said in an email.

Bruce and Laura Wasz, a mother-and-son team, ran an 11-person theft ring in Illinois. They paid people to hit home-improvement chains such as Home Depot Inc. and Sears Holdings Corp.'s the Great Indoors. The thieves stole the old-fashioned way, simply sneaking things out the doors. Accomplices ripped off entire truckloads of products such as chain saws.

They stored the stuff in three shuttered pawn shops and unloaded it on eBay, using numerous different account names, according to Brian Hayes, an assistant U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Illinois. "They held themselves out as honest dealers," says Mr. Hayes. Investigators later determined that in 2003 they sold more than $2 million of sump pumps, Koehler faucets, mosquito exterminators, snow blowers and other merchandise.

They got caught after the manufacturer of the stolen chain saws noticed a bunch of them for sale on the Web, priced below wholesale. Mr. Wasz was sentenced to six years, nine months in federal prison. His mother got five years, eight months.

Shoplifting is usually prosecuted on the state level. In most states, only those caught stealing more than $1,000 face felony charges that require jail time.

DOJ_NMG_0086112

"Organized retail-crime rings utilize the laws to their benefit," says Britt Wood, senior vice president of industry relations at the Retail Industry Leaders Association, a trade group for large mass merchants such as Wal-Mart and Best Buy. "They don't steal a lot from one store at one time. But it adds up, so by the end of the month, they've stolen $100,000."

Retailers are pushing states to stiffen penalties. In January, Congress allotted $5 million for the FBI to establish an organized retail-crime task force.

Increasingly, retailers are setting up investigative units to piece together cases big enough to interest law enforcement. Home Depot put together a unit several years ago that regularly searches the Internet for new merchandise offered at below wholesale prices that matches products stolen from its stores. Earlier this year, the two large retail trade groups created separate databases to track retail-crime activity, in an effort to help build bigger, stronger cases for prosecutors.

Mr. Swanberg, the Lego thief, pleaded guilty in June to three counts of felony theft and was sentenced to 13 months in prison. Federal authorities say they still are investigating Mr. Swanberg for possible mail fraud.

His name still comes up from time to time on Bricklink.com's online forum. Mr. Swanberg was a highly rated vendor on the site, garnering more than 6,000 favorable comments over three years. Two days before he was arrested, one participant noted: "A unique vendor with great inventory."

CIVIL LAW:

Latest Round In Web Porn Law Fight Begins (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, October 25, 2006

It's not all that often that a month-long trial begins in federal court where everyone knows from the start which side is likely to win.

But that was the situation Monday in ACLU v. Gonzales as the final round of litigation got underway in a challenge to the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), a law which threatens criminal penalties for commercial Web site operators that allow children to access material that is "harmful to minors."

Eight years after it was passed, COPA has never gone into effect because Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. granted a preliminary injunction that, after two trips to the U.S. Supreme Court, won the approval of a 5-4 court.

Although the majority was a slim one, the high court's holding was that the ACLU and its co-plaintiffs are "likely to succeed" in proving that COPA is unconstitutional.

But "likely" doesn't mean certainly, and the Justice Department isn't giving up the fight.

In preparation for Monday's trial, Reed ordered lawyers on both sides to file their proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Ordinarily, such briefs are filed after a nonjury trial has concluded to aid the judge in his drafting of an opinion that announces his verdict.

But ACLU v. Gonzales is no ordinary case, and Reed apparently wanted the lawyers to provide a roadmap for the trial, which is expected to boil down to a battle of the experts.

One of the central disputes in the case is whether children can be protected by "filtering" software -- a program added by parents to a computer to block access to sexually explicit Web sites.

The government, in its brief, insists that "filtering software cannot completely protect minors from exposure to sexually explicit material on the World Wide Web. The status quo solution -- filtering software without any government regulation -- fails to protect children adequately."

The better solution, the government argues, is to stop pornography at its source by requiring Web site owners to demand "age verification," such as a credit card, before allowing access to sexually explicit content.

But the plaintiffs lawyers -- a team from the ACLU and Latham & Watkins -- argue that COPA is overbroad and that many legitimate Web sites fear prosecution under the law.

Age verification won't work, the ACLU argues, because Internet users are reluctant to give their identity and Web site owners cannot afford to process credit cards just to allow access to free content.

And even if a credit card system were installed, the ACLU says, it wouldn't prevent children from gaining access since many youngsters have access to their parents' credit cards or even have their own cards.

Instead, the ACLU says, Congress should go back to the drawing board and draft laws designed to enhance the effectiveness of filtering software.

DOJ_NMG_0086113

"Congress could enact a statute that permits the distribution of such material [that is harmful to minors], but instead requires Web site operators to include a rating, label, or code on the Web site that makes clear that harmful to minors material is available on the Web site. Such a rating, label or code could be placed on the initial home page of the site," the ACLU argues in its brief.

"Requiring Web sites to include a harmful-to-minors rating, label or code would make filtering products even more effective and accurate at blocking harmful to minors material," the brief says.

Another way to make filters more effective, the ACLU says, would be a federal law requiring the Justice Department to compile and maintain a list of Web sites that contain material that is harmful to minors.

Such a statute "would provide filtering product companies with the ability to accurately block absolutely all speech that the government believes is harmful to minors. It would also provide parents and other entities with information about the types of material that are on the Web in order to assist parents in determining what protections, if any, are necessary for their children depending on their individual values and circumstances," the brief says.

The ACLU contends in its brief that "filtering product companies would accept a governmentally created list of inappropriate sites; in fact, many have already testified that they would almost certainly comply with any request from a governmental entity to include specific sites on their lists."

But Justice Department lawyers insisted in their brief that "voluntary measures such as a Web site rating system, filtering products, and education, will be effective only if they are used in conjunction with the requirements of COPA, because voluntary measures alone will not prevent children from accessing material harmful to minors."

A rating system simply wouldn't work, the Justice Department says, because Web site operators "would lack an incentive to label their material in a manner that makes it more likely that filters will block access."

The operators, they say, "would have to agree to a uniform system of ratings, or agree to subject themselves to an independent rating body."

And even if such a system were attempted, the Justice Department says, it would prove ineffective because "Web sites are too numerous and change too frequently for the government, or any private business, to effectively separate harmful from nonharmful material."

Instead, the government argues, "Only a solution directed at the source of the problem can provide the incentive necessary to adequately protect children."

In an opinion handed down on Oct. 10, Reed rejected a last-minute bid by the government to have the case dismissed.

In its motion, the government argued that none of the named plaintiffs has standing to challenge the law because they are not "commercial pornographers," and that their fear of being prosecuted under COPA is therefore "too speculative."

But the plaintiffs lawyers argued that plaintiffs such as Salon.com and the Philadelphia Gay News have good reason to fear that they will be targeted for prosecution because the law prohibits any commercial dissemination of material that is deemed to be "harmful to minors."

Reed sided with the plaintiffs, finding that "there is nothing in the statute that limits COPA to commercial pornographers."

The legal test for establishing standing on the basis of a credible threat of prosecution is "quite forgiving," Reed said, and courts "will assume a credible threat of prosecution in the absence of compelling contrary evidence."

Under COPA, a commercial Web site operator faces up to six months in prison and fines of up to $50,000 if found to have allowed minors access to harmful material.

The law defines material that is "harmful to minors" as any "communication, picture, image, graphic image file, article, recording, writing or other matter of any kind that is obscene" or that, if not obscene, meets the law's three-pronged test.

Under the first prong of the test, material violates the law if "the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find, taking the material as a whole and with respect to minors, is designed to appeal to, or is designed to pander to, the prurient interest."

The second prong calls for proof that the material "depicts, describes, or represents, in a manner patently offensive with respect to minors, an actual or simulated sexual act or sexual contact, an actual or simulated normal or perverted sexual act, or a lewd exhibition of the genitals or post-pubescent female breast."

Finally, the material must be shown to "lack serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value for minors."

With that test in mind, Reed found that the plaintiffs have standing because they "will be able to show at trial that they have a legitimate fear that they could be prosecuted under COPA because their materials could be found to be harmful to minors."

Having reviewed each of the plaintiffs' Web sites, Reed found that many of them include material that "could be found to: have been designed to appeal to the prurient interest of a minor; depict or describe a sexual act or contact or a lewd exhibition of the genitals or post-pubescent female breast in a manner patently offensive with respect to minors; and lack serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value for minors."

DOJ_NMG_0086114

Some of the plaintiffs' materials "are more graphic than others," Reed noted, and "range from erotic homosexual kissing to highly eroticized descriptions or depictions of anal and vaginal sex."

In a footnote, Reed said the term "prurient interest" is most often defined as "a shameful or morbid interest in nudity, sex, or excretion over and beyond that which would be characterized as normal."

But that definition was significantly expanded by the U.S. Supreme Court, Reed noted, in a decision that said materials may appeal to the prurient interest if they are merely "in some sense erotic."

In another footnote, Reed said, "I find that it is possible that some communities would find even minor sexual contact, like kissing, to be prurient in nature and patently offensive if performed by homosexuals."

More FOIA Funds, Staff Needed, Group Says (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, October 25, 2006

A recent Justice Department report on agencies' compliance with a presidential mandate to improve processing of requests for government documents failed to address resource constraints, an independent research institute has charged.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last week, the National Security Archive, a research institute and library located at The George Washington University, said the report did not acknowledge the scale of the challenge agencies face in reforming their Freedom of Information Act procedures. It avoided mentioning a lack of adequate funding and staffing, as well as the need for cross-agency leadership, the letter stated.

The executive order, signed by President Bush on Dec. 14, 2005, directs agencies to ensure that their FOIA implementation is citizen-centered and results-oriented. They must also appoint chief FOIA officers.

The order states that any changes should be made using "available resources" and "existing agency staff." The FOIA chief can, however, recommend adjustments to agency personnel and funding as "may be necessary to carry out" the order's policies.

Daniel J. Metcalfe, director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy, said there was little discussion of resources in the Oct. 16 report because the agency FOIA improvement plans reviewed in it were due "only six months after the executive order was signed, in the middle of a budget cycle."

The National Security Archive also charged that, in its own review of agency FOIA improvement plans, it found that many are behind schedule and others don't comply fully with the 1996 Electronic Freedom of Information Act, which amended FOIA.

Metcalfe said the group's characterization that "many agencies" are lagging in complying with the 1996 amendments is a gross overstatement and mischaracterization. Several Government Accountability Office audits show otherwise, he said.

In March 2001, GAO reported (GAO-01-378) that all government agencies had implemented many of the law's provisions, including the governmentwide establishment of electronic reading rooms.

In response to a set of similar letters the National Security Archive sent to House and Senate committee leaders, Tabetha Mueller, a spokeswoman for the House Government Reform Subcommittee on Government Management, Finance and Accountability, said FOIA oversight hearings in February were likely.

"If you look at not complying with [the Electronic Freedom of Information Act], that is just as much a leadership problem from Congress and an oversight problem as it is the agencies' problem," Mueller said.

She said the Justice report provided a fair accounting of the steps agencies have taken to improve administration of FOIA, and gave evidence that agencies are responding to two FOIA hearings held by the subcommittee earlier this year.

But Meredith Fuchs, general counsel for the National Security Archive, said she believes the FOIA executive order was issued to keep Congress from passing legislation amending the law again.

"It's great to have cheerleading, but it is going to take money, hard work and an investment in technology and people to reform FOIA," Fuchs said. "We think that the executive order could have a wonderful impact on FOIA, but the agencies' goals actually have to be implemented."

Senate Judiciary Committee Ranking Member Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said in a statement that he shares the National Security Archive's concerns regarding compliance with the 1996 amendment.

"Legislative improvements to FOIA are meaningless without adequate resources and training to implement these improvements," Leahy said. "I am also troubled that many federal agencies lack access to the technology needed to implement the amendments. Technology can play an important role in promoting openness in our government."

Legislation moving through the House (H.R. 867) and Senate (S. 394) would impose tighter enforcement of the current 20-day deadline for responding to FOIA requests, create an online and telephone-based system for tracking FOIA requests and create a FOIA ombudsman to mediate disputes between agencies and the public over information requests.

DOJ_NMG_0086115

Rick Blum, coordinator of the Sunshine in Government Initiative, a coalition of media groups, said the Justice report and the agency FOIA improvement plans showed that an executive order is not a substitute for legislation to strengthen the process of handling requests for government documents.

"The report did point out that the executive order really is unique and did go a ways to show that agencies should make some common sense changes," Blum said. "The problem is, where are they going to get the money?"

Patrice McDermott, director of OpenTheGovernment.org, a coalition of journalists and good government groups, said that without legislation tied to agencies' budgets, a substantial improvement in the administration of FOIA is out of reach.

Research Group Questions 'rosy' Report On Agencies' FOIA Progress (FEDTIMES)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, October 25, 2006

The National Security Archive, criticizing a recent report by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, has called on Congress to hold hearings to determine if genuine progress is being made in agency administration of the Freedom of Information Act.

Gonzales' report, issued Oct. 16, highlighted progress agencies are making to comply with a presidential directive, issued last year, that requires agencies to name chief FOIA officers and create improvement plans to streamline the processing of FOIA requests. Gonzales wrote that the executive order "has had an immediate and widespread positive effect on the operations of the federal agencies that administer the FOIA."

In letters to both Gonzales and leaders in the Senate Judiciary and House Government Reform committees, the Washington-based research group — which collects and publishes documents obtained through FOIA requests — called the report "rosy" and said it "ignored critical challenges facing the federal FOIA system."

"While the AG report is optimistic about the agencies' newfound embrace of technology/automation, FOIA request status tracking and backlog reduction, it fails to provide an honest assessment of where agencies' FOIA programs stand today and what it will take to bring their FOIA programs into compliance with the law," the letters said.

Daniel Metcalfe, director of the Office of Information and Privacy at the Justice Department, said the report gives an "accurate appraisal of agency improvement plans."

He noted that this is the first of three reports.

"A key development before the next report is that agencies will report their implementation successes as part of their annual FOIA report," Metcalfe said. "All agencies are now implementing their plans and are going to report on their initial successes as part of this process by Feb. 1. The next attorney general's report will be based on this first phase of plan implementation."

Rep. Todd Platts, R-Pa., chairman of the House Government Reform subcommittee on government management, finance and accountability held a hearing in July to discuss progress on the executive order.

Subcommittee spokeswoman Tabetha Mueller said Platts will hold additional oversight hearings as the letter from the National Security Archive suggests.

"Oversight is very important with something like FOIA," Mueller said. "The only way to guard against agencies not meeting their goals is with vigilant oversight."

In a statement released following his receipt of the letter, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., agreed that congressional oversight is critical and also promised to continue to press for future hearings.

Dana Gets More Time For Bonus Plan (DOW)

By Tiffany Kary, Dow Jones Newswires

Dow Jones, October 25, 2006

NEW YORK — Dana Corp. on Tuesday won more time to develop a new legal strategy to obtain a package of bonuses for its chief executive and other top executives.

Judge Burton Lifland of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan, who previously rejected the proposed bonuses, approved the auto-parts suppliers request to further its legal work on a schedule that would permit a Nov. 8 final hearing on its request for a long-term incentive plan for executives.

Even so, Lifland continued to question whether the timeline was too "aggressive" and whether Dana's strategy made sense. "Frankly, I'm not fully comprehensive of the strategy of this motion," Lifland said.

The Toledo, Ohio, company has asked Lifland to reconsider his ruling striking down a program that would have paid Chief Executive Michael J. Burns $9.1 million over the next few years _ including a $6 million bonus once Dana exits Chapter 11 protection.

DOJ_NMG_0086116

The Justice Department has called the request improper because it is in effect asking the court guidance on how to get the bonus plan approved.

"We are not as of yet a part of the growing consensus in this case," said Andrew Velez-Rivera, speaking in court Tuesday as a trial attorney representing the Justice Department's Office of the U.S. Trustee. That office monitors bankruptcy cases to ensure that participants comply with bankruptcy law.

Corinne Ball, an attorney for Dana, said that there has been "growing consensus" between the company and creditors on the executive-compensation plans, and that Dana needs more time to craft non-compete, non-disclosure and non-disparagement clauses for executives.

"We have reached an agreement with the official creditors committee on a long-term incentive plan for six key executives," she said.

Lifland had previously denied the executive bonus program, saying the proposal would have violated provisions of the 2005 bankruptcy law. Those provisions allow retention bonuses only if the employee has a competing offer for equal or higher pay, setting a higher standard than old laws.

Several Dana retirees have sent letters to Lifland _ some of them handwritten _ praising the judge for rejecting the proposed bonuses and pleading with him not to reconsider his decision. The letters have been included in Dana's bankruptcy-court record.

"It again appears that Mr. Michael J. Burns, CEO of Dana Corp. and its board of directors are more intrigued with trying to design an executive compensation plan to reward Mr. Burns and other executives should they be successful to emerge from Chapter 11, or that Dana Corp. be sold," Louis H. Benien, one of the retirees, wrote in one letter.

"It would seem to me that their time would be better spent on how they are going to protect the continued existence of Dana, the jobs of their people (which many of us lost), their retirees, and the best interest for their shareholders," Benien said.

Bankrupt Opposition (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

When President Bush signed the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act last year, Democrats and "consumer" groups not only cried foul but predicted doom. A year after the law was enacted, however, the evidence suggests that their fears were misplaced, not to say cynical.

A modest reform at best, the law was designed to prevent people from having their debts erased regardless of their ability to repay them. Between 1995 and 2004, personal bankruptcies rose 78%. More and more people were running up credit-card and other debt and then seeking Chapter 7 relief, which essentially allowed them to walk away from their obligations.

Under the new law, more of those individuals are required to file for Chapter 13 bankruptcy and submit to a means-tested, court-ordered repayment plan. The law makes exceptions for the poor and elderly, as well as extraordinary cases involving debt that results from medical expenses, military service or divorce.

Not that any of those carve-outs stopped such Democrats as Senator Ted Kennedy from denouncing the reform as "a bill for which the credit-card industry hopes to squeeze an extra few dollars a month out of Americans who are down on their luck." Consumers Union called the legislation a "disaster," and the National Association of Consumer Bank Attorneys said adequate bankruptcy relief would no longer be available to the average person. For the Consumers Union, in particular, this rhetoric fits its pattern of being wrong on nearly every antitrust, consumer finance or telecommunications issue of the day.

Today, the number of bankruptcy filings is down some two-thirds from what it's been in recent years. Partly this has to do with people rushing to file for Chapter 7 before the law took effect last October. But there are also indications that people are responding to the new incentives.

In the past, about 20% of bankruptcy filers have had incomes above the national median. But since the law took effect, nearly all filers are below the median. One plausible explanation is that many past filers were abusing the system. They didn't really need bankruptcy protection, and now that there's a test of their income and assets in place that might compel them to repay their debts, they've decided not to file.

That's good news for businesses and consumers alike. Abuse of the bankruptcy laws drives up the cost of credit for everyone and reduces credit availability at the margin. When people are allowed to exploit the bankruptcy code and burn their lenders, others are left to pick up the tab.

It will probably be another year or so before long-term trends can be projected, and the economy will remain an important factor. But the early returns are promising and show that Congress did the right thing by ignoring the doomsayers.

DOJ_NMG_0086117

CIVIL RIGHTS:

NAACP Decries Fine For Couture (RTD)

By Jim Nolan, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch, October 25, 2006

Ex-officer convicted of manslaughter in traffic-stop shooting

Leaders of the state and Richmond-area branches of the NAACP yesterday decried the $2,500 fine imposed against a former police officer convicted of manslaughter in the May 29, 2004, shooting death of Santanna Olavarria.

On Friday, a jury convicted Michael Couture, 33, of manslaughter. Two hours later, the jury returned with a recommended sentence of $2,500 and no jail time, which the judge imposed. Couture could have faced up to 10 years in prison.

"This sends a message that black people's lives have very little value to citizens, the criminal justice system and all other institutions in this society," the NAACP leaders said in a joint statement issued at a news conference yesterday afternoon.

The leaders also called for the Justice Department to pursue a civil-rights investigation into the shooting, in which then-officer Couture fatally shot the 21-year-old Olavarria following a traffic stop in the city's East End.

"Life has to be more valued," said Rayfield Vines Jr., head of the Henrico County chapter of the NAACP. "We are going to insist people give life more value."

In February 2005, Police Chief Rodney Monroe forwarded all of the department's police-involved shooting cases to the Justice Department for investigation, including the Olavarria shooting. To date, there have been no federal charges filed in the Olavarria case.

Couture is believed to be the first police officer in the modern history of the city's police department to have been convicted of a homicide while on duty.

After the verdict last Friday, Commonwealth's Attorney Michael N. Herring said he was satisfied with the decision but disappointed with the absence of jail time in the punishment recommended by the jury.

Last fall, Couture's first trial in the Olavarria killing on a second-degree murder charge ended in a hung jury. Herring presented the evidence to a grand jury this year, which returned an indictment of manslaughter against Couture.

King Salim Khalfani, executive director of the Virginia State Conference of the NAACP, had criticized the police training and screening process that made Couture a Richmond officer. He also had criticized Herring for not retrying the second-degree murder charges.

But yesterday, he had to acknowledge that it was a mixed-race jury, not a prosecutor, that gave an ex-officer a fine for a killing.

"It's not just a police issue," Khalfani said. "Citizens made this decision. . . .

"There's a Confederate mentality that even affects black folks, who don't have a love for self."

Contact staff writer Jim Nolan at jnolan@timesdispatch.com or (804) 649-6061.

Two Jailers Indicted, Another Pleads Guilty In Inmate Assaults (AP)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP, October 25, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A former jailer at a regional prison in Louisville has pleaded guilty to assaulting an inmate and is working with federal prosecutors in a case against two former correctional supervisors accused of similar crimes, the U.S. Justice Department said Tuesday.

Former Winston-Choctaw County Regional Correctional Facility Deputy Warden Scotty L. Graham and former Captain David G. Mitchell are charged with violating the inmates' civil rights, conspiring to obstruct justice and providing false statements, the Justice Department said.

Former officer Marcus Coleman already has pleaded guilty to similar charges, the Justice Department said, and has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

An indictment unsealed Tuesday in Washington accuses Graham and Mitchell of assaulting an inmate in October 2001 with a device known as a "shock stick." Mitchell is charged with an additional civil rights violation for allegedly attacking another inmate the same day.

Details of the alleged attacks were not available.

"The details will come out if there's any sort of trial proceeding," said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson.

DOJ_NMG_0086118

Mitchell and Graham face penalties of 10 years in prison on each civil rights violation and obstruction charges, and a maximum five-year sentence on the conspiracy charges.

Telephone numbers for both men were disconnected on Tuesday.

Coleman told U.S. District Judge Michael Mills in Oxford on Sept. 28 that he and "Mitchell assaulted the inmate and ... Graham encouraged them to continue the assault in a location where there would not be any witnesses," the Justice Department says.

Charles Tillery, chief operating officer of the prison, contacted on Tuesday by The Associated Press, said he was not familiar enough with the charges to comment. He said Warden Ed Hargett was not available.

Sheriff Walter Coburn, who runs the facility as part of an agreement with the Mississippi Department of Corrections, said he was elected in 2003 and the alleged assaults happened before he took office in January 2004.

"I don't mind commenting but I'm not going to do it over the phone," Coburn said. "If you send somebody down here where I can look them in the face, then I'll comment."

MDOC spokeswoman Tara Booth said corrections officials would have no comment.

The Louisville facility opened in March 1999 and houses a combination of about 374 state and county inmates, Tillery said. The facility in Louisville, some 100 miles northeast of Jackson, is one of 11 regional facilities operated by the MDOC and county governments.

It was not immediately clear whether the people assaulted were state prisoners or county inmates.

Federal Oversight Of Mental Health Plan To Be Lifted (HONADV)

By Ken Kobayashi, Advertiser Staff Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, October 25, 2006

A federal judge this morning cleared the way for the lifting on Nov. 30 of the federal oversight over the state's efforts to comply with a community mental health plan to serve Hawai'i's estimated 11,000 seriously mentally ill residents.

U. S. District Judge David Ezra essentially approved the latest federal magistrate's status report on the state efforts.

Although U. S. Magistrate Judge Kevin Chang could not say in his report in August that the state met a June 30 deadline to be in substantial compliance with the plan, he said the state made progress and he recommended the lifting of the oversight on Nov. 30.

"This case will simply terminate (on Nov. 30)," Judge Ezra said.

Attorney General Mark Bennett said even with the lifting of the federal oversight, the state will continue to seek to improve the mental health services.

"We will keep our noses to the grindstone," he said.

The state has been under federal oversight for 15 years as a result of a Justice Department lawsuit alleging violations the constitutional rights of patients at Hawai'i State Hospital.

The hospital emerged from the oversight in late 2004, but the oversight continued over the community plan aimed at providing adequate services to the mentally ill in the community.

Justice Department attorneys agreed to the lifting of the oversight on Nov. 30 after the state raised concerns about whether the federal oversight could continue beyond June 30.

The community plan is aimed at providing adequate treatment, services and housing for the mentally ill.

Reach Ken Kobayashi at kkobayashi@honoluluadvertiser.com or 525-8030.

Studies Look For Reasons Behind Racial Disparities In Health Care (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Racial minorities are less likely to undergo major surgeries at the hospitals where those operations are done best, and black patients at Medicare HMOs fare worse than whites on several health measures regardless of plan quality, according to studies being released today.

The two studies in today's issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association, plus a third showing that black women are less likely than their white counterparts to survive breast cancer, add to the voluminous evidence that the U.S. health-care system works differently for minorities than for whites despite years of efforts to erase racial disparities.

Studies have demonstrated that blacks and other minorities are far less likely than whites to receive many types of care, such as appendectomies, heart bypass surgery, or basic tests and drugs for heart disease and diabetes. Minorities on average are more prone to illness, have more complications and recover more slowly. They also are more likely to die from their illnesses, and to die younger.

DOJ_NMG_0086119

But while the persistent disparities are well-documented, the causes remain the focus of research and debate. One explanation is that minorities tend to be poorer and less educated, with less access to care. And they tend to live in places where doctors and hospitals provide lower quality care than elsewhere. Others suspect cultural or biological differences play a role, and there is a long-running debate about whether subtle racism infects the health-care system.

Major medical organizations, private foundations and government health agencies have begun a host of studies, programs and initiatives in the past decade to try to close the gap.

In one new study, researchers at the UCLA medical school studied 719,608 patients who underwent one of 10 major operations -- including knee replacement, heart bypass and lung cancer surgeries -- over a five-year period.

They found that blacks, Hispanics and Asians were less likely than whites to receive care at hospitals that perform a high volume of the surgeries and excel in them. Minority patients were more likely to have their operations at low-volume hospitals, where mortality rates tend to be higher. The same was true for uninsured and Medicaid patients, who are disproportionately minorities.

"The current study demonstrates a significant disparity in the distribution of patients at high- and low-volume hospitals with respect to race/ethnicity and insurance status," the authors wrote.

The racial disparities remained even after accounting for income, age and how close a person lived to high- and low-volume hospitals. The researchers suggest that inadequate transportation or the lack of knowledge among minorities about hospital quality could be factors. Minorities are underrepresented among surgeons, and physicians who care for black patients are less likely to be board certified in a specialty and may have a harder time getting access to the better hospitals for their patients.

"Everyone wants to improve quality, but it's difficult," said Clifford Y. Ko, a co-author and professor of surgery at UCLA. "Not everyone can go to these high-volume places. . . . I personally think that instead of identifying one out of however many hospitals that people should go to that might have good outcomes, we should try to improve care at all hospitals."

A second study, led by Amal N. Trivedi, assistant professor of community health at Brown University, found that blacks do worse than whites in controlling blood pressure, blood sugar and cholesterol levels despite quality improvements at Medicare HMOs that have succeeded in shrinking gaps in care received by minorities and whites. The study, which looked at more than 430,000 patients in 151 plans, found that the disparity existed in both high- and low-quality Medicare HMOs -- undercutting the theory that blacks fare worse because they receive their care from lower quality providers.

"Across the board, black enrollees have lower performance on these measures," Trivedi said in an interview. "And the gaps were wide. . . . Even high-quality plans do not provide effective medical treatment for all of their patients."

Health plans should examine whether black patients lack access to medication or cannot afford it, because drugs can be effective in controlling conditions such as high cholesterol, blood pressure and blood sugar, Trivedi said. It also is worth trying to figure out whether black enrollees tend to get their care from lower-quality physicians within plans, he said.

"We can't say specifically why the gaps exist in each plan," Trivedi said. "It's probably a shared responsibility of plans, providers and patients. There's probably not one factor that explains all of the disparity, but health plans do play an important role."

In the breast cancer study, published online Monday in the journal Cancer, researchers from the University of Texas M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston examined 2,140 patients who took part in clinical trails at the cancer center from 1975 to 2000. They found that black women had lower survival rates than white and Hispanic women, and that black patients had more advanced cancer at the time of treatment.

Previous studies with similar results have concluded that less frequent screening, less aggressive treatment and different access to care may be factors in lower survival rates for black women. But because all women in the new study received the same treatment, researchers think that breast cancer tumors may be more aggressive and less responsive to treatment in black women.

"These findings should prompt additional research on how we can improve outcomes for African American patients by understanding and addressing tumor biology," said Wendy Woodward, an assistant professor of radiation oncology at the cancer center and lead author of the study.

Virginia Battle On Same-sex 'Marriage' Down To Wire (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

RICHMOND -- The fight over a proposed constitutional ban of same-sex "marriage" is heating up as both sides of the debate deliver their final sales pitches two weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

DOJ_NMG_0086120

Yesterday, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, and his father-in-law, former Gov. A. Linwood Holton Jr., a Republican, encouraged Virginians to oppose the amendment, saying the proposal is excessive because the state already defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman and its "ambiguous" language could lead to unintended consequences for unmarried couples.

"In states that have passed similar language, the ability of partners who are not married to obtain the social service and other protections of family courts have been thrown into jeopardy by this language, and I think that would be a very negative consequence," Mr. Kaine said, before signing with his wife and Mr. Holton, a statement from 200 lawyers and legal scholars in opposition of the amendment.

"We're talking in this amendment about fooling around with [the Virginia Constitution] in a way that will create confusion and unfortunately litigation for two or three generations," said Mr. Holton, who has at times been at odds with Republicans for supporting Democrats. "It just runs a serious risk of messing up our constitution."

Their remarks clash with the opinions of most Republicans, including Lt. Gov. Bill Bolling, Attorney General Bob McDonnell and Sen. George Allen, who say traditional marriage must be protected from "activist judges."

"The proposed amendment preserves marriage as a union solely between one man and one woman, while not limiting or infringing upon the current legal or civil rights of unmarried Virginians," Mr. McDonnell said yesterday. "The argument regarding alleged unintended consequences is completely wrong and legally unsupportable."

Political analysts agree that the amendment could motivate conservatives to turn out for Mr. Allen, who is in a tight race against Democrat James H. Webb Jr. for the U.S. Senate. Mr. Webb opposes the amendment.

A poll conducted by The Washington Post earlier this month showed that 53 percent of Virginians support the marriage amendment, while 43 percent oppose it.

The proposed amendment in Virginia, which the General Assembly overwhelmingly passed in consecutive legislative sessions, has fueled an emotional and costly campaign, according to financial reports filed with the State Board of Elections.

The Commonwealth Coalition, a group of homosexual rights activists and religious and business organizations, has raised $761,089 since July 1 and has spent $390,316 trying to defeat the amendment.

Amendment supporter Va4marriage.org, an affiliate of the Richmond-based Family Foundation, has raised $204,667 and spent $136,915 over the same period.

Nationwide, homosexual rights activists hope the tide turns this year as voters in eight states -- including Virginia, South Carolina, Tennessee and Colorado -- decide Nov. 7 whether to approve similar constitutional bans.

Recent history shows they are going against the odds. So far, voters in 20 states have approved such amendments.

"The proponents of the amendment always have the upper hand," Mr. Kaine said. "So we are all standing here fighting the good fight, recognizing we are fighting an uphill battle."

Anne Holton, Mr. Kaine's wife and a former family court judge, said one of the reasons these amendments have been so successful "is that folks think it is pro-marriage."

"It is false advertising to say this is a pro-marriage amendment," she said. "It does absolutely nothing to protect or strengthen marriage. ... This may be the time when people stand up and say, 'Wait a minute. What ... is this all about?' "

She said the amendment could hurt child-custody laws and undermine the domestic-violence laws for both homosexual and unmarried heterosexual couples.

Politically, the battle has fallen largely along party lines.

At a debate Monday in Richmond, Delegate Robert G. Marshall, Prince William County Republican, reportedly said that "marriage is under attack" and that passing the amendment would "stop the gay agenda."

Last week, Delegates Franklin P. Hall and Dwight Clinton Jones, Richmond Democrats, summed up the opposition of six members of the Richmond delegation.

"We are particularly concerned about removing the protections of our domestic-violence laws from unmarried victims, depriving unmarried couples of the comfort of their loved ones in time of medical crisis, or exposing Virginia businesses ... to an unpredictable risk of litigation and the inability to stay competitive in hiring the best employees in a very competitive job market," they said.

Leaders on both sides of the issue are targeting college campuses, trying to woo young voters. The Associated Press reported that there were more than 400,000 registered voters ages 18 to 25 in Virginia last year, according to the State Board of Elections.

DOJ_NMG_0086121

ANTITRUST:

Carlyle-Led Steel Deal Spotlights Unheralded Side Of Private Equity (WSJ)

By Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

John Maneely Co., a maker of steel tubing that is owned by private-equity giant Carlyle Group, is expected to announce a merger with Atlas Tube Inc. today in a deal valued at almost $1.5 billion, including stock and debt.

The move to bulk up Maneely comes amid a boom in private-equity transactions, in which groups like Carlyle team up to buy companies they believe are undervalued -- often using elaborate financial arrangements -- with hopes of selling them later at a profit.

While the proposed Maneely transaction is relatively small, it illustrates how not all these deals are about financial maneuvering. In this case, Carlyle is buying a rival manufacturer in order to gain economies of scale. Both Maneely and family-owned Atlas manufacture tubing used in the construction industry.

The merger with Atlas, which is based in Harrow, Ontario, will make Carlyle the parent of the largest North American maker of steel tubing, with sales in excess of $2 billion, the companies say.

When Carlyle Group acquired Maneely earlier this year, it seemed counterintuitive, given that costs for energy and raw materials such as iron ore were soaring, potentially eroding profit margins and making it a high-cost business to get into. At the same time, competition was stiff from lower-cost producers such as China. While the U.S. imposes tariffs on steel, there are none on steel-based products such as tubing.

Carlyle's hope is that there will be a role for local manufacturers if they had enough scale, says Daniel Pryor, a managing director at Carlyle. He described the proposed deal as the first in a series of mergers intended to give the steel-tube maker critical mass.

"We thought if we could improve systems and processes," he says, "we could get the material costs down substantially."

Atlas is a family-owned company whose head, Barry Zekelman, inherited the business at the age of 19 following the death of his father. He built the firm from a company with sales of two million Canadian dollars ($1.77 million) 20 years ago, to a company that last year had revenue of C$1.3 billion. He decided to sell to Carlyle, he says, "because I want to make my company stronger by giving it a more powerful platform." Mr. Zekelman will stay on as head of commercial and manufacturing for the combined entity.

If Sergio Leone Made A Movie About Antitrust . (WSJ)

By HOLMAN W. JENKINS

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Holman W. Jenkins Jr. is a member of the editorial board of The Wall Street Journal and writes editorials and the weekly Business World column.

Mr. Jenkins joined the Journal in May 1992 as a writer for the editorial page in New York. In February 1994, he moved to Hong Kong as editor of The Asian Wall Street Journal's editorial page. He returned to the domestic Journal in December 1995 as a member of the paper's editorial board and was based in San Francisco. In April 1997, he returned to the Journal's New York office. Mr. Jenkins won a 1997 Gerald Loeb Award for distinguished business and financial coverage.

Born in Philadelphia, Mr. Jenkins received a bachelor's degree from Hobart and William Smith Colleges in Geneva, N.Y. He received a master's degree in journalism from Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill., and studied at the University of Michigan on a journalism fellowship.

Mr. Jenkins invites comments to holman.jenkins@wsj.com1.

If Sergio Leone Made a Movie About Antitrust . . .

October 25, 2006; Page A15

Stolt-Nielsen is a name that won't ring many bells unless your peculiar interest is ocean shipping or knotty business cases that might tempt the Supreme Court's intervention.

Or perhaps you are a corporate counsel for a major international company who just happened to be wondering, out of idle curiosity, whether the amnesty deals signed by the Justice Department in price-fixing cases are worth the paper they're written on. Just a theoretical interest, of course . . .

Here's Stolt's tale of woe. The company is one of a handful of specialty chemical haulers that are dwarfed in size and clout by their customers, including Dow Chemical, DuPont, Shell and BP. It is deemed an abomination in some circles that these ship operators colluded over rates for several years, pocketing in "excess profits" a sum that by now has been vastly exceeded by the legal bills of all involved in the subsequent litigation (legal bills that are naturally passed on to consumers and taxpayers).

DOJ_NMG_0086122

Now Stolt finds itself hanging on whether the Supreme Court will hear its plea challenging the Justice Department's right to revoke an amnesty deal granted to Stolt in return for its help in cracking the cartel.

For what follows it's helpful to decide how nefarious you really think the underlying offense is. Advocates of price-fixing prosecutions argue that consumers are harmed by higher prices, but by this standard consumers are harmed by any price above zero.

It seems right to mention that producers are people too and are harmed by lower prices. Whose side should we take? Do consumers have any particular "rights" here? Not that we can see. The only "rights" in jeopardy are those of producers, whose freedom of contract and property are sacrificed on the altar of a theorized higher good, known as "efficiency."

Yet the empirical record of this higher good is murky. In practice, price-fixing seems mainly a temptation to companies seeking to preserve capacity in periods of weak pricing. Take Stolt: It and its rivals colluded at a time when their customers were consolidating and Stolt was piling up debt to bring a new generation of chemical tankers into the marketplace. Indeed, these features seem to be a hallmark of many price-fixing prosecutions: cyclical commodity markets; large customers; suppliers who face high fixed costs to maintain the capacity required by those customers.

What really goes on when companies collude could stand some fresh examination, but trustbusters are not likely to question the provenance of their last breadstick. On the contrary, Justice and its foreign counterparts have become reliant on -- even made a growth business out of -- prosecuting price-fixing as the last, unambiguous antitrust sin.

The new era began in 1993 when a Justice Department amnesty program was retooled to make it more enticing for firms to rat out their fellow miscreants in return for guaranteed leniency. The approach has been nothing if not fruitful: Brought to the bar have been dozens of industries, including bulk vitamins, animal-feed additives, copper concentrate, cement, hydrogen peroxide, sorbic acid, creosote, naphthalene, polyethylene film, citric acid and sodium gluconate.

That's a lot of price fixing, suggesting that intermittent collusion has long been a feature of markets for many industrial inputs and somehow the world has prospered anyway. Yet peer into the heart of the Stolt dispute, and the problem is precisely Justice's tender doubts about the sincerity of Stolt management's remorse for its crimes.

By the time the company showed up on Justice's doorstep, after all, the details of the plot had been well-aired in an executive whistleblower's private lawsuit and, later, in a front-page Journal story. Stolt's approach to Justice, in spirit if not word, was roughly: "The cat's out of the bag. Let's cut our losses by finking on our erstwhile partners and beat them into the amnesty program."

Let it be added that cartel activities have been a shipping tradition since long before antitrust was invented, and continue today in various form under grandfathered exemptions to the antitrust laws. Of Norwegian birth, Stolt is controlled by a shipping family that has been in the business since 1891.

Cynical bargain or not, Justice granted Stolt immunity in return for Stolt coughing up the evidence to allow the successful prosecution of its fellow conspirators (two Norwegian firms, one Japanese). Only after the cases were concluded did Justice renege on grounds that Stolt's management had allowed the collusion to continue for several months between the whistleblower's internal hullabaloo and Stolt's decision to seek amnesty. Of course, Justice had known all this from day one and had chosen to sign the agreement and benefit from Stolt's help anyway.

Nine petitioners, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, have joined Stolt in urging the Supreme Court to find that Justice has no business indicting Stolt and its employees until the lower courts have definitively ruled the amnesty deal invalid. In fact, the one federal court that looked into the matter ruled that Stolt had upheld its end of the bargain and ordered Justice to do likewise.

Here's our view: At best, antitrust is a questionable form of economic regulation that places a highly speculative theory of consumer good ahead of the actual, non-controversial rights of producers to sell on terms of their own choosing. Justice has done itself no favors by calling into question the reliability of its amnesty promises. The Gordian knot here is its excessive moralizing of its own position. With its brain a little less clouded by self-righteousness, the department might notice that its campaign to impose its dubious ideal of price regulation on the world might actually be helped if it grew up a little about antitrust.

Thomson Nears Plan To Put Learning Unit On Block (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman In New York And Elena Cherney In Toronto

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Publishing and information giant Thomson Corp. is near a plan to put its Thomson Learning division on the auction block, in a deal that could fetch somewhere north of $5 billion, said people familiar with the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0086123

A deal would separate the company's second-largest unit as measured both by revenue and operating income. And it would concentrate Thomson's broad operating lines around legal, financial and scientific-information businesses. Analysts have been calling for a sale of Thomson Learning because it doesn't fit with the company's strategy of selling to professionals. The Learning division also wasn't moving as quickly to sales of electronic products as had been hoped.

The company has been a solid performer over the past year, with its shares climbing about 18% year-to-date, versus a 9% rise for an index of publishing companies maintained by data provider Baseline, itself a Thomson unit.

Moving From Historic Roots

In recent years, Thomson has adeptly exited certain businesses that subsequently declined in profitability. Starting in the late 1990s, the company began shedding newspaper assets -- a move away from its historic roots as a Canadian-based newspaper empire -- to refashion itself as an information provider, with more of its services delivered online instead of in print. The sales included The Globe and Mail as well as other smaller dailies.

A company spokesman declined to comment on the planned sale.

Last year, Thomson Learning produced $2.3 billion in revenue and operating income before taxes of $350 million. The unit's earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization -- a measure commonly used in the publishing industry -- is higher than that figure, people familiar with the matter say. These people said that the business should be able to fetch more than 10 times its annual Ebitda, getting a potential sale price greater than $5 billion.

Thomson Learning's textbooks, testing and certification materials are used by colleges and distance-learning organizations, and include its Thomson Wadsworth, Thomson Gale and Thomson Delmar imprints. The unit also maintains a number of online learning courses and its own university, Universitas 21 Global, which issues graduate degrees through online instruction.

Thomson Learning also maintains a unit called Prometric, which designs and processes tests used inside corporations, for the public sector and counts as clients the National Association of Securities Dealers and the National Board of Medical Examiners.

More recently, Chief Executive Richard Harrington has talked about the company's shift from an information provider to a developer of software and high-end analytics. The company embarked on a cost-cutting program earlier this year to boost efficiency and said it will shed about 1,000 of its 40,000 employees world-wide.

In the second quarter, the company said earnings came to $171 million, down from $301 million because of charges related to cost-cutting in the recent quarter. The previous year's results also included a one-time gain. Quarterly revenue increased 7% to $2.1 billion from $1.97 billion last year.

Demand for Publishing Services

The Legal and Regulatory group increased its revenue by 9% to $923 million, while Thomson Financial, which provides electronic financial information, increased by 6% to $499 million.

The Learning division's revenue was $456 million, or 5% higher than in the same period a year earlier. The business growth was fueled by strong demand for some of the company's publishing services and by textbooks for arts and sciences and for business and economics students. E-learning results, however, were weak, the company said.

The company said that it anticipated stronger performance in the third and fourth quarters, which are typically stronger for the academic lines of business. The company is scheduled to report third-quarter earnings tomorrow.

Write to Dennis K. Berman at dennis.berman@wsj.com1 and Elena Cherney at elena.cherney@wsj.com2

EU Probes Guarantee For Loan To TVO (AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium --EU antitrust regulators on Tuesday opened an investigation into a French state guarantee for a euro570 million (US$716 million) bank loan to Finnish power company Teollisuuden Voima Oy that may have helped a French-German supplier win a contract to build Finland's newest nuclear plant.

The European Commission said the guarantee may have cut TVO's financial costs below normal market levels -- and could have encouraged the company to pick Areva-Siemens to build the first new European reactor in more than 10 years.

"The guarantee may also have lowered the financial costs linked to the Areva/Siemens offer for TVO and, thereby helped the consortium Areva/Siemens to get the contract for the construction of the new nuclear power plant," it said.

The EU executive said it would quiz France about the loan -- the interest rate and the guarantee premium TVO paid the French government -- to find out if it gave TVO a cheaper deal and an unfair advantage over rivals.

It said it was acting on two complaints about the guarantee the French state export credit insurance agency Coface gave to TVO to purchase equipment from France's Areva-Framatome.

Lauri Piekkari, chief financial officer of TVO, said the company had not directly received financial support.

DOJ_NMG_0086124

"The suspicion is whether the French government's guarantee has been too generous," Piekkari told reporters in Helsinki. The investigation won't affect the timetable of the already twice-delayed project, he said.

In July, TVO said completion of Finland's fifth nuclear reactor will be delayed by a year and that the plant would not be in commercial operation until the second quarter of 2010.

The supplier of the 1,600-megawatt reactor, the French-German consortium Areva-Siemens, was unable to complete the project on time because of the size and demands of the construction, TVO said. Earlier, TVO had announced a delay of several months caused by faulty concrete.

Construction of the euro3-billion (US$3.7-billion) atomic reactor at Olkiluoto began last year after the government gave it final approval. It is situated 250 kilometers (155 miles) northwest of the capital, at the site of two 750-megawatt nuclear units.

Besides the Olkiluoto units, there are two 500-megawatt reactors at Loviisa, 90 kilometers (55 miles) east of Helsinki. The four produce more than a quarter of Finland's electricity.

On the Net:

TVO, http://www.tvo.fi

ENVIRONMENT:

Hopes Brighten For Curb On Damaging Ocean Fishing (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, October 25, 2006

Less than 1 percent of the world's commercial fish catch comes from trawling the ocean floor of the high seas.

But the environmental impact is large - so large that many countries ban or severely restrict the practice within their territorial waters. This week, an international effort to curb bottom-trawling on the open ocean got a significant boost. In a letter to US negotiators at the United Nations on Monday, a top State Department official set out Washington's unambiguous support for a halt to the practice "until such time as conservation and management measures are adopted."

UN negotiators are trying to craft a proposal to submit to the General Assembly for a vote in early December.

Enacting the moratorium "would be a very big deal," says Joshua Reichert, who heads the environment program at the Pew Charitable Trusts in Philadelphia.

Countries have been cracking down on the practice inside their exclusive economic zones. In March, for example, the US banned bottom-trawling in waters covering some 150,000 square miles off the US West Coast. Europeans have banned the practice in the Mediterranean at depths greater than 3,200 feet. But outside the 200-mile exclusive economic zones that nations claim, bottom-trawling continues unabated.

Powerful trawlers drag nets across the ocean bottom at depths of up to 1.5 miles. This enables them to reach once inaccessible habitats such as undersea islands known as sea mounts. The nets, with yawning maws up to 200 feet across, are weighted with large steel "doors" that weigh up to 5 tons each. The idea is to "tickle" the bottom so that fish there rise into the path of the open net. But the doors, as well as rollers or wheels along the bottom of the net's opening, rip up or crush deep-sea coral reefs, colonies of sponges, and other structure-forming bottom dwellers. For instance, in 1997 during a year's fishing along a formation in the Pacific called the South Tasman Rise, 20 trawlers ripped up an estimated 10,000 tons of coral in the process of harvesting 4,000 tons of their target species, orange roughy, according to conservation groups.

"It's like clear-cutting a forest to capture squirrels," Mr. Reichert says.

Such concerns have sparked the interest in a worldwide moratorium on the practice so UN negotiators can work out rules to regulate the practice.

The administration's stance on this critical marine-conservation issue may come as a surprise to some, given what many environmentalists call a shaky White House record on other environmental issues. But the president appears to have a deep personal concern about overfishing, Reichert says. That concern was manifest most recently in June when the president set aside the world's largest marine reserve, stretching some 1,400 miles along the Northwestern Hawaiian Islands.

When President Bush issued a policy statement on bottom-trawling on Oct. 2, some opponents of the moratorium reportedly detected some leeway for a less severe alternative. Monday's letter from Claudia McMurray, assistant secretary of State for oceans and international environmental and scientific affairs, appears to remove any wiggle room, observers say.

A moratorium would have little global economic impact, supporters say. Of nearly 84 million tons of fish hauled from the oceans in 2001, bottom-trawling on the high seas accounted for only 0.2 to 0.25 percent of the total, according to a 2004 report by the World Conservation Union, based in Geneva. Members of the European Community account for the biggest share of the high-seas take, with Spain leading the list. For countries using the approach, bottom trawling appears to be the answer to declining fisheries closer to shore. And it is far more efficient - many argue ruthlessly so - than more targeted forms of fishing on the high seas.

DOJ_NMG_0086125

Angst over the effects of bottom-trawling dates back hundreds of years, says Roger McManus, senior director of Conservation International's global marine division. But only within the past 10 to 15 years has technology allowed large trawlers to locate and exploit fish that thrive around deep-sea geological features such as sea mounts, underwater canyons, or deep coral reefs.

These isolated features are widely scattered through the oceans. And their ecological health affects the biological productivity of the entire column of water above them, researchers say. These biological hot spots become mid-ocean oases for large fin fish or mammals, such as tuna or whales, that migrate over vast distances and need their version of in-flight refueling. Once a trawler's net bulldozes its way across these habitats, it can take centuries for them to recover, because the organisms there are slow-growing and slow to reproduce, notes Jeremy Collie, an oceanographer at the University of Rhode Island's Graduate School of Oceanography.

Moreover, marine science still knows little about the range of creatures that thrive around these features. Efforts such as the international Census of Marine Life are trying to close the gap, but "we're still in the exploratory phase," Dr. Collie says. "The science is pretty fragmentary."

While some researchers say that the "townies" living in these oases often are species unique to that spot, others suspect that species-exchange among these isolated habitats occurs - a critical point if the UN is to develop rules to manage these ecosystems.

EU, U.S. Meet In Finland To Discuss Climate Change, Environmental Issues (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 25, 2006

(AP) - HELSINKI, Finland-Officials from the United States and the European Union - split over the Kyoto protocol - met Tuesday in Finland to discuss ways of improving cooperation on environmental issues.

The EU-U.S. meeting is a follow-up to a summit held in Austria in June, when both sides pledged to work "more closely to address the serious and long-term challenge of climate change, biodiversity loss and air pollution."

Signed in 1997, the Kyoto protocol came into force in February 2005 after it was ratified by the required number of nations, including EU members. It requires signatories to cut emissions of six greenhouse gases to 5 percent below 1990 levels by 2012.

The United States rejected the Kyoto targets as placing an unnecessary burden on its economy, drawing criticism from environmental campaigners who say American pollution is responsible for one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gases.

No decisions will be taken at the Helsinki meeting, hosted by the Environment Ministry, but the aim is to explore ways of increasing trans-Atlantic cooperation on environmental questions, Finnish officials said.

The topics of discussion include reducing greenhouse gas emissions, carbon capture and storage, renewable energy sources and promoting cleaner and more efficient vehicles, the ministry said.

The two-day seminar comes during Finland's six-month rotating presidency of the 25-member European bloc that ends in December.

Oil-, Gas-Lease Sales Halted In Gulf Coast (WSJ)

By Maya Jackson Randall

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The state of Louisiana and the U.S. Department of the Interior Tuesday said they have agreed to settle a lawsuit over oil and natural-gas leasing in federal waters off Louisiana's coast, with the agency agreeing to delay future offshore lease sales pending a complete environmental analysis.

Meanwhile, Louisiana, under the pact, won't object to the department issuing leases to energy companies seeking to produce oil and natural gas under Lease Sale 200, which encompasses 20.4 million acres in the Western Gulf of Mexico.

Lease Sale 200 attracted about $341 million in bids from 62 companies looking to produce oil and gas there. Development of the leases could result in as much as 252 million barrels of oil and 1.44 trillion cubic feet of gas, the Interior Department said.

Louisiana had sued the department in July, charging that it did not conduct a proper environmental review for its Lease Sale 200 because it didn't take into account coastal environmental damage caused by drilling as well as that brought on by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year.

The move was seen as part of the state's battle to receive a bigger share of the revenue generated by oil and gas produced in federal waters off its coast.

DOJ_NMG_0086126

"Resolving this dispute by agreement rather than litigation benefits our nation's energy security by assuring we can move ahead on the leases issued in Lease Sale 200," Steve Allred, the Interior Department's assistant secretary for land and minerals management, said in a statement.

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco called the settlement "a historic victory" for Louisiana and states' rights.

"This victory will ensure that our state has a real seat at the table, controlling our own fate as the federal government's number one offshore energy partner," Ms. Blanco said.

Louisiana fought the lease sale, she said, because it didn't want the federal government to "get away with a cookie-cutter environmental assessment" that ignored the devastation to the state's coast during the 2005 hurricane season.

"No exploration plan will even be allowed on Western Gulf Lease Sale 200, which was held in August of this year, until each plan reflects an appropriate environmental analysis and approved by the state," Ms. Blanco said Tuesday.

Although pleased with the settlement, Ms. Blanco continued to press Congress to act on policies that could help her state. U.S. lawmakers should act on a new offshore oil and gas drilling policy that would allow Louisiana to share in a greater portion of the revenues coming from oil and gas production in federal waters off the state's coast, she said, pointing out that the state has already agreed that the new drilling revenues would all go to coastal protection and restoration.

"It's time for Congress to pass a revenue-sharing bill that will allow us to get on with the business of restoring our coast and protecting the communities that support this country's offshore energy policy," Ms. Blanco said.

House and Senate drilling proponents in Congress had hoped to pass a new drilling bill in September, but those plans failed. The bill would expand energy development offshore and would have allowed Gulf States like Louisiana to share some of the revenues. U.S. lawmakers have said they will take up the issue again after the November 7 congressional elections, but it will be difficult to broker a deal on the controversial issue.

Louisiana And U.S. In Accord To Review Gulf Drilling Plans (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 24 — Strengthening Louisiana's hand in its quest for money from Gulf of Mexico oil drilling, state and federal officials announced on Tuesday that stiffer environmental reviews would be conducted before such drilling occurs.

The state hopes that the reviews will bolster its case that it needs more federal money to restore its devastated coast.

The announcement settles a suit that sought to block Washington's sale of offshore tracts for oil and gas exploration. The suit, filed by Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, was part of the longtime quest for more of the $7 billion in royalties that Washington receives from the oil companies in the gulf.

Local officials put the state's current share at less than 0.5 percent.

Experts say Hurricane Katrina was all the more devastating because so much of the coast protecting New Orleans has been eroded, about 25 square miles a year. Hurricanes Katrina and Rita swept away an additional 217 square miles, the equivalent of 30 years of erosion, over three weeks.

Officials and environmentalists here deem the new accord as a major victory for the state, because it implicitly acknowledges that drilling for oil and gas off Louisiana harms the coastline and contributes to devastating erosion.

That, in turn, strengthens a push by the Louisiana Congressional delegation to obtain more oil and gas royalties out of the gulf, money that the state has said it will use to rebuild the coast.

The Senate has passed a bill that would give Louisiana and other coastal states 37.5 percent of the royalties. The House has yet to agree.

Under the new accord, the Interior Department will "go the extra mile," in the words of a spokesman, in studying at the effects of oil and gas work in the gulf under the state's eye.

The government will have to include the hurricanes' effects on the coast, and new leases will not be issued until the environmental effects are reviewed.

"It's huge," said Prof. Oliver A. Houck, an environmental law specialist at the Tulane University Law School who contributed an affidavit to the suit. "It gives the state a great deal more leverage to insist on a better money solution."

The suit was unusual in the context of a state that through successive governors has sought to appease, rather than confront, the oil and gas industry, which resists the idea that its activities have harmed the environment.

"It was like the calf accusing the cow," Professor Houck said. "The state has never taken that position. Suddenly, everything the environmentalists have been saying, the state was saying."

Governor Is Blunt To Bush (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan And Scott Martelle

DOJ_NMG_0086127

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

After weeks of subtle jabs at fellow Republicans in Congress and the White House, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger turned more blunt Tuesday in a tart letter to President Bush. Chiding the president for ignoring his plea for more leeway to toughen California's vehicle exhaust standards, Schwarzenegger complained about "the absence of a coherent federal policy" to stop global warming.

At the same time, Schwarzenegger's Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, dismissed the governor's detachment from Bush as a ruse. "Look, the Republicans are going down in this election, and Arnold Schwarzenegger is going with them, because he is part of the same team and has the same agenda," Angelides said Tuesday after a Bay Area speech to a raucous union crowd.

With the California election two weeks away, the back-and-forth captured the contrasting approaches that Schwarzenegger and Angelides are taking in the final stretch.

At tightly staged events this week in San Diego, Glendale and Oakland, Schwarzenegger has all but severed his Republican ties while playing up the value of bipartisan harmony.

He has also taken pains to widen his appeal beyond white Republican men, his most loyal supporters. At every stop, Schwarzenegger has surrounded himself with African Americans or Latinos and stuck to themes that resonate with Democrats, independents and women: the environment and education.

"They need money to refurbish this building here," Schwarzenegger said Tuesday as he toured an Oakland school to promote education bonds on the Nov. 7 ballot. "I mean, this is an old, old building, and I think that those children deserve better than that."

For his part, Angelides has raced around the state making partisan appeals to Democrats this week in an effort to maximize any boost he might get from his party's national surge in the run-up to the midterm election.

Corporate big shots are "doing better and better," but the middle class is "struggling under George Bush and Arnold Schwarzenegger," Angelides told union shop stewards at a labor conference near Oakland.

At a Pasadena picnic with 200 supporters Sunday, Angelides called Schwarzenegger a "Republican thoroughbred" pretending to be a Democrat. "In the closing days of this campaign, you won't find Arnold Schwarzenegger within 100 feet of another Republican," he said.

In what has become a rare nod to a conservative base that he once tended to assiduously, Schwarzenegger plans to appear Friday on "Hannity & Colmes," a Fox News television show to be taped on the Midway, the San Diego Aircraft Carrier Museum.

But that is an exception. For months, the governor has kept a distance from his party, a move seen as a strategic necessity in a state where just a little more than a third of registered voters are Republican. He has avoided public events with other GOP candidates and refused to endorse the party's staunchly conservative U.S. Senate nominee, former state Sen. Dick Mountjoy of Monrovia. And in an interview last week, Schwarzenegger sidestepped the question of how much he cares whether Republicans win other statewide races.

"To be honest with you, my focus right now is on really moving the state of California forward," he said, "and for me to get in there so I can finish all of what I envision for the future of California to be. And if this has a positive effect on the down-ticket, that's great."

As he campaigned Sunday in San Diego at black churches — a historic proving ground for Democrats — Schwarzenegger also dodged the question of whether he wants Republicans to keep control of Congress.

"I think that's a choice that the people have to make," he said. Pressed to state his own view, he said, "I myself will look at the list when I vote for my congressional delegation," and went on to praise members of both major parties.

At Faith Chapel Church of God in Christ, Schwarzenegger took another swipe at Bush and Republican congressional leaders during a doughnuts-and-orange-juice talk with children after a morning service with gospel music. He told them of steps he had taken to fight global warming and cut reliance on Mideast oil by promoting alternative energy, saying, "The sad story is that nationally, we don't have great leadership on that."

His letter to Bush, which was released Tuesday, made that case in surprisingly brusque terms. The state's request for a federal waiver to set vehicle emissions standards has been "ignored with no explanation," Schwarzenegger wrote, despite a personal letter from the governor to Bush in April.

A White House spokeswoman declined to comment directly on the letter, but said Bush had "an aggressive climate change strategy to reduce greenhouse gas intensity 18% by 2012."

The letter followed accusations by Democrats who lead the Legislature that Schwarzenegger took several steps in an executive order last week to undercut the state's new law capping greenhouse gas emissions.

DOJ_NMG_0086128

Through it all, the governor has rarely uttered a word about his rival, letting his television ads portray Angelides as a tax-and-spend politician of a bygone era.

As for Angelides, he has begun keeping a frenetic pace of public events to draw local media coverage to try to help compensate for his more modest TV ad presence. He has campaigned this week in Hollywood, Arcadia, Baldwin Park, Pasadena, Santa Ana, Santa Barbara, Sacramento, Hayward and San Francisco.

His tone is combative, his pitch sharply partisan as he tries to commandeer what he describes as a coast-to-coast "tidal wave" of Democratic victories.

"We are going to end this Republican culture of corruption," he told a crowd of Democratic volunteers and precinct walkers Sunday in Baldwin Park.

To capitalize on a national political climate that favors Democrats, Angelides will appear at a UCLA rally Thursday with party Chairman Howard Dean. On Friday, three of the party's biggest stars are slated to join him at a USC rally: Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa. The mayor, who declined for months to endorse Angelides, has not campaigned with him since the day he announced support for Angelides in early September.

The Democratic nominee has also stepped up his appeals to Latinos, in part by linking Schwarzenegger to a racially charged letter discouraging Orange County immigrants from voting — even though the governor has denounced the mailing. At a rally Monday on the steps of Orange County's Old Courthouse in Santa Ana, Angelides called the mailing part of "a consistent pattern of behavior by the Republican Party."

"Gov. Schwarzenegger himself has contributed to this situation," Angelides said, citing the governor's support for Proposition 187, the 1994 ballot measure to cut public services for illegal immigrants, and his support for the Minutemen border patrol force. (In recent months, Schwarzenegger has renounced Proposition 187 and hedged, even Tuesday, on whether the Minutemen are needed.)

"He's made derogatory remarks about Mexican Americans' ability to assimilate," Angelides said. "George Bush and Arnold Schwarzenegger set the wrong tone."

Angelides has also toughened his rhetoric in attacking Schwarzenegger's character. At a Santa Barbara park, where he gathered beneath oak trees with firefighters and other supporters, he denounced the governor's campaign fundraising as "a special interest pig fest" that belied his vow to clean up Sacramento.

"Gov. Schwarzenegger wants you to all believe he's changed," Angelides told the crowd. "You and I know men our age don't really ever change."

L.A. County Beaches Ranked Foulest In State (LAT)

By J. Michael Kennedy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Heal the Bay's summer report card shows new trouble in Long Beach but some improvements elsewhere along the California coast.

Los Angeles County predictably earned the dubious honor Tuesday of having the most polluted beaches in California.

Less predictably, Long Beach jumped out as the worst offender among the worst.

But having made those pronouncements, Heal the Bay, the environmental group that routinely conducts pollution studies along the California coast, declared this one a victory of sorts. The reason: a number of the usual cellar-dwellers passed with flying colors because of recent cleanup efforts.

Mark Gold, the executive director of the Santa Monica-based Heal the Bay, pointed to such perennial polluters as Will Rogers State Beach as examples of cleanup efforts along the coast that were starting to yield results.

"It was always one of the worst offenders," Gold said of Will Rogers, which earned an A rating in the organization's annual "End of Summer Beach Report Card."

The study, which grades more than 450 California beaches, bases its findings on levels of bacterial pollution in the water. Los Angeles County received a grade of F for 29 of its 97 testing stations. San Diego County was next with three F readings, while Orange County had one. There were 37 F ratings in the entire state, compared with 278 monitoring stations that received A ratings.

Gold described Long Beach as the "biggest surprise of the summer" because its beaches normally receive good grades for water quality. But this year, only three of the 25 monitoring stations got an A or B rating. Last year, 21 of 23 stations got either A or B grades.

Gold said the source of the pollution was most likely the Los Angeles River, which dumps into the ocean at Long Beach. He said one possibility is that shifts in sediment at the mouth of the river may have redirected pollution along the coast.

DOJ_NMG_0086129

The city's Marine Stadium, Mother's Beach and Colorado Lagoon have been closed for weeks because of pollutants traced to defective sewer pumps. But Gold said they were too isolated to have had such a widespread effect.

Darryl Sexton, the Long Beach city health officer, said he had not had a chance to examine the report and could not comment on it.

Gold said the next step in cleaning up the state's beaches was dependent on the passage in November of Proposition 84, which would provide $540 million to help maintain coastal waters.

"It's extremely critical," Gold said of the Clean Water and Coastal Protection Bond Act. It would provide $225 million to clean the Santa Monica, San Diego, San Francisco and Monterey bays, watersheds and rivers draining into them. The measure is opposed by several taxpayer organizations, which say it will be a cash cow for environmental groups and that paying back the $5.4-billion bond issue would drain about $350 million a year from the general fund.

Although Gold was upbeat about the report, other areas in Los Angeles County pulled down the grades for that strip of coastline. The Santa Monica and Redondo pier areas both earned Fs in the study, while Dockweiler State Beach and Manhattan Beach at the 28th Street drain earned Ds.

Also receiving poor grades, as it has in the past, was the beach at Avalon on Catalina. It has been plagued by the aging town sewer system, which is in need of repairs and updating.

In another recent study, Heal the Bay also took a more detailed look at the Santa Monica Pier, whose waters tested positive for large amounts of bacteria. The study said the predominant source of the bacteria was most likely the pollution pond in front of the pier storm drain, which is being cleaned up.

In other parts of the state, the beaches of Santa Barbara County suffered a marked decline this year, with six of the 20 monitoring stations receiving fair to poor grades. In Orange County, 90% of the beaches received A ratings, including Doheny Beach, a perennial polluter. Monarch Beach, in Dana Point, improved from an F last year to a B this year.

Overall, most of the state received good grades from Heal the Bay. Receiving A's were San Diego, Ventura, San Luis Obispo, Monterey, Santa Cruz, San Mateo, San Francisco, Sonoma and Humboldt counties.

Heal the Bay is one of the largest nonprofit environmental groups in Los Angeles County.

*

michael.kennedy@latimes.com

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New E-mail Scam Using FBI Name (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Think twice about answering e-mail from G-man.

A new Internet scam promising cash for responding to a document request claims to be from FBI Director Robert S. Mueller. The top government cop's request is followed by a second e-mail threatening that "failure to comply will result in charges being brought against the individual by the FBI."

"This e-mail is a hoax," the FBI said in an alert to consumers that was posted Tuesday on its Web site. "Do not respond."

The same e-mail address, which was not released, was used to send both messages, the FBI said.

The first, claiming to be penned by Mueller, advises recipients that they are eligible for a large sum of money that they can claim with an FBI Identification Record and a Certificate of Ownership. The e-mail includes official information, taken from the FBI Web site, that defines what the records are and how they can be obtained.

The follow-up e-mail appears to be sent from a lower-level FBI official, who demands that a fee be sent to "FBI Nigeria" which will issue the certificate.

"At this point the message becomes more threatening, stating the FBI has investigative programs which can track down those who fail to provide the requested documentation," the FBI said on its Web site.

The spammed scan is the second in as many months to appear to be from Mueller. In September, authorities were alerted to a circulating e-mail, which referenced Mueller's name and office address, that urged recipients to send money to secure prizes won in an international lottery.

E-Mail Hoax Claims To Be From FBI (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24, 2006 — Just because that e-mail says it comes from the FBI, doesn't mean you should trust it.

The FBI's Internet Crime Complaint Center has warned Internet users and others to be aware of a hoax e-mail that claims to come from FBI Director Robert Mueller and other FBI officials.

According to the Internet Crime Complaint Center — or IC3 — notice, the hoax e-mail advises the recipient that he is the beneficiary of a large sum of money. It states further that in order for him to claim the money, the recipient must provide an FBI Identification Record and a Certificate of Ownership.

The e-mail contains information lifted from the FBI's Web site that descibes what an Identification Record is and how to obtain it from the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Services Division.

The e-mail concludes with a threatening "If you fail to provide the Documents to us, we will charge you with the FBI and take our proper action against you for not proofing to us the legitimate of the fund you are about to receive. Faithfully Yours, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller, III"

FBI officials say the hoax is a typical Nigerian scam, which has become more prevalent in recent years. Many of the people who fall victim to these scams are elderly or foreign-born individuals.

Later, individuals receive a second, more threatening notice, claiming to come from Donna Uzzell, another senior FBI official, which says, "It has come to the attention of our Money Trafficking investigation department, that you have some funds valued at U.S $10.5 Million to your name. … You are under an observational /Investigation in connection with money laundering."

The warning from the FBI's Internet Crime Complaint Center, "At this point the message becomes more threatening, stating the FBI has investigative programs which can track down those who fail to provide the requested documentation. It further states failure to comply will result in charges being brought against the individual by the FBI. THIS E-MAIL IS A HOAX. DO NOT RESPOND. Be cautious when responding to requests or special offers delivered through unsolicited e-mail."

Feds Arrest Three, Seize $27M In Cocaine And Ice (ATBC)

The Atlanta Business Chronicle, October 25, 2006

Federal officials have busted three Mexican citizens living in metro Atlanta on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crystal methamphetamine ('ice").

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and the U.S. Attorney's Office jointly announced the filing of a federal criminal complaint against Leonardo Garcia-Miranda, 30, of Hapeville, Ga.; RamonLuis Soto-Maciel, 29, and Rafael Heredia-Ramos, 42, both of Jonesboro, Ga. and all citizens of Mexico, on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crystal methamphetamine ('ice").

DEA also seized 145 pounds of ice and 72 kilograms of cocaine -- with a street value of $27 million -- in a house in Clayton County searched in conjunction with the arrests.

According to the Criminal Complaint filed in this case, a joint investigation began about a month ago, DEA and DeKalb County Police on Oct. 23 made a controlled purchase of about 1 kilogram of cocaine from defendant Soto-Maciel. A confidential source and defendant Miranda, who allegedly brokered the deal, were stopped shortly after leaving the site of the transaction. The cocaine was recovered and Miranda was arrested. A subsequent consent search of Miranda's home in Hapeville allegedly resulted in the discovery of approximately 4 ounces of "ice," packaging materials and a scale used to weigh drugs.

DEA agents continued their surveillance on Soto-Maciel after the transaction was completed. After visiting and exiting a house in Clayton County, Soto-Maciel was approached by DEA agents and fled, throwing down a package in the process. He was apprehended and the package recovered. The package allegedly contained "ice."

The third defendant, Ramos, was observed standing in the doorway of the residence from which Soto-Maciel had fled. Ramos was detained. Agents then got written consent to search the house from Soto-Maciel and Ramos, both of whom claimed to live there. In the house, agents allegedly recovered approximately 72 kilograms of cocaine and 145 pounds of "ice."

"Once again good cooperative law enforcement work by federal and local agencies has led to a Mexican drug kingpin's losing millions of dollars worth of meth and cocaine," said U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias. "These arrests and seizures remind us that metro Atlanta remains a major drug distribution hub. But we will maintain our focus on attacking these drug trafficking organizations until they decide that they don't want to risk operating in our communities."

Neighbors Aghast At Drug Bust Rental House In Clayton Full Of 'Ice' (AJC)

By Kathy Jefcoats, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 25, 2006

Neighbors in the otherwise quiet Old South subdivision in eastern Clayton County were stunned to learn Tuesday that the mud brown ranch on the corner was a stash house containing, police say, $27 million in illegal drugs.

"I was just floored, scared for the kids, my family, and saddened at the state of the community is such that I have to educate my kid more about drugs," neighbor Dale Shaw said.

"It's just insane. God knows what goes on right under your nose."

U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency Administration agents raided the well-kept home at the corner of Wood Hollow and Old South lanes Monday. U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias said agents took 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine, known as "ice," and 72 kilograms of cocaine from the home.

Three Mexican citizens, Leonardo Garcia-Miranda, 30, of Hapeville and Jonesboro residents Ramon Luis Soto-Maciel, 29, and Rafael Heredia-Ramos, 42, are charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crystal methamphetamine, federal officials said.

Soto-Maciel and Heredia-Ramos rented the Jonesboro home from its owner, a former long-term resident, who now lives in McDonough, said neighbors Coley and Sandra McWilliams.

They said the men had only been there a few weeks. "[The owner] tried to sell it, but no one wants to buy in Clayton County," Coley McWilliams said. "Clayton has become a mecca for crime, it's terrible."

The owner could not be reached for comment Tuesday night.

Neighbors said the men kept to themselves.

"They did a lot of yard work," Sandra McWilliams said. "I never saw a lot of cars or even visitors over there. They weren't noisy or anything."

Clayton County Assistant Police Chief Jeff Turner said the men kept a low profile.

"But that's what you'd expect if you had that amount of drugs and money around," he said. "You'd keep to yourself, not attract any attention."

Although agents reported only finding the drugs, Shaw wondered about the presence of guns, another safety factor.

"With that kind of stash and money, there is usually fully automatic weapons," he said. "That is a definite concern."

On Monday, DEA agents and DeKalb County police made a controlled purchase of about

1 kilogram of cocaine from Soto-Maciel, Nahmias said. A confidential source and Miranda, who allegedly brokered the deal, were stopped shortly after leaving the site of the transaction, he said.

The cocaine was recovered, and Miranda was arrested. A subsequent consent search of Miranda's Hapeville home resulted in the discovery of about 4 ounces of "ice," packaging materials and a scale used to weigh drugs, Nahmias said.

DEA agents continued their surveillance on Soto-Maciel after the transaction was completed. After visiting and exiting the Jonesboro home, Soto-Maciel was approached by DEA agents.

He fled, throwing down a package in the process, authorities said. Soto-Maciel was caught and the package, allegedly containing ice, was recovered.

Ramos was seen standing in the doorway of the Jonesboro home and was detained. Agents then got written consent from Ramos and Soto-Maciel to search the house.

The arrests are the culmination of a monthlong federal investigation by U.S. Department of Drug Enforcement Agency Administration and DeKalb Police Department.

DEA Seizes $27 Million In Meth, Cocaine (ND)

News-Daily, October 24, 2006

The United States Drug Enforcement Administration and a metro-area drug task force has seized 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine and 72 kilograms of cocaine from a Jonesboro house.

The seized drugs are worth an estimated street value of $27 million, United States Attorney David Nahmias said.

DEA officials believe the drugs, seized in a bust Monday, were being delivered to the house from Mexico and stashed there. They were then being delivered from Mexico to 2829 Wood Hollow Lane in Jonesboro and then distributed from Jonesboro to be sold on the street in Atlanta and in other cities along the East Coast, officials said.

DEA Special Weapons and Tactics unit, assisted by uniformed Clayton County Police officers, DeKalb County Police and the DeKalb County Sheriff's Office, raided the house Monday, arresting three men and seizing the drugs along with drug paraphernalia and large amounts of cash.

The agencies' cooperation led to "a Mexican drug kingpin in Mexico losing millions and millions of dollars," Nahmias said.

The three men were all citizens of Mexico and are allegedly connected to a Mexican drug cartel. Ramon Luis Soto-Maciel, 29, and Rafael Heredia-Ramos, 42, were living in Jonesboro. Leonardo Garcia-Miranda, 30, was living in Hapeville.

The men are facing federal charges of conspiring to distribute meth and cocaine.

DEA Special Agent in Charge Sherri F. Strange said the seizure is a sign that Atlanta continues to be a major hub for drug trafficking, especially meth.

"What we cannot be numb to is there are real people out there using meth," she said. "Let every smuggler hear me loud and clear: DEA and our law enforcement partners will not rest until every dope dealing, poison peddling meth distributor is behind bars."

Fifty to 75 percent of all meth seized on the East Coast is seized in Atlanta, Strange said.

Clayton Police Assistant Chief Jeff Turner said the drug bust is an example of what can be done when law enforcement agencies work together.

"This is just a small amount of effort," Turner said. "This is what we can do if we all work together."

Turner said the Clayton Police had not received any calls about the house because "stash houses" don't have the sort of high-intensity traffic that attracts neighbors' attention to houses where people are dealing drugs.

"Stash houses" can be identified, Strange said, by the fact that no one comes or goes from the house, someone is staked out watching the house and lights are always on.

Turner said Wood Hollow Lane has not been a problem area for Clayton Police. There was an electrical fire at the address a few years ago, but besides that officers had not received calls to the house, Turner said.

"But if you have drugs in Clayton County," Turner said. "We're going to be coming for you. We're coming to get you."

Drug Bust Nets Meth, Thousands In Cash (WSB)

WSB-TV, October 24, 2006

ATLANTA -- Federal agents seize pounds and pounds of meth and cocaine in metro Atlanta – along with thousands of dollars in cash.

This latest drug bust is bringing more than drugs and money – it's also bringing a title Atlanta does not want. Agents tell Channel 2 the metro area is now the largest meth distribution hub on the east coast.

Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration says it's a balancing act. They say they've reduced the number of local meth labs but are working to also crack down on international shipments which make Atlanta number one for meth distribution on the east coast.

For most people it's hard to understand the impact of getting 145 pounds of methamphetamine off the streets.

"What's noteworthy about this case is the 145 pounds of ICE can easily yield over 300,000 dosage units," said DEA Special Agent Sherri Strange.

That's 300,000 hits of the drug that won't happen now. Good news, especially when you consider where agents say Atlanta ranks as a meth distribution hub.

"I think on the east coast, Atlanta is number one unfortunately," said Special Agent Strange.

That means the crimes associated with distributing the drugs stay here as well. Agents just caught three men linked to the Mexican drug cartel for the drugs – 145 pounds of meth, and 72 kilos of cocaine -- most of them found in a Clayton County home.

The undercover operation that led to the three men who were arrested included DEA agents as well as law enforcement in DeKalb and Clayton counties. Agents say that kind of cooperation will lead to more arrests.

Record Drug Bust In Clayton Co. (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, October 24, 2006

Residents of a Clayton County subdivision were stunned to learn what federal agents found inside a home in their neighborhood.

The Drug Enforcement Agency says they found 145 pounds of ice -- the crystallized form of methamphetamine -- 27 kilos of cocaine, and more than $100,000 in cash.

Investigators say the home was being used as a stash house by three Mexican nationals who were distributing the drugs for a drug kingpin in Mexico.

The DEA says it's another indication Atlanta is a meth hub.

"With the recent seizures of meth and ice in Atlanta, each one being larger than the other one, I don't want us to become numbed by the numbers," said DEA Special Agent-in-charge, Sherri Strange.

It is the third-largest seizure of meth for the DEA in Atlanta.

Some of the drugs were already being distributed on Metro Atlanta streets. It was a street-level undercover buy in Hapeville that lead police and federal agents to the Clayton County home.

Second Internet Pharmacy Closed (NOTP)

By Mark Waller, East Jefferson Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, October 25, 2006

Sales of painkillers draw DEA attention

Federal agents shut down and searched an Elmwood pharmacy they suspect of shady Internet business practices on Tuesday, marking the second crackdown of its kind in East Jefferson this month, officials said.

Agents removed cardboard boxes of drugs while executing a federal search warrant shortly after 2 p.m. at Pharmacy 101 in the Elmwood Plaza Shopping Center on Jefferson Highway at Edwards Avenue. Workers at nearby businesses said they were relieved.

"I couldn't be any happier," about the pharmacy's closing, said Al Alcock, owner of nearby Big Easy Tools. "I think almost everybody here's noticed something weird going on ever since they opened up. Some of the people were questionable whether they were desirable."

Unlike the previously shuttered Elite Pharmacy, located farther west off Jefferson Highway in River Ridge, Pharmacy 101 began as a retail operation about two years ago and later added Internet sales, investigators said.

Elite sold prescription drugs exclusively on the Internet and took no walk-in patients, so when agents arrived there Oct. 10, neighbors said they had never noticed anything troubling.

But similar to Elite, Drug Enforcement Administration officials said huge purchases of painkillers drew their attention to Pharmacy 101. They said the pharmacy was Louisiana's largest purchaser of oxycodone, used in Oxycontin, and the third-biggest purchaser of hydrocodone, found in Lorcet, Lortab and Vicodin.

Officials did not specify the amounts of drugs processed at the pharmacy, but they removed several boxes of Lorcet and Lortab.

They said the pharmacy also had supplies of the anti-anxiety drug alprazolam, known as Xanax, the muscle relaxant carisoprodol, known as Soma, the painkiller hydromorphone, found in Dilaudid, and the painkiller methadone.

William Renton, special agent in charge of the New Orleans DEA office, said the pharmacy raised concerns similar to Elite by filling online prescriptions between doctors and patients in different states, meaning the prescribing doctors could not have properly examined the patients.

He said the handling and storage of controlled substances at Pharmacy 101 was sloppy, including drugs kept in cardboard boxes scattered on the floor.

He said the pharmacy's ownership was hazy, with the business changing hands recently and the new owners failing to secure the state and federal registrations necessary to run a pharmacy.

Both the DEA and the Louisiana Board of Pharmacy investigated Tuesday, as Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies helped manage the scene. Nobody was arrested.

"We determined that this location is a hazard to the public interest," Renton said, standing in front of the closed pharmacy. "We decided to seize the inventory of this location."

The Louisiana secretary of state lists the pharmacy's directors as Harry H. Harris III and Robert L. Richey. Harris could not be reached Tuesday. Asked about the pharmacy by telephone, Richey said: "I have no comment with regard to that."

The state Pharmacy Board listed Cheryl A. Batiste as the pharmacist in charge at Pharmacy 101. Attempts to reach Batiste were unsuccessful Tuesday.

During the raid, beginning about 9:30 a.m. and lasting all day, several customers arrived at the pharmacy only to be turned away by deputies. The neon "Open" sign was off and the door was locked.

"These are good people," said Margaret Vedrenne of Chalmette, after finding the pharmacy closed and growing irritated by the commotion.

Cassandra Boudreaux of Metairie said the closing prevented her from being able to fill a painkiller prescription because she needed the pharmacy to contact her doctor to verify that it could not provide her medicine, allowing the doctor to write another prescription she could use elsewhere.

"I just need them to void it and fax it back to my doctor," Boudreaux said. "I won't use them no more," she said about the pharmacy

Renton said the raids Tuesday and earlier in the month were part of a nationwide crackdown on Internet pharmacies. Also Tuesday, he said, investigators searched the office and residence of an Internet provider in Houma related to Pharmacy 101.

. . . . . .

Mark Waller can be reached at mwaller@timespicayune.com or (504) 883-7056.

Texas Drug-run Ends In 5 Arrests, Half-ton Of Pot (FWCOM)

By Dionne Waugh

FortWayne.com, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086134

Federal prosecutors have accused five men of drug distribution in the transportation of 1,000 pounds of marijuana – packaged in bales – from Texas to Fort Wayne.

Juaquin Tapia, 54, of Brownsville, Texas; Andres Cuellar, 44, of La Rosita Coahullia, Mexico; Jose Ramirez, 57, of Fort Wayne; Jose Hernandez, 40, of Goshen; and Enedeo Rodriguez Jr., 25, of Warsaw were all charged last week with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute more than 100 kilograms of marijuana. Hernandez has also been charged with possession with intent to distribute more than 100 kilograms of marijuana.

The charges were announced this week.

According to federal court documents, an undercover Texas Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent tipped off authorities to the plan.

According to the agent, Tapia hired him to drive the drugs to Fort Wayne, telling him he would be paid $100 a pound and initially giving him $500. Cuellar told the undercover agent to contact Hernandez when he arrived in Fort Wayne, court records stated.

Under control of customs' agents, the marijuana was transported to Indianapolis and then Fort Wayne on Oct. 16. Surveillance units from customs, Indiana State Police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Indianapolis Police Department worked together on the case.

In Fort Wayne, the undercover agent contacted Hernandez, who brought the agent and drugs to a house in the 1700 block of Gable Road and that is owned by Ramirez, according to court records.

Hernandez called Ramirez and told him "the girls are in town," which is slang for drugs, court records stated.

Hernandez paid the undercover agent $14,000 in cash and said Ramirez had between $15,000 and $20,000 in the house and would pay him when he arrived, according to court records.

Officers raided the house when the men split up later that night. After searching the house, officers found 83 bundles, or about 1,000 pounds, of marijuana, plus packing materials, scales, $14,500 in cash, a loaded .380-caliber firearm and 20 to 30 additional pounds of marijuana, according to court records.

All five men were arrested. When questioned by agents, Hernandez said he would be paid $10,000 for his role in the delivery, and that he had brought marijuana to Ramirez's house before, court records said.

Hernandez also said that he and Rodriguez were the distributors and Rodriguez was the broker who made the payment, according to court records.

dwaugh@jg.net

4 Face Charges After Raid Of Green Cross Dispensary (DB)

Daily Breeze, October 24, 2006

Federal agents seized about 70 pounds of marijuana along with nearly 100 pot plants, a shotgun and a small amount of cash during last week's raid of a medical marijuana dispensary in Torrance, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman said Monday.

Though the DEA claimed no arrests, police working for a county task force jailed four people who arrived later that day to sell cannabis to the co-op.

Facing charges of possession and transportation of a controlled substance with intent to sell are Brian Keldoff, 47, of Lawndale; Cory Zila, 20, of Mammoth Lakes; Kelly Culver, 26, of Newport Beach; and John Ornguze, 24, of Ladera Ranch.

Authorities began their search about 2:15 p.m. Thursday in the 22900 block of Hawthorne Boulevard, where Green Cross of Torrance had been in business since April.

Witnesses said police and federal DEA agents blocked the entrances of Green Cross' parking lot before a half-dozen or so officers approached the business with their guns drawn.

Marijuana-laced food was among the items seized, DEA Special Agent Sarah Pullen said.

Following the raid, four people were taken into custody after they allegedly attempted to sell pot to undercover detectives working for LA IMPACT, a countywide task force with an emphasis on drug trafficking.

"Within a five-hour time span, four people came in and essentially offered to sell marijuana to the facility," Torrance police Lt. Rod Irvine said.

That led to the additional confiscation of more than 20 pounds of pot and more than 60 vials of hash oil, a concentrated form of cannabis.

Though state law permits the regulated growth of marijuana for medical use, the would-be vendors were not authorized to cultivate or sell the drug, Irvine said.

Investigators searched the dispensary because they suspect Green Cross director Rafael Chavez and his brother, Edward Chavez, have been illegally selling pot to customers with no medical conditions, according to a DEA affidavit.

Chavez could not be reached for comment Monday, but he has repeatedly defended his establishment, saying it offers "compassion" to patients suffering from chronic pain and disease.

In 1996, California voters passed Proposition 215, allowing doctors to recommend marijuana to patients afflicted with cancer, anorexia, AIDS, glaucoma and other illnesses.

But the state initiative does not supersede federal law, which maintains it is illegal to grow, possess or use the drug.

"For the most part, I don't know what's going on, but I do think it's not good for all these patients that are relying on this," Chavez told the Daily Breeze after the raid last week. "It's legal in California, and I'm being harassed by federal agents."

Green Cross opened its doors in Torrance on April 20, prompting some concern among local officials. On Aug. 1, the City Council responded by passing an ordinance denying business licenses to marijuana dispensaries and other establishments considered out of step with federal law.

With its current license set to expire in December, the dispensary remained open.

In the weeks prior to Thursday's search, investigators surveyed the dispensary at least twice. According to the affidavit, a team of agents and police officers watched 25 customers stop by the co-op during a two-hour span on Oct. 10.

Police pulled over the customers as they drove away, and those who were questioned admitted purchasing various types and quantities of the drug, which ranged from $55 to $70 for an eighth of an ounce.

Pullen, the DEA spokeswoman, said Monday that no charges had been filed as a result of the evidence collected during last week's search. But, she added, the investigation is ongoing.

"Obviously," she said, "we build cases in an attempt to dismantle and disrupt organizations."

Imported Meth: State's New Scourge? (INDYSTAR)

By Paul Bird

The Indianapolis Star, October 25, 2006

'Ice' heats up amid war against Indiana-made drug

Greenwood police have seized $300,000 of methamphetamine -- a drug that police in Indiana have been fighting hard to eradicate -- in a bust involving a highly addictive and often-imported variety called "ice."

About methamphetamine

· Ingestion: Smoked, snorted, swallowed, injected.

· Sample of ingredients: Alcohol; ether; benzene; toluene/paint thinner; Freon; acetone; chloroform; camp stove fuel; anhydrous ammonia; iodine crystals; red phosphorous; black iodine; lye; Drano; battery acid/sulfuric acid; Epsom salts.

· Indiana meth vs. Mexican ice: In Indiana, clandestine labs are operated in many places, including houses, sheds and moving vehicles, and the meth that's made is a very basic form, often diluted with chemicals. The ice methamphetamine originating in Mexico is refined further to form crystals that turn the substance into a purer, more potent drug.

Sources: U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Greenwood police, Associated Press

Police say ice, often three times as pure and expensive as its Indiana-made counterpart, typically travels a route that begins in Mexico, crosses the border and then is distributed across the United States.

"They jam our borders with up to a dozen semis at a time, and they know that every one of them can't be checked," said Matt Fillenwarth, investigations commander for Greenwood police. "If four trucks are found loaded with drugs, that means eight more got through."

Greenwood police arrested two men Friday and seized 2 pounds of crystal methamphetamine, nicknamed "ice" on the street because it is almost transparent.

Federal authorities had warned local police that Mexican ice had been found in the northeastern United States and soon would be reaching the Midwest, said Greenwood Police Chief Joe Pitcher.

"This is even more telling, because finding this substance here is telling us the local meth flow is drying up and the users are seeking a foreign source, and we know it is from Mexico," Pitcher said.

Ten Greenwood police officers and a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent arrested the two suspects after the men traveled to a McDonald's restaurant at 1197 S. Park Drive, just off I-65 in Greenwood, to deliver a pound of the drug. The deal was made through a police informant.

Arrested Friday on charges of dealing methamphetamine were Vincente Linares-Avila, 26, 1900 block of Fox Hill Drive in Indianapolis, and Oscar Medival-Cota, 26, who is thought to be an Arizona resident.

A man agreed by telephone to sell 4 pounds of the drug to an undercover narcotics officer for $12,500 per pound, Fillenwarth said. They arrived at the restaurant about 7 p.m. and were arrested as they were leaving.

DOJ_NMG_0086136

Police found a pound of the drug in the car and another pound at a house near 62nd Street and Michigan Road in Indianapolis, where one of the men lived. The drug was described as highly refined, and DEA chemists in Chicago will examine it.

"That's the most ice I've ever seen in one arrest," Fillenwarth said.

The network that police suspect the two men belong to is predominantly Hispanic, and authorities think the drugs were smuggled from Mexico to Arizona before being transported to Indiana, Fillenwarth said.

Authorities also suspect members of that network to be what are known as "polydrug dealers," because they work in professional labs where they turn out not only ice, but also marijuana, cocaine and black-tar heroin.

Fillenwarth described the ice police seized Friday as being about 90 percent pure, compared with meth produced in Indiana, which is only about 20 percent to 30 percent pure.

"It only takes a fraction of it to get high and addicted," he said. "It is potent stuff."

Dealers often "cut" the drug, or dilute it, to increase their profit.

"This stuff we confiscated could be at least tripled in volume, if not more," Fillenwarth said. "And what was selling for $300 a gram originally now is selling for $900 a gram."

Police think local meth production had been declining recently. They cited a 2005 state law that restricted access to cold and allergy medicines that contained a key ingredient in meth's production. In the year since the law's inception, meth lab seizures dropped 25 percent statewide, from 1,109 to 846.

Fillenwarth said the decline in clandestine labs has enhanced the Mexican drug business.

"These Mexican labs are professional labs and turning out lots of illegal drugs," he said. "Six years ago, the troublesome drug was crack cocaine. Now the problem is ice, and next year it could be something new.

"Ice makes someone crazy when they are coming down after being up without sleep for three or four days straight," he said. "They'll do some terrible things."

Call Star reporter Paul Bird at (317) 444-2709.

Doctor Gets Long Sentence For 'prescription Mill' (FLJOURNAL)

By Kim Crawford

Flint Journal (MI), October 25, 2006

A one-time Flint Township doctor who was convicted earlier this year for distribution of narcotic drugs will spend the rest of his life in prison, a federal judge ruled Monday.

"You were running a prescription mill," U.S. District Judge Paul V. Gadola told Mukunda D. Mukherjee of Fenton, who formerly practiced as an M.D. "What you've done was destructive to people, destructive to families and destructive to society."

Mukherjee, 64, said that he had made "bad decisions" and that his life had gone into "a downward spiral." His wife of more than 30 years also is divorcing him, he said.

Mukherjee was indicted in

June 2004 on one charge of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and 53 felony and misdemeanor counts of illegal distribution of various prescription pain killers, including Oxycontin, Vicodin, morphine and drugs with codeine.

Patricia Garner, a worker in Mukherjee's office, and her husband, Jason K. Garner, were also indicted.

The investigation had started some four months earlier. Tipped off by a confidential informant, agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the state-local narcotics units, the Flint Area Narcotics Group and the Bay Area Narcotics Enforcement Team started a probe. The Genesee County Sheriff's Department was also involved, said the U.S. attorney's office in Detroit in a statement released after the sentencing.

During the investigation, undercover officers saw long lines of people, some from other states, waiting to get into Mukherjee's office on Professional Drive in Flint Township to get prescriptions for powerful pain killers.

The prospective patients paid doctor's office employees to move up on the waiting list to see the doctor. Two undercover officers and the confidential informant were given prescriptions of Vicodin, cough syrup with codeine, a morphine-type drug and other controlled prescription drugs on multiple occasions.

A detective testifying about her dealing with Mukherjee said that she was never examined by the doctor. He typically charged $45 for the first prescription and $90 for a second, postdated prescription, while his employees charged fees of $20, $50 and $60 to people who wanted to get in to see him.

The Garners pleaded guilty in April of this year and were sentenced - she to 2 years in prison, and he to 6 months.

Mukherjee was convicted on 44 of the counts against him in a trial this year.

Mukherjee's combination of 12 consecutive 20-year sentences, 14 consecutive 5-year sentences and 18 1-year sentences, totaling 328 years, will effectively keep him in prison for the rest of his life.

DOJ_NMG_0086137

The doctor's attorney said he would appeal the sentence. Mukherjee protested after the sentencing that he had "brought down by criminals" and that he'd only been trying to help people.

The government also has seized $169,000 from Mukherjee's five bank accounts, according to court documents.

FLINT: Doctor Gets 328 Years For Giving Drugs To Addicts (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, October 25, 2006

A federal judge has sentenced a Flint-area doctor to 328 years in prison for illegally prescribing prescription drugs, one of the stiffest sentences ever handed down in an illegal prescription case in eastern Michigan.

U.S. District Judge Paul Gadola imposed the sentence Monday on Mukunda Dev Mukherjeree, 64, of Fenton. A jury convicted Mukherjeree in February of 44 counts of illegally prescribing Oxycontin, Vicodin and Phenergan with codeine and morphine at his office in Flint in 2003-04.

The counts carried maximum penalties of 1, 5 and 20 years in prison, and Gadola took the unusual step of making them all consecutive.

Gadola also ordered Mukherjeree to forfeit $150,000 in assets.

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said the severity of the sentence "should be an object lesson to any unethical medical professionals who would use their prescription-writing authority to put dangerous narcotics into the hands of addicts."

The Drug Enforcement Administration, the Bay Area Narcotics Enforcement Team, the Flint Area Narcotics Group and the Genesee County Sheriff's Department investigated the case.

HARRISON TOWNSHIP: Meth lab on wheels has resident facing charges

It seemed like any other red two-door sedan wheeling over Harrison Township roads.

But after a traffic stop, Macomb County Sheriff's deputies soon realized the 1993 Grand Prix was a portable methamphetamine lab.

The woman operating the car, Tina Zilliox, is scheduled for a preliminary exam next Tuesday in 41B District Court in Clinton Township. She faces multiple felony charges, including operating a meth lab.

The charges stem from an incident about 1:30 a.m. Oct. 16, when deputies say they spotted Zilliox, 42, a township resident, driving erratically. When they pulled over the car, they discovered she had an expired registration and an outstanding warrant in Flint for meth and marijuana possession, the sheriff's office said Tuesday.

Inside the trunk was a cooler bag with household products commonly used to cook meth. The traffic stop was then treated as a hazardous-materials scene, requiring assistance from a State Police unit that secures meth labs.

Sheriff's Capt. Tony Wickersham said the items were "all chemicals that you can buy over the counter at any store, but when mixed together and inhaled, can create a dangerous area."

Zilliox is being held in Macomb County Jail in lieu of a $20,000 bond.

SOUTHFIELD: Hearing today on plan to clear trees for church

Just west of the Code House at Mulberry and Civic Center is a woods that could be displaced by a church.

A public hearing on a site plan for the Mitcham A.M.E. Churchall is set for 6:30 p.m. today in the Southfield Pavilion, 26000 Evergreen. A Planning Commission recommendation is to go to the City Council.

The church owns 5 acres, and Southfield owns a 4 1/2-acre woods west of the house, said Nik Banda, planning director.

More than 40% of the trees would be taken to make way for the proposed 9,100-square-foot church, he said.

The city is requiring a wall around three sides of the building to shield residents from lights and noise.

Compiled by David Ashenfelter, Christy Oyama-Arboscello and Julie Edgar.

Alleged Pot Farmer, After A Smug Remark, Hears The Feds' Retort (STNIA)

By John Annese, Staten Island Advance

Staten Island Advance (NY), October 25, 2006

N.C. man facing 10 to life on new charges involving an Island warehouse

More than a year ago, when federal drug agents raided his 600-plant marijuana warehouse in Port Richmond, Scott Lawler said the loss was disappointing, but "it could have been worse," the feds allege.

Now it's worse.

A federal grand jury has indicted the North Carolina man on federal drug manufacturing charges -- charges that could bring him 10 years to life in prison.

On Aug. 29, 2005, agents with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration armed with a search warrant raided a warehouse at 116 Faber St. in Port Richmond, within 300 feet of two churches and 600 feet of a Catholic school.

DOJ_NMG_0086138

Inside, they found about 600 marijuana plants "in various stages of maturity," as well as a number of plants partially flushed down a toilet, according to papers filed in Brooklyn Federal Court.

That day, the feds arrested Grzegorz and Adriana Lyp, the New Jersey couple who were allegedly taking care of the warehouse when the raid took place. Adriana was never charged, while Grzegorz, who waived a grand jury indictment back in May, faces drug manufacture charges.

Lawler, whose name was on the warehouse lease and who paid the security deposit with a personal check, was arrested this summer. The grand jury indicted him this month.

About a week after the raid, law enforcement officials intercepted the Lawler's "it could be worse" conversation, the feds allege. Lawler said he still had some "seeds," and that he'd help start up a new location when he came back to New York for the Christmas holidays.

Lawler's attorney, Bradley D. Simon, declined comment yesterday, and a message left at Lawler's Wilmington, N.C., home was not returned.

The company that owns the warehouse belongs to Pasquale (Pat) Pappalardo, of Joe & Pat's Pizzeria in Castleton Corners.

Pappalardo expressed shock yesterday about the DEA's marijuana find, though he remembered a visit from detectives at his real estate office last year.

Though he didn't recall meeting Lawler, Pappalardo said the warehouse's tenants paid month-to-month and told him they were using it as an art studio to create sculptures.

"Because nobody was ever there, they were the only people in the building, and they were paying on time, there was no reason to question it," he said. "I guess you never know, it's a different business they were in."

The DEA caught wind of the pot-growing operation back in March 2005, when a confidential source who had flipped after a drug conviction tipped them off about the warehouse, according to court papers.

Agents visited the brick two-story Faber Street building several times. It looked abandoned -- the windows were boarded up, according to court papers.

But in April 2005 , the agents saw people visiting the building to drop off construction material. Two agents walked by the building and smelled "a strong skunk-like odor," court papers allege. And later on, a drug-sniffing dog sniffed out traces of a controlled substance at the front doors.

When the DEA checked electricity records, agents found the building spent $1,300 a month on power -- enough power to run a deli six days a week, and certainly more than a boarded-up warehouse would need, the feds allege.

And the city's water inspectors hadn't been able to read the warehouse's water meters for two years, because they couldn't get access to the building, the feds allege.

When the DEA came knocking on Aug. 29, 2005, they spotted Grzegorz Lyp get out of his car and enter the warehouse, according to court papers. His wife, Adriana, waited in the car.

The feds approached her and asked her to call her husband on her cell phone. And even though the agents told her not to tip him off to their presence, Mrs. Lyp immediately blurted out, "The cops are here."

One of the agents talked to Lyp over the phone and asked he come downstairs, and Lyp responded that he'd be out "in one minute," court papers said.

When Lyp didn't emerge, the agents went in. The agents were about to open a steel door on the second floor when Lyp opened the door, revealing the marijuana harvest, the feds say.

"A number of plants were recovered from the toilet, in an apparent attempt to discard of them," DEA agent Gaetano DiPasquale wrote in one court statement.

Lawler has been released on $200,000 bail, and is forbidden from contacting Lyp. Lyp has been released on $400,000 bail.

John Annese is a news reporter for the Advance. He may be reached at annese@siadvance.com.

Convicted Doc Accuses Feds Of Double Cross (MDH)

By Jo Ann Hustis, Herald Reporter

Morris Daily Herald, October 25, 2006

Dr. Edwin to serve 6 months for not tracking painkillers

DWIGHT - Dr. Parambaloth Edwin believes the federal government spent five years and $5 million just to hand him six months in jail.

"A lot of money for nothing," he said Monday, in the wake of his sentencing in federal district court in Chicago for failure to accurately track tens of thousands of tablets of prescription painkillers he dispensed through the years to patients.

"They sentenced me for not accounting for 50,000 pills. They'd taken the records from my computer and such, so there was no record. That's illegal.

"You cannot confiscate records from a practice," he added.

"It was all taken without leaving any records and lists, so we had nothing to go on."

Edwin, 66, a retired physician who practiced 26 years locally and in Wilmington, is to begin serving his sentence in January 2007.

He pled guilty Thursday to failure to keep accurate and complete records of hydroconone, a generic form of Vicodin, an addictive form of painkiller. He was also fined $5,000 in the case.

Grundy County Coroner John Callahan said the physician was brought to the attention of authorities as far back as 2003 through investigations, toxicology screening, and interviews with families by his office and those of other area coroners.

"They had already started the investigation. Our reports, which we turned over to them in Chicago, greatly enhanced their prosecution of the case," he said.

Edwin is a native of India who obtained his medical degree in Switzerland and did his residency in Grant Hospital in Chicago. He pled guilty to felony record-keeping in exchange for dropping more-serious charges of distributing controlled substances.

He said Monday the Drug Enforcement Agency cleaned out his office during the case. He was charged in June 2005 on 17 counts of allegedly dispensing painkillers to patients without a legitimate medical purpose.

The indictment cited Edwin with illegally dispensing 685 hydrocodone tablets in various strengths to 12 unnamed patients between Aug. 14, 2001, and March 18, 2003.

Assistant U.S. District Attor-ney Madeleine Murphy said Thursday, however, prosecutors could not prove Edwin was responsible for the deaths, as the victims had also taken illegal narcotics.

Callahan said it is believed Grundy County had four deaths stemming from prescriptions issued by the doctor.

"And, there could have been more," he noted. "Sometimes people don't keep medications in the bottles in which the prescriptions came. Sometimes these drugs are being sold on the street and so we don't know where they came from."

Edwin said in his 26 years of practice in Illinois, no malpractice judgments were recorded against him in the National Practitioners' Databank.

"They said I killed patients," he said. "(Patients die) in any practice, but these were not due to my care. None of them had any connection with my treatment and medication - there is no proof of anything," he said.

"They died of natural causes due to illicit drug abuse. Usually if (the DEA) has evidence, they don't drop a case. They spent five years and $5 million trying to press a case against me."

Edwin said the investigation into his practice began in 2001.

"They thought we had big drug dealings going on," he said. "In the plea agreement, there was nothing about any drug dealing. They had no proof."

Edwin said he pled guilty because, under the plea agreement, the DEA was to drop all but the record-keeping charges.

"As soon as I signed the agreement, they tried increasing the charges," he added. "I was told it would be a probation. As soon as I signed, they sent the report to the judge, saying I should receive more than six months."

Edwin said he believed he was wronged.

"Some kind of a double-cross," he noted. "It's not appealable. These kinds of pleas are not appealable."

The doctor can apply for reinstatement of his medical license in April 2008. He may do this, he said, because many retired physicians want to maintain their medical license to work part-time.

"To keep up with medicine, not to make money," he said.

Callahan called the issue a bizarre case.

"You'd like to think after someone spends time and effort and years to become a doctor, they wouldn't abuse the privilege of prescribing medication," he said.

"This certainly doesn't reflect on the doctors in our area. But, it's nice to know people like that are being dealt with accordingly."

Edwin said the $5 million to put him behind bars is his estimate.

"A lot of money for nothing. Go and (seize) all these (records) and find nothing behind it. The (DEA) tried to do audits - a criminal investigation. They are not detectives or investigators. I don't know why they didn't put DEA agents on the case. Looking for promotions, I guess," he said.

"The bottom line is, they spent so much money to put some doctor in jail for six months."

Pot Trial Pushes A Hot Button (FRESBEE)

By John Ellis, The Fresno Bee

Fresno Bee, October 25, 2006

Prosecutor says medical marijuana backers should not wear buttons in court.

In the upcoming trial of Merced marijuana activist Dustin Costa, prosecutor Karen Escobar says the federal government — just like the defendant — has the right to a fair trial.

To that end, she is asking a federal judge to prohibit Costa's supporters from wearing buttons, T-shirts or anything else that promotes legalizing medical marijuana.

Such "paraphernalia," she said, could have an "improper influence on jurors required to follow the law."

The request prompted Costa's defense attorney, Robert Rainwater, to point out that Escobar was wearing a lanyard with "DEA" on it, for the Drug Enforcement Administration — which could bias a jury in the opposite direction.

Why should she have that right, Rainwater said, when supporters of Costa and medical marijuana might not.

U.S. District Judge Anthony W. Ishii did not rule on Escobar's request, but said it was in a gray area of First Amendment free-speech rights versus the right to a fair trial.

Monday's exchange in U.S. District Court in Fresno came as both sides hashed out motions before Costa's trial, scheduled to begin Nov. 7.

A three-count indictment charges Costa with growing more than 100 marijuana plants — equivalent to nearly 9 pounds — with the intent to distribute. Costa also faces a charge of possession of a firearm "in furtherance of drug trafficking crime."

But this is more than a simple drug-trafficking case. Costa was president of the Merced Patients Group, a private cannabis club in Merced that claimed 230 members.

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which gives ill people the right to use marijuana for medicinal purposes when cleared by a doctor.

In June 2005, however, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the federal government could prosecute people who use marijuana for medicinal purposes.

Costa was arrested a short time later.

Rainwater already has said Costa believed he was growing and distributing marijuana while it was still legal under state law.

Waiting in line behind Costa at Fresno's federal courthouse are at least one — and possibly two — similar cases. In some hearings, Costa's included, supporters have shown up in T-shirts with slogans such as "Marijuana — better than Ritalin."

In making her case, Escobar referenced a 1995 Superior Court trial in San Jose where a man was convicted of murdering his estranged wife's fiancé. The victim's family sat in the front row of the gallery during the trial, wearing buttons with the murdered man's picture.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the verdict and ordered a new trial, saying the buttons may have biased jurors.

Ishii acknowledged supporters of either defendants or the prosecution could be affected in the matter: "This is one of those issues that cuts both ways."

The reporter can be reached atjellis@fresnobee.com or (559) 441-6320.

White House To Seek More Colombia Aid (KCS)

By Joshua Goodman

The Kansas City Star, October 25, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia - President Bush will ask Congress to maintain current aid levels to Colombia - running at more $600 million yearly - to support the Latin American nation's fight against terrorism and drug trafficking, an administration official said Tuesday.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, leading a high level U.S. delegation to Colombia, said the mostly military aid would remain unchanged through at least 2008.

"For the past few years we've extended about $600 million per year to the Colombian people for all these programs and our administration in Washington will ask Congress to maintain that level in 2007 and 2008," Burns said.

The call for continued funding is a major boost to President Alvaro Uribe, Washington's staunchest ally in Latin America, and comes despite the failure of efforts to reduce the country's cocaine trade.

"In any counterterrorism or counter-narcotics campaign you sometimes have to adjust strategy to be effective as conditions change," Burns said. "We'll be open to any suggestions the Colombian government makes."

DOJ_NMG_0086141

U.S. officials have said recently that aid for the drug eradication strategy known as Plan Colombia, which has cost American taxpayers more than $4 billion since 2000, should be gradually reduced as Colombian authorities take over more duties.

Legislators in both countries have questioned the effectiveness of a relentless aerial spraying campaign of coca plantations that is the cornerstone of the strategy. According to the most recent U.S. government survey, coca production surged 26 percent in 2005 to 355,800 acres.

Burns said the Bush administration would also ask Congress to extend unilateral trade privileges for all four drug-producing Andean nations - Bolivia, Colombia,(AP) - Ecuador and Peru.

Colombia Aid To Stay Same Despite Rights Allegations (MH)

By Sibylla Brodzinsky And Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, October 25, 2006

BOGOTA - The Bush administration plans to keep U.S. aid to the Colombian military at current levels through 2008 despite human rights and corruption scandals that already have delayed some U.S. disbursements, a top official said Tuesday.

"We intend to ask our Congress to maintain the current level of funding" for 2007 and 2008, said Nicholas Burns, the State Department's acting No. 2 official, with the title of under secretary of political affairs.

But Burns also noted that he would raise the recent allegations of corruption scandals and human rights abuses in the army, reported by the media and non-government organizations (NGOs) here, during his two-day visit.

"We raise these issues when there are allegations made by credible NGOs," he told reporters on his arrival, ``and I will be raising them with Colombian officials."

Burns was accompanied by a high-powered delegation of 15 officials that included Anne Patterson, a former U.S. ambassador in Bogotá who now heads the State Department's anti-drug-trafficking programs.

Originally approved as a $1.3 billion, five-year U.S. effort to help finance a counter-drug campaign, Plan Colombia formally ended in late 2005 with outlays topping $4 billion. The U.S. Congress extended the aid this year as the two countries negotiate a longer-term arrangement. The U.S. money has improved the security situation here, but its impact on the cocaine and heroin industries remains unclear.

MONEY PUT ON HOLD

But State Department officials told The Miami Herald that about $55 million earmarked for the Colombian military for the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30 was put on hold over concerns that President Alvaro Uribe's government has not been aggressive enough in pursuing military officers accused of human rights abuses.

"You need progress, and, frankly, progress hasn't been as fast as we would want," said a State Department official who declined to be quoted by name to speak freely on the subject. ``That's always been part of the problem in Colombia."

The official said there was still enough U.S. money in the pipeline to keep the military programs running for now.

By law, the Bush administration must certify that Colombia is making adequate progress on human rights twice during the year in order to keep the U.S. aid flowing. But this year's certifications have been held up because of the reports of army abuses.

Rights groups consider the certification process a valuable tool to pressure the Uribe administration and the military to move strongly against the violators.

"If you want to see a few cases move, it's much stronger than any noise that the Colombian human rights community is going to be able to make," said Adam Isacson, a Colombia analyst with the Center for International Policy, a Washington-based advocacy group usually critical of the Bush administration.

``There's always the symbolism . . . the fact that Colombia's main military benefactor still has such strong doubts that they can't issue a seal of approval."

SUSPICIOUS EVENTS

In May, 10 members of an elite U.S.-trained counterdrug police were killed by army troops near the southwestern city of Cali. It was initially portrayed as a case of friendly fire, but Colombian prosecutors later alleged the troops were working for drug traffickers.

In Barranquilla, eight army officers and soldiers face criminal charges after six civilians were killed in an operation in August first presented as a kidnap rescue raid. It was later revealed that the deaths were drug related.

Last month, prosecutors opened an investigation of 18 soldiers for the deaths of 29 civilians, whose bodies were allegedly dressed in military fatigues and presented as guerrillas killed in skirmishes.

Local media also revealed details of an investigation into at least two army officers who allegedly paid former guerrillas to stage fake bomb plots in Bogotá ahead of Uribe's August inauguration to a second term. One bomb went off July 31, killing one civilian and wounding 21 others.

DOJ_NMG_0086142

Miami Herald correspondent Pablo Bachelet reported from Washington.

Colombia, US Examine Drug Plan (PRENSA)

Prensa Latina, October 25, 2006

Bogota, Oct 24 (Prensa Latina) Colombian President Alvaro Uribe and US Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns are analyzing Tuesday results of the Colombia Plan, which many consider has failed in wiping out the drug trade in this nation.

Until Thursday, Burns will be in Colombia on an official visit accompanied by top functionaries of the departments of State, Defense and Justice, of the Agency for International Development and the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Several analysts and politicians from both countries think the Colombia Plan has also been insufficient in reducing illegal drug crops and eliminating guerrillas in the Andean state.

Local Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo Araujo said that during this visit the two parties will also look at the results of Washington s over $5 billion assistance to the plan.

Araujo pointed out they will tackle US social-military aid to Bogota, their bilateral free trade agreement, tariff preferences, human rights protection, democracy strengthening and advances of the reinsertion process of those demobilized from armed groups, especially from paramilitary guerrillas.

Besides President Uribe, visitors are slated to gather with ministers Araujo, Carlos Holguin, Interior and Justice, and Juan Manuel Santos, Defense, among others.

Rumsfeld Urged To Fight Afghan Opium (AP)

By Dennis Conrad, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Two GOP congressmen have told Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that more needs to be done about Afghanistan's opium crisis because of increased violence and terrorism against coalition forces.

The opium and illicit drug trafficking has greatly increased in recent months and threatens to ``totally corrupt all of the new Afghan democratic institutions we support,'' Illinois Reps. Henry Hyde and Mark Kirk said in an Oct. 12 letter.

Hyde is chairman of the House International Relations Committee and is retiring after a 32-year congressional career. Kirk, now serving his third term in Congress, is a former longtime aide to the committee who also has served as an intelligence officer in the Pentagon's war room.

Rumsfeld had no response to the congressmen's letter as of Tuesday, according to Hyde's committee staff.

A Rumsfeld spokeswoman, Air Force Lt. Col. Karen Finn, said the Pentagon intends to respond. ``We take this matter very seriously,'' she said.

The congressmen suggested that the Drug Enforcement Administration combat the problem by focusing on drug kingpins in Afghanistan, heroin processing labs and drug convoys.

Hyde and Kirk said the convoys that carry the drugs out of the country bring back land mines and modern weapons bought with drug money from the Taliban and other anti-coalition forces.

``We all know the drugs fuel the violence and insurgency, we think that the debate concerning these obvious links is over, and now we need a new policy that addresses both the drugs and related terror, simultaneously,'' they added.

The congressmen cautioned that the DEA cannot do its job in Afghanistan without military support and assistance, including the Defense Department's military operational and tactical air support for some of the DEA's counterdrug missions.

A coordinated approach needs to be accomplished before the start of the 2007 opium crop, the congressmen said.

Finn said that over the past two years the Defense Department has worked to support DEA efforts to combat the narcotics threat in Afghanistan.

``In accordance with our statutory authorities, the secretary has already authorized Operation Enduring Freedom forces to embed nonmilitary counternarcotics personnel (to include DEA) when operating in areas of known or suspected drug-related activity,'' she said.

Senator Seeks Change In Afghan Drug Policy (UPI)

United Press International, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 (UPI) -- A U.S. House leader urged the Defense Department to change strategy against Afghan heroin production, saying the existing policy isn't working.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said in a letter to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld the poppy eradication program in Afghanistan is a failure, USA Today said Tuesday. Hyde urged Rumsfeld to help Drug Enforcement Administration agents seek out drug lords and heroin processing centers rather than focus on poppy farmers.

DOJ_NMG_0086143

Officials said the poppy eradication effort eliminated about 37,807 acres so far this year, about 7 percent of the acreage cultivated, USA Today said.

In the previously unpublished Oct. 12 letter, Hyde said the drug situation has "increased violence and terrorism" against forces stationed in Afghanistan and is threatening to "totally corrupt" new Afghan policies and programs the United States supports, USA Today said. Others officials, including Rumsfeld, voiced similar concerns that drug money is fueling a resurgence of Taliban and al-Qaida forces in Afghanistan.

Rumsfeld has not responded to Hyde's letter, but a Defense Department spokeswoman said the department is treating the matter seriously, USA Today said.

IMMIGRATION:

DNA Testing A Mixed Bag For Immigrants (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

DNA testing has emerged as a powerful and sometimes controversial tool for U.S. residents seeking to help overseas relatives enter the country legally.

The tests have been invaluable for thousands of citizens or permanent residents who want to sponsor relatives but lack birth certificates or other documents to prove the family relationship. But some immigration lawyers worry that U.S. authorities are increasingly requiring DNA tests even when the paperwork is in order -- adding substantial costs and delays to an arduous process.

"What's troubling is that it seems like the availability of DNA testing is leading to a greater level of mistrust of identity documents that otherwise would have been readily accepted," said Alison Brown, a lawyer based in Silver Spring.

Last year, about 718,000 people were granted permanent residency or a temporary visa on the basis of being a parent, child or sibling of someone who was a U.S. citizen, permanent resident or temporary visa holder.

Officials at the State and Homeland Security departments said they do not track the number of DNA tests submitted by people seeking to sponsor a relative for a visa. But the AABB (formerly the American Association of Blood Banks), the accrediting organization for laboratories that do DNA testing for immigration applications, receives about 12 e-mails or phone calls a day from people seeking referrals for immigration purposes, a spokeswoman said. At Fairfax Identity Laboratories, one of two DNA laboratories in the Washington region accredited to handle immigration cases, the number of requests for tests has increased about 20 percent, to about 2,000, in the past year, said Joe Chimera, senior vice president.

Immigration lawyers interviewed in the Washington area said officials who process visa applications at U.S. consulates overseas appear to be driving the increase in DNA testing.

"In many consulates, DNA testing has really become the norm," said Daniel Park, whose Alexandria-based practice serves mostly clients from Latin America.

Parastoo Zahedi, a lawyer practicing in Tysons Corner, said she became concerned about that possibility seven months ago when an official at the U.S. consulate in Abu Dhabi, the United Arab Emirates, told one of her clients that he had to submit a DNA test to prove he was related to his 65-year-old mother in Virginia, who was sponsoring him for permanent residency.

Zahedi said she was surprised because the client, a 42-year-old Iranian, had all the documentation normally required to prove his relationship to his mother, including a valid Iranian birth certificate. The Department of Homeland Security had already approved the client's petition -- the first step in any visa application. The interview at the consulate was the final step, in which he was supposed to demonstrate that there was no reason to bar his admission to the United States.

"At first, I thought it was something he said in his interview -- maybe some hesitation in one of his answers that raised suspicions," Zahedi said.

But in the ensuing months, she said, two more Iranian clients with solid documentation were told the same thing at the U.S. consulates in Abu Dhabi and Istanbul.

One of Zahedi's clients, Mehdie Halatai, 72, of Oakton, said his 17-year-old son, Mehran, got the word in Abu Dhabi. "My son said the official told him very simply, 'No DNA test, no visa.' . . . There was no explanation," Halatai said.

Testing ultimately proved the relationship -- as it did for Zahedi's two other clients.

But the test cost about $800, and because there is no U.S. consulate in Iran, the family had to pay hundreds of dollars more in travel expenses to send Mehran Halatai back to Abu Dhabi for the test and a second consular interview. The back-and-forth also has added several months to Mehran Halatai's wait.

DOJ_NMG_0086144

Priscilla Labovitz, a lawyer practicing in the District, said a similar situation has delayed a Cameroonian-born client's reunion with his two teenage children in Mali for nearly two years.

"There's no alarm bell that goes off when you look at their documents," she said. "Yet this man has had to put up with hassle after hassle to arrange the DNA tests."

Zahedi wonders why her clients had to submit to them in the first place.

"I think they are being picked on because of where they're from. . . . After all these years of practice, why am I only seeing this coming into use now? It makes no sense unless someone from above is saying that they need to have more scrutiny of people from these places."

Tony Edson, deputy assistant secretary for visa services at the State Department, said consular officials are warned about credibility problems with particular types of documents from particular places. But he said that there is no blanket DNA test requirement for applicants based on nationality and that it is against agency rules for consular officials to require DNA testing in individual cases.

"Our policy is explicitly that it is not required. It is always voluntary," Edson said.

Edson added that a DNA test is one of a variety of types of supporting evidence that consular officers will accept from applicants whose primary documents are deemed insufficient.

"The confusion may arise," Edson said, from the fact that "we do require applicants to prove they are who they say they are. If everything else they present doesn't prove that, then we may suggest genetic testing."

Some lawyers counter that growing awareness of the accuracy of DNA testing -- which has been available since the late 1980s -- has caused consular officials to become unduly mistrustful of other legitimate forms of evidence.

"It seems like in the past they were more accepting of the fact that a lot of Third World countries may not be as sophisticated in their production of documents as the United States," said David Goren, a lawyer based in Silver Spring. "Now, if there's so much as a typo or some whiteout, it's just assumed that it's a fraudulent document."

Others contend that consular officials have good reason to be wary.

"Look, the consulates are just trying to prevent fraud," said Luis Gonzalez, a lawyer based in Falls Church. "A lot of people think that they can just come to the consulate and say this is my son, when really he's the nephew."

Several lawyers said they have had cases in which a client learned from DNA testing that the child being sponsored was not biologically related.

DNA tests can save considerable time and difficulty for someone like Pedro Antonio Monjaras, 47, a naturalized U.S. citizen living in Annandale who recently brought his 20-year-old daughter over from El Salvador. Monjaras said that he has always supported her financially but that he did not sign her birth certificate until five years ago. As a result, that document was not considered sufficient evidence of their relationship.

Monjaras might have been able to prove his case by submitting receipts for the money transfers he has sent his daughter and by obtaining affidavits from previous neighbors. But Monjaras, a delivery truck driver, said it would have taken months.

"You're here, they're over there, and each step takes forever to organize," he said. "I would literally have had to send people money for the pen and paper for each affidavit."

So when his attorney proposed a DNA test, Monjaras leapt at the idea.

"It was like, 'Great! Problem solved,' " he said.

TAX:

Tax Breaks For Football (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Before Miami police quelled the recent riot involving more than 100 University of Miami and Florida International University football players in the Orange Bowl, fighting erupted among fans in the stands. In two masterpieces of misdirected anxiety, the commissioner of the Atlantic Coast Conference, to which Miami belongs, said the rioting "has no place in college football" and the commissioner of FIU's Sun Belt Conference said "there is no place in higher education for the type of conduct exhibited."

But the question really raised by the barbaric behavior, and by nonviolent but nonetheless lurid behavior by some universities, is: What is the place of high-stakes football in higher education?

Twelve days before the Orange Bowl brawl, Republican Rep. Bill Thomas wrote, as chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, an eight-page letter to the president of the National Collegiate Athletic Association, asking awkward questions. Thomas wonders how, or whether, big-time college sports programs, which generate billions of tax-exempt dollars --

CBS pays the NCAA an annual average of $545 million, mainly for the rights to televise the March Madness basketball tournament -- further the purposes for which educational institutions are granted tax-exempt status. Other questions include:

How does the NCAA fulfill its proclaimed purpose of maintaining "the athlete as an integral part of the student body"? Only 55 percent of football players and 38 percent of basketball players at Division I-A schools graduate. The New York Times has reported that at Auburn, a perennial football power, many athletes have received "high grades from the same professor for sociology and criminology courses that required no attendance and little work." Eighteen members of the undefeated 2004 team took a combined 97 hours of those courses while at Auburn. Who believes such behavior is confined to Auburn?

In recent decades the NCAA has increased the number of games that football and men's basketball teams are allowed to play. Thomas wonders how these changes help athletes improve their academic performances. Perhaps these changes have pecuniary purposes?

The NCAA says it aims to "retain a clear line of demarcation between intercollegiate athletics and professional sports." But aside from not compensating the athletes in a way commensurate with the money they generate for the universities, how is that line clear?

Some say the tax-exempt status of college sports is justified by the fact -- and it is a fact -- that successful sports teams often trigger increased applications for admission, and largess from alumni and legislatures. But, Thomas notes, "federal taxpayers have no interest in increasing applicant pools at one school opposed to another." Furthermore, athletic success that causes a surge of giving to universities might decrease giving to worthy charities.

Also, tax exemption is financing an escalation of coaches' salaries. More than 35 college football coaches are paid more than $1 million annually. The University of Colorado athletic department has borrowed $8 million, much of which will be used to buy out the contract of a fired football coach. Noting that several universities pay their men's basketball coaches four to five times what they pay their women's basketball coaches, Thomas wonders: "What additional educational benefit do men's basketball coaches provide beyond that which is provided by women's basketball coaches?" If the disparity has a commercial rather than an educational rationale, why should the commerce be tax-free?

Tax exemption also is a federal subsidy for ever more lavish facilities: Oklahoma State University, which is receiving $165 million from T. Boone Pickens to improve its athletic facilities, was already planning a $102 million upgrade of its football stadium. OSU charges fans a $2,500 "annual donation" just to become eligible to buy tickets for the best seats. The University of Michigan, which has had 198 consecutive sellouts at its stadium -- it now seats 107,501 -- is spending $226 million to add 3,200 luxury seats and 83 suites. The University of Texas at Austin is spending $150 million to add 10,000 seats to its current 85,123 capacity. These may be sound commercial decisions, but why should this commerce be tax-exempt?

Thomas wants to know: How many NCAA members "generate a net profit on the operations of their athletic departments (excluding university subsidies such as student fees or general school funds and services)? Of the institutions that generate a net profit, how many use the profit for purposes unrelated to the athletic department?"

Thomas is retiring, but if Democrats capture control of the House, the new chairman of Ways and Means, Charles Rangel, may hold hearings into the NCAA's tax-free lifestyle. Such hearings will be embarrassing, if people who operate football and basketball factories are capable of embarrassment.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Feds Ease Limits On Same-sex Schools (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, October 25, 2006

For the first time in a generation, public schools have won broad freedom to teach boys and girls separately, stirring a new debate about equality in the classroom.

The Education Department on Tuesday announced rules that will make it easier to create single-sex classes or schools, a plan that's been expected for almost three years.

The move comes as the value of same-sex education is in doubt. Research shows mixed results, as even the department's own review says.

Yet Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said more parents deserve to have the option. The push began not with the White House, but rather with female senators of both parties.

"Research shows that some students may learn better in single-sex education environments," Spellings said, careful not to offer an outright endorsement.

DOJ_NMG_0086146

"The Department of Education is committed to giving communities more choices in how they go about offering varied learning environments," she said.

The new federal rules may change how schools will look in the future.

To be published Wednesday and take effect Nov. 24, the rules update the enforcement of Title IX, the landmark anti-discrimination law. The current language has stood since 1975.

Until now, single-sex classes have been allowed in only limited cases, such as gym classes and sex education classes.

The new rules will allow same-sex education anytime schools think it will improve students' achievement, expand the diversity of courses, or meet kids' individual needs.

Enrollment must be voluntary. And any children excluded from the class must get a "substantially equal" coed class in the same subject, if not a separate single-sex class.

Districts can also offer an entire school for one gender without doing the same for the other gender, as long as there is a coed school that provides substantially the same thing.

Advocacy groups for women criticized the new rules as a weakening of civil rights.

"That is not a substitute for true equality," argued Jocelyn Samuels, vice president for education and employment at the National Women's Law Center. "It's a very dangerous sign to schools, that they can relax their vigilance in ensuring equal educational opportunities," she said.

As one example, Samuels said, schools can now offer a specialized math class in physics for boys. Would the excluded girls, she wondered, get the same quality in a coed class?

Stephanie Monroe, who oversees civil rights for the Education Department, promised fair enforcement. The department will look at teacher quality, textbooks and other factors to determine if coed classes are essentially the same quality as the single-sex classes.

About 240 public schools offer same-sex education in the United States, up from just three in 1995, according to the National Association for Single Sex Public Education.

Given new federal clarity, "There's no question that we're going to see very dramatic growth in the next year or two," said Leonard Sax, the association's executive director.

He said separate classes can erode stereotypes — not reinforce them — by letting boys and girls explore their interests freely. A same-sex environment might encourage boys to play the flute, or girls to work on assembling computers, he cited as examples. Success requires involving parents and teachers, not just sticking kids in different rooms, he said.

Yet Sax also criticized the Bush administration for taking so long.

Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas and Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton led the way in 2001, pushing single-sex education options in the No Child Left Behind law.

The department released proposed regulations in March 2004. After 31 months, an unusually long review time, the agency is releasing final rules that are substantially the same.

Monroe said the department wanted to ensure the rules follow the law and the Constitution. Still, Samuels predicted the new rules would be challenged in court.

The changes affect elementary and secondary education, not colleges. The current ban on single-sex vocational education in both classes and schools at the K-12 level will remain.

Federal Rules Back Single-Sex Public Education (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24— The Bush administration is giving public school districts broad new latitude to expand the number of single-sex classes, and even schools, in what is widely considered the most significant policy change on the issue since a landmark federal law barring sex discrimination in education more than 30 years ago.

Two years in the making, the new rules, announced Tuesday by the Education Department, will allow districts to create single-sex schools and classes as long as enrollment is voluntary. School districts that go that route must also make coeducational schools and classes of “substantially equal” quality available for members of the excluded sex.

The federal action is likely to accelerate efforts by public school systems to experiment with single-sex education, particularly among charter schools. Across the nation, the number of public schools exclusively for boys or girls has risen from 3 in 1995 to 241 today, said Leonard Sax, executive director of the National Association for Single Sex Public Education. That is a tiny fraction of the approximately 93,000 public schools across the country.

“You’re going to see a proliferation of these,” said Paul Vallas, chief of schools in Philadelphia, where there are four single-sex schools and plans to open two more. “There’s a lot of support for this type of school model in Philadelphia.”

DOJ_NMG_0086147

Until now, Mr. Vallas said, there had been a threat of legal challenge that had delayed, for example, a boys charter school from opening in Philadelphia this September. New York City has nine single-sex public schools, most of which opened in the past four years.

While the move was sought by some conservatives and urban educators, and had backing from both sides of the political aisle, a number of civil rights and women's rights groups condemned the change.

"It really is a serious green light from the Department of Education to re-instituting official discrimination in schools around the country," said Marcia Greenberger, a co-president of the National Women's Law Center.

Under Title IX, the 1972 law that banned sex discrimination in educational institutions that receive federal funds, single-sex classes and extracurricular activities are largely limited to physical education classes that include contact sports and to sex education.

To open schools exclusively for boys or girls, a district has until now had to show a "compelling reason," for example, that it was acting to remedy past discrimination.

But a new attitude began to take hold with the passage of the No Child Left Behind law in 2002 when women senators from both parties came out in support of same-sex education and asked the Education Department to draft guidelines to permit their growth.

The new rules, first proposed by the Education Department in 2004, are designed to bring Title IX into conformity with a section of the No Child Left Behind law that called on the department to promote single-sex schools.

The interest in separating boys from girls in the classroom is part of a movement to allow more experimentation in public schools.

Although the research is mixed, some studies suggest low-income children in urban schools learn better when separated from the opposite sex. Concerns about boys' performance in secondary education has also driven some of the interest same-sex education.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings described the changes as part of a greater effort to expand educational options in the public sector. "Every child should receive a high quality education in America, and every school district deserves the tools to provide it," Ms. Spellings said.

She said that research supported offering single-sex education, and that the changes would not water down the protections of Title IX.

But Stephanie Monroe, who heads the Education Department's office of civil rights, acknowledged the equivocal nature of the department's own research on the issue.

"Educational research, though it's ongoing and shows some mixed results, does suggest that single-sex education can provide some benefits to some students, under certain circumstances," she said.

Although the changes announced Tuesday will not officially take effect until Nov. 24, school districts, including in New York City, had anticipated the new rules and some opened single-sex schools on the presumption of today's changes.

Kelly Devers, a spokeswoman for the New York City schools, said the system's lawyers planned to examine the rules to see how they expanded options for principals. Until now, public school districts that offered a school to one sex generally had to provide a comparable school for students of the other sex. The new rules, however, say districts can simply offer such students the option to attend comparable coeducational schools.

Critics argue that the changes contradicted the intent of Title IX and would not withstand a legal challenge — a point Education Department officials disputed.

Nancy Zirkin, vice president of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, an umbrella organization representing about 200 civil rights groups, said the new regulations "violate both Title IX and the equal protection clause of the Constitution."

"Segregation is totally unacceptable in the context of race," she said. "Why in the world in the context of gender would it be acceptable?"

The American Civil Liberties Union signaled it might consider going to court. "We are certainly in many states looking at schools that are segregating students by sex and considering whether any of them are ripe for a challenge," said Emily Martin, deputy director of the Women's Rights Project at the A.C.L.U..

Tom Carroll, chairman and founder of the Brighter Choice Charter School for Boys and the Brighter Choice Charter School for Girls in Albany, said the new regulations gave greater legal protections to single-sex schools that had, until now, operated under the threat of lawsuits by such groups. "The A.C.L.U. now has a dramatically steeper hill to climb to upset the apple cart on single-sex schools," Mr. Carroll said.

He said his schools' research showed boys were stronger in math and girls were stronger in literacy. But in recently released test scores, he said, his schools did better than any other public schools in Albany. "Paradoxically, by educating them separately," he said, "we were able to do much to reverse the gender gaps that typically leave girls behind in math and boys behind in literacy."

DOJ_NMG_0086148

Schools May Offer More Single-Sex Classes Under New U.S. Regulations (WP)

By Valerie Strauss

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

New federal regulations announced yesterday give school systems around the nation more flexibility in offering single-sex public education, even though the Department of Education concluded a year ago that there was not enough evidence to definitively evaluate single-sex classes.

Critics contended that the move was an invitation to schools to violate laws prohibiting sex discrimination in federally funded education programs.

The action, announced by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, gives school systems more freedom to establish single-sex schools and classes, as well as extracurricular activities at the elementary and secondary education levels. The regulations will take effect Nov. 24.

"Research shows that some students may learn better in single-sex education environments," Spellings said in a news release. "The Department of Education is committed to giving communities more choices in how they go about offering varied learning environments to their students."

The agency made the change even though it reported a year ago that there was not enough evidence to say whether single-sex education is beneficial or harmful to students.

Stephanie Monroe, assistant secretary for civil rights in the Education Department, said the agency received more than 5,800 comments from the public about the change.

"We didn't receive comments saying that it in and of itself was wrong," she said. People "were more concerned about the way it was being implemented."

Monroe added, "Students in public schools deserve the same opportunity of other students whose parents can afford to send them to private schools."

Earlier regulations permitted school systems to provide single-sex public schools to students of one sex if there were single-sex public schools for the other. Now school systems may open a single-sex school to students of one sex if there is a substantially equal single-sex or coeducational school for students of the other sex.

The American Civil Liberties Union said the new regulations are an open invitation to schools to violate Title IX, the federal law that prohibits sex discrimination in educational programs that receive federal funding.

"The regulations allow schools to separate girls and boys for virtually any reason they can dream up -- including outdated and dangerous gender stereotypes," Emily Martin, deputy director of the ACLU Women's Rights Project, said in a statement. "And although the administration's regulations claim to make these programs optional, sex segregation can never be truly voluntary."

Single-sex School Restrictions Ease (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, October 25, 2006

School districts across the nation this fall will have unprecedented freedom to open up all-girls' or all-boys' schools and classes under sweeping new regulations announced Tuesday by U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings.

The shift is the biggest in 31 years and for the first time allows schools to separate students by gender if they believe it helps — a standard that is under debate in the existing research.

Participation in such programs would be voluntary, but schools choosing to separate a class for one sex wouldn't have to provide an equivalent class for the other sex. They'd simply have to offer a "substantially equal" coed class in the same subject.

The regulations, which take effect Nov. 24, also clarify rules on creating entire single-sex public schools.

Since the current rules went into effect in 1975, single-sex classes have been allowed only on a limited basis, such as in charter schools, sex education courses or gym classes. The Bush administration, supported by Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas and Democratic New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, has favored loosening the rules.

There are 241 public schools offering single-sex coursework, up from just three in 1995, says Leonard Sax of the National Association for Single Sex Public Education. He thinks about 1 in 10 of the USA's 90,000 public schools could decide to become single-sex.

Critics, such as the American Association of University Women and the American Civil Liberties Union, call changes troublesome.

DOJ_NMG_0086149

Emily Martin of the ACLU Women's Rights Project said the new regulations “represent a through-the-looking-glass interpretation” of the federal Title IX law, which prohibits excluding students from school programs on the basis of sex. She noted that schools could now “separate girls and boys for virtually any reason they can dream up — including outdated and dangerous gender stereotypes.”

Spellings said research shows that “some students may learn better” in single-sex environments, but other administration officials Tuesday admitted that the best research offers only tepid support. A 2005 analysis of current research, cited on the department's website, noted that “any positive effects” of single-sex schooling on long-term academic achievement “are not readily apparent.”

The analysis found no differences on college test scores, graduation rates or graduate school attendance and bemoaned “the lack of high-quality research on these important criteria.” And it found no research on how single-sex schooling affects critical factors such as teen pregnancy rates, differential treatment by teachers, parental satisfaction and school bullying.

Speaking to reporters Tuesday, Stephanie Monroe, who heads the department's civil rights office, minimized the research, saying that as a parent she'd want all options available to her child.

“The department believes that this is an option that should be made available,” she said.

Public Schools Sanctioned For Single-sex Classes (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

The U.S. Department of Education yesterday announced new rules that will allow public schools to create classes, grades and even entire schools that teach students of one sex only.

"Research shows some students may learn better in single-sex educational environments," Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said in announcing changes that will take effect Nov. 24 and that will be voluntary.

"Every child should receive a high-quality education in America, and every school and district deserves the tools to provide it. These final regulations permit communities to establish single-sex schools and classes as another means of meeting the needs of students," the secretary said.

The guidelines have been studied for four years. Education officials began examining policy changes after research indicated that some students learn and behave better in boys-only or girls-only environments.

The American Association of University Women and other groups oppose single-sex schools.

"The research supporting single-sex education is inconclusive. Indeed, in its most recent report, the Department of Education calls ... the benefits of single-sex education equivocal," said Catherine Hill, the association's director of research.

Education Department officials in a teleconference yesterday made it clear that the evidence is mixed.

"The research suggests single-sex education can provide benefits to some students under certain circumstances," said Stephanie Monroe, the department's assistant secretary for civil rights.

"We're not imposing this as a one-size-fits-all mandate. This is an option that can be helpful to some students, and that's what the literature says. Local schools and parents will make the decision on what is appropriate for their students," she said.

The federal rules that will be published today in the Federal Register represent amendments to how the Education Department will enforce the Title IX anti-discrimination law of 1972. That law prohibits sex discrimination in education programs or activities that receive federal funds.

The need to ensure legal compliance was one reason why the regulations took so long to develop, Miss Monroe said. "This is an important issue, and we wanted to make sure the department got it right. ... We made sure [the amendments] are legally sound, are consistent with Title IX, and with the Constitution," she said.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales approved the guidelines after making a few changes that officials described as minor.

Kent Talbert, general counsel for the Education Department, said it "took two to three years" for officials to analyze more than 5,800 public comments on the issue of single-sex education.

Miss Monroe said most who commented "did not think single-sex education is wrong," but many "were concerned about how it would be implemented." She said the department thinks it has "adequately addressed those concerns."

Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women, said in an interview that her group is "very concerned" with the guidelines and repeatedly filed objections.

"Whenever there are efforts to provide separate but equal [programs], it never manages to be equal. Girls invariably get the short end," Mrs. Gandy said.

Single-sex classrooms have become more common, increasing from four public schools in 1998 to at least 228 today, according to the National Association for Single-Sex Public Education.

DOJ_NMG_0086150

In the Washington area, Frederick County's Twin Ridge Elementary School began offering all-boys classes for fourth- and fifth-graders two years ago. The decision was prompted by lagging test scores for boys, the school's principal told the Baltimore Sun in May 2004.

In Baltimore, at least eight city schools offer all-boys classes "taught by black men and designed to present role models to African-American boys," the Sun reported. This fall, Septima Clark Public Charter School in Ward 8 became the District's first all-boys charter school, The Washington Post reported.

Failing Schools Fighting Back (WP)

By Daniel De Vise

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Last summer, Sherina Garner was offered a chance that doesn't come often in public education: a free pass for her daughter to leave the neighborhood school for a better one.

She turned it down. Carlisha Garner, 11, returned to Beacon Heights Elementary this fall, even though the Prince George's County school had missed performance targets for the past two years and, under federal education law, the entire student body was entitled to transfer out.

"From what I can see, my child is very bright, and she has been getting a good education at Beacon Heights," Garner said. She didn't want her daughter to switch schools "just because of a test score."

This fall, 10 of the 450 students at Beacon Heights exercised the transfer option offered them under the No Child Left Behind Act -- a mere trickle, compared with the number of students who have left other Prince George's schools in the same predicament in recent years.

Rather than accept the inevitable stigma of being on the wrong side of the law's school choice provision, officials at Riverdale's Beacon Heights and other embattled schools are trying a new tack: fighting back by marketing themselves to parents.

They promote the extra resources afforded to schools after their test scores repeatedly fail to meet standards, the easy proximity of a neighborhood school, the familiarity of friends and even their so-called inadequate results.

Four years into No Child Left Behind, many of the campuses entering the school choice process are actually fairly good schools. Principals point out that the standard for "adequate yearly progress," the measure of success under the 2002 federal law, is a bit higher each year. And a school can be labeled a failure if any one of several statistical subgroups misses the mark. For example, the test scores of special education students or those with limited English skills can open an entire school to transfers.

In Prince George's, the epicenter of choice in Washington's suburbs, the number of elementary and middle schools on Maryland's school improvement list -- signaling two years of missed academic targets -- rose from 55 last year to 63 this year. Yet, new transfers totaled just 612 this fall, down from 955 last year and 1,071 in 2004.

Consistently, about 1 percent of students eligible to transfer nationwide elect to do so. Maryland reported a small decline in transfers in the 2005-06 academic year, after two years of growth, and the number is likely to slip further this year.

Transfers were meant as an exit strategy for parents at chronically low-performing schools in low-income communities. The option is limited to schools that receive federal Title I funds, reserved for high-poverty areas. But the choice program is "swimming upstream" in many communities, said Ann Chafin, a Maryland assistant superintendent of education who oversees school improvement.

The difficulty lies in persuading parents to leave a neighborhood school, even for a better one. "The neighborhood school concept is a very, very big deal," Chafin said.

Two years ago, Beacon Heights Elementary was the toast of Prince George's, the only school in the county to receive a 2004 Blue Ribbon, the highest honor that can be bestowed upon a school by the U.S. Department of Education.

Now, the school sits on the state's watch list, and parents are entitled to transfers. Weak reading scores in two programs -- special education and students of limited English proficiency -- caused Beacon Heights to miss its performance targets in 2005 and 2006. If just three more special education students had passed the state test this spring, the school would have averted transfers.

Letters went home over the summer to all parents, alerting them that they were free to leave and inviting them to a July 18 meeting.

Sherina Garner attended.

"I wanted to listen to what they had to say," she said. "But I already had a presumption inside of me" that Carlisha, entering sixth grade, would remain where she was.

DOJ_NMG_0086151

The school choice option allowed Carlisha to attend any of three other schools, all of which had made adequate yearly progress. One, Bond Mill, is the fourth-best elementary in Prince George's, in terms of advanced performance on the statewide test.

But Garner knew about Beacon Heights's Blue Ribbon. She knew that test scores had not changed much since then and that the school's curriculum remained fundamentally sound. And Carlisha could walk to the school.

Three dozen parents attended the meeting. Some were Spanish speakers under the misimpression that they had to leave the school. School system officials explained how the transfer worked. Then they made their pitch.

They told parents that a transfer would not necessarily deliver students to a better school. One of the three transfer options, Carrollton Elementary, actually had a slightly lower percentage of students rated advanced on the 2006 Maryland School Assessment, and only Bond Mill had significantly higher scores. Beacon Heights was getting a brand-new after-school program and a pair of faculty support specialists, not to mention the army of extra help already provided under various state and federal programs targeting poverty and language needs.

"We pretty much have most of our children in this building covered for extended learning opportunities in grade 2 to grade 6," said Lynne Stuewe, the Beacon Heights principal.

At Bond Mill, a receiving school for Beacon Heights and several other schools under the choice program, Principal Justin FitzGerald has watched transfer activity taper off this fall. Just seven new students entered the school on transfers this year, the smallest number since the program began, leaving the transfer population at 25 in a school of 575 students.

Some falloff is natural, he said, after the explosion of transfers in the first years of the federal program. But he also notes that not one student has transferred in from Beacon Heights.

Five adults joined the 25 students in Carlisha's Beacon Heights classroom on a recent morning: a faculty support specialist, funded by school improvement money; a teacher and assistant, funded by special education; an English for Speakers of Other Languages teacher; and the regular teacher, left with just a handful of students to supervise in a group exercise.

"In fourth grade, I was pleased," Garner said. "Fifth grade, I was pleased. And sixth grade, I'm hoping, will wind up the same way."

Prince George's accounted for 955 of the 1,590 school choice transfers approved in the 2005-06 academic year in Maryland, according to state data. The volume of transfer activity shows both a strength and a weakness of the school system, experts say: The county has a large number of schools performing poorly enough to trigger transfers but enough high-scoring schools to make transfers an appealing option to parents.

The ailing Baltimore school system, in contrast, had twice as many schools eligible for transfers last year but far fewer parents requesting them. In D.C. schools, tens of thousands of students at 81 schools were eligible for transfers last year. But only a few hundred students transferred. The problem, in both of those systems, is finding a school that is meeting its performance goals. One D.C. parent activist likened the transfer option there to shifting "the chairs on the deck of the Titanic."

National Medicaid Transport Probed (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

Federal auditors are examining the skyrocketing costs of providing transportation to Medicaid patients across the country, a problem that D.C. officials are struggling to control.

The Office of Inspector General for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services said it "will determine whether state Medicaid agencies make erroneous payments for transportation services," according to its recently released 2007 work plan.

Medicaid transportation costs across the nation rose by 48 percent from 1999 to 2003, reaching $1.5 billion, according to the work plan.

The District has seen its Medicaid transportation costs rise to more than $20 million overall last year. More than $16 million was spent on van rides alone, according to a report last month by the D.C. Office of the Inspector General.

But the city's Medicaid transportation program, which also pays for public transit and taxis, cost taxpayers $14.3 million in fiscal 2004, according to the D.C. inspector general's 2006 work plan.

The program was also the subject of recent reports by the city's inspector general and the D.C. Council Committee on Health.

The Washington Times on Monday reported that the District last year spent $22.3 million for nonemergency transportation of Medicaid patients -- slightly more than what the city paid for patients to see individual doctors, according to city records.

In the federal work plan, the inspector general does not single out the District or any state in outlining a review of Medicaid transportation services.

DOJ_NMG_0086152

Medicaid, which provides health insurance for the poor, is funded by the federal government and the states, which also manage their programs.

Reimbursement rates and rules for Medicaid transportation vary by state.

"Since so much money is involved here, the federal government certainly has a very keen interest in how it is spent," Donald White, spokesman for the HHS inspector general, said yesterday of the nationwide look at Medicaid transportation costs.

Health care consultant Robin Mathias said that it's not uncommon for Medicaid programs to lose 30 percent to 50 percent of nonemergency transportation spending to fraud and abuse.

"States may identify likely fraud months or years after payment by analyzing claims data, but the effort is often too little, too late," she said.

A few states, such as Illinois, are moving toward contracting with a limited number of companies through competitive bidding, instead of having an unlimited number of providers, Miss Mathias said.

"Transportation fraud is very common," she said. "One of the reasons is that there's no professional certification. You don't have to be a nurse or a physician or a medical practitioner. That opens it up to a much wider range of people."

Last month, D.C. Inspector General Charles J. Willoughby issued a report that uncovered "a serious breach of basic internal controls" in which the city's Medical Assistance Administration failed to document millions of dollars in Medicaid transportation expenditures.

In response, Dr. Gregg A. Pane, director of the D.C. Department of Health, which oversees the MAA, wrote that the current transportation system has "profound management and operational challenges to overcome."

Dr. Pane said that city health officials are "deeply committed to working to resolve these issues as soon as possible."

The Times found that gaining entry into the Medicaid transportation industry in the District has required little more than a driver's license, an inspected van, auto insurance and valid rates on file. The city has more than 200 Medicaid transportation providers.

Neither the city's Department of Health, which oversees Medicaid, nor the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Commission, which licenses motor carriers, has conducted background checks of company officials in recent years.

The review by The Times of court records and other official documents of transportation companies on the D.C. Medicaid provider directory found company officials with criminal histories and others with numerous driving violations.

The Washington-based Community Transportation Association of America says the District trailed only Alaska in how much it has paid for transporting Medicaid patients, according to D.C. Council documents.

Alaska encompasses more than 581,000 square miles; the District, 63 square miles. Commercial airfares account for more than 90 percent of Alaska's Medicaid transportation costs, while the District relies mostly on a fleet of private van carriers, according to records.

The District pays companies up to $140 per trip. By comparison, a cab ride across the city could cost as much as $40, plus tip.

Panel Plans Ways To Narrow Tax Gap (WSJ)

By Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Congress, in a perpetual hunt to raise revenue without appearing to raise taxes, has a new list of ways to fatten the federal Treasury.

One proposal would force brokers to track historical price-basis information on stock sales, which could mean a stiffer capital-gains hit for investors who, intentionally or not, misstate the original purchase price. Another proposal would tighten the interest deduction for some mortgage refinancings. Still another would remove a key tax advantage for many family-owned businesses.

The proposals, released to little fanfare last week by Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation, are viable options for lawmakers looking to offset the cost of future tax cuts, tax experts say. The nonpartisan joint committee estimates the revenue costs of tax measures and is an influential behind-the-scenes player in tax bills.

This list of revenue-boosting options was produced at the request of Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.), who asked the joint committee to pinpoint ways to close the estimated $290 billion tax gap, a measure of uncollected taxes.

Tax experts believe closing the gap will remain a significant goal of Congress regardless of which party prevails in next month's elections. "Over the long term, a number of the options will get looked at pretty hard because we will need revenues," says C. Clinton Stretch, partner at Deloitte & Touche LLP in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0086153

Brokerage firms are nervous about a recommendation to force brokers to report to the Internal Revenue Service the adjusted basis of publicly-traded securities sold during the preceding taxable year. Adjusted basis measures the original cost of a security for tax purposes.

While brokers foresee major record-keeping problems, many investors could end up paying higher taxes because the new records could document significant capital gains. The IRS estimates that underreporting of all capital gains resulted in $11 billion in uncollected taxes in 2001.

Some tax experts predict problems tracking records with older stock portfolios, inherited securities or portfolios recently transferred to a new firm. They urge that the requirement be applied to future stock transactions instead.

Ken Busey, a partner at PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP in Washington, says brokerage firms might report a basis figure to the IRS in conflict with a taxpayer's records, he says. Still, Sens. Grassley and Baucus have been examining a bill to require such basis reporting. Sen. Evan Bayh (D., Ind.) introduced a basis reporting bill earlier this year.

IRS taxpayer advocate Nina Olson made a similar recommendation in 2005. "For taxpayers, tracking basis can be extraordinarily complex and many taxpayers seeking to comply with the law find that they simply cannot do so with accuracy, leaving them exposed if audited," Ms. Olson wrote then.

The report also seeks to clear up confusion over timing of a homeowner's interest deduction when they refinance their home. Mortgage interest generally is deductible but there are important qualifications. Points paid on a refinancing generally must be claimed on a prorated basis over the life of the loan. Interest can be deducted on home-equity loans of as much as $100,000. The joint committee said homeowners are confused about mortgage-deduction rules, suggesting some are claiming more generous deductions. The committee is urging clearer details about these limits and timing restrictions for taxpayers.

The scope of erroneous mortgage deductions isn't clear. But since taxpayers are expected to deduct $69.4 billion in interest on homes in 2006, even low levels of avoidance "would involve significant dollar amounts," the report said. And many of such interest-deduction errors likely occurred during the recent mortgage-refinancing boom, says Bill Smith, national tax office director at CBIZ Inc., a Cleveland consulting firm. "I think the vast majority of people out there have no idea there are limits on deductibility on mortgage interest," he says.

The report proposes a significant tax-law change for law firms and family-owned personal-service firms, which may face new self-employment tax obligations. Typically, an executive in a "subchapter S corporation," used by many family businesses, takes a salary and distributes the remaining profit in a dividend that isn't subject to self-employment taxes, Mr. Smith says. The report suggests a new uniform rule to have these entities covered by the same self-employment tax regime as partnerships or sole proprietors.

Not having a uniform rule is a sizable problem: $39 billion of the tax gap was attributable to the self-employment tax and an estimated $15 billion of the tax gap attributable to unemployment taxes. Yet Mr. Smith says in his experience, most people using an S corporation don't pay themselves "ridiculously low" salaries and take the rest in a tax-advantaged dividend distribution. * * *

SOME 39 MILLION TAXPAYERS became ineligible this year for free electronic filing due to new income limits.

The IRS "Free File Alliance," launched in 2003, directs taxpayers from the agency's Web page to free taxfiling services of private-sector tax preparers such as H&R Block.

The firms restricted their free services in 2006 to taxpayers earning $50,000 or less. This limit arose after some tax preparers complained competing firms had lifted all income caps in a bid to boost market share. Some companies threatened to drop out of the alliance unless the IRS agreed to an income limit, negotiated in October 2005.

As a result, Treasury's Inspector General for Tax Administration or TIGTA, said the income limit cut program participation by 23%. It also made 39 million people ineligible for free tax filing and pointed to another problem: Only 38% of taxpayers with incomes less than $25,000 have access to the Internet, TIGTA said.

"Free File Alliance" had nearly four million participants in 2006, down from five million in 2005. * * *

BRIEFS: IRS announces a $15,500 limit for 401(k) contributions in 2007, up from $15,000 the prior year, thanks to a cost-of-living boost...U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last week praised the Justice Department's pursuit of tax crooks, citing 250 injunctions against tax-fraud promoters since 2001.

Where It's Always Christmas (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Harry Reid probably didn't give it much thought. When Christmas rolled around and it was time to contribute to the holiday fund for employees at the Ritz-Carlton condominium where he lives while in Washington, the Senate minority leader did what comes naturally to politicians these days: He dipped into his campaign account.

DOJ_NMG_0086154

As recent ethical transgressions go, the Nevada Democrat's actions aren't the biggest deal around. Election rules bar candidates from using campaign funds for personal expenses, but Reid contends that the tips were to thank the staff for the hassle of dealing with a resident dignitary. That's arguable, and after the Associated Press reported on Reid's donor-funded generosity, he repaid the three years of campaign-funded tips, $3,300.

Reid's actions are more important, though, as an illustration of the entrenched, bipartisan congressional mind-set of entitlement. Republicans and Democrats may not agree on much, but their joint operating ethos too often boils down to an attitude of: "It's my due. Why shouldn't I?"

Lawmakers have steadfastly resisted clamping down on privately funded travel. They have refused to do away with free use of corporate jets. They eagerly take freebies such as skybox tickets and expensive meals under the prevailing "don't ask, don't pay" congressional culture in which someone else -- a company, a campaign committee -- is always picking up the tab.

Absolute power may corrupt absolutely, but it also corrupts trivially. What's striking about Congress (aside from flagrantly corrupt members such as former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham) is the nickel-and-dime nature of the benefits they feel entitled to take, from Reid's acceptance of free boxing tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to California Republican Rep. John Doolittle's use of campaign funds to pay the babysitter.

Certainly this attitude is not solely a congressional phenomenon. In a report studded with delicious morsels, the Justice Department's inspector general last week chronicled the exploits of Carl Truscott, former head of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives -- and the resources Truscott abused were taxpayer dollars, not private funds. While his agency was having to cut back on bulletproof vests for agents, Truscott was arranging for deluxe features in the director's suite of the agency's new building, including a flat-panel television in his private bathroom and a parquet floor modeled on those in the vice president's ceremonial office. Unlike his predecessors, he traveled with an extensive security entourage, and because the director "did not like to wait," security personnel met him at the airport to bypass lines. He violated government ethics rules by using "significant ATF resources" -- about 20 agency employees ended up being drafted to help -- on his nephew's high school project to produce a video about the ATF.

There's something about Congress, though, that may especially invite such grandiosity. As Truscott's escapades show, executive branch officials may be catered to by subservient staff, but there are at least civil service protections for those who dare to complain and inspectors general to expose the most egregious misbehavior. But where are the checks on Congress? In theory, the fear of being dinged by a campaign opponent might restrain lawmakers; in reality, given gerrymandered districts, that might not be much of a deterrent. Instead, lawmakers are surrounded by staff members, lobbyists and others whose only incentives are to satisfy their whims, not resist them.

Cunningham offers a case in point. A summary of his dealings with staffers at the House intelligence committee showed how their compliance enabled him to direct at least $70 million in contracts to corrupt defense contractors. Bullied and cowed by Cunningham, committee staff ignored "red flags" and dutifully satisfied his requests, the report found. After the report was released, I asked the committee spokesman whether any disciplinary action would be taken. He was thunderstruck. What, he asked, was the staff to do in the face of a lawmaker's demands? "Have you ever worked in Congress?" he asked. (No.)

Last week an NBC-Wall Street Journal poll reported the lowest public approval rating for Congress since 1992. What I wondered about was this: Who are the 16 percent who approve?

Diplomacy Turns A Profit (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Ambassadorial wives are often hard-pressed to find something to do when overseas.

But it seemed Lisa Vershbow , wife of Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea, had found her niche, picking up on her abilities as a costume jewelry maker.

At diplomatic receptions, she handed out name cards that said "Lisa Vershbow Jewelry Design" and gave her address as the U.S. Embassy residence, according to the Korea Times.

Vershbow set up a workshop in the residence and sold her work through a Seoul gallery. Over a two-week period, the Times reported, the gallery sold $20,000 worth of her pieces and, after deducting sales taxes, split the net with her.

She told the Times that she'd gotten an okay with embassy staff to do the exhibit. But the Korean Immigration Bureau says she didn't get a required work permit, a violation of the Korean Immigration Control Act.

And, she said of her customers, "I always wonder, would people still come if I weren't the U.S. ambassador's wife?"

No.Sex, Lies and the White House

And now, a Loop public service item. This month's special cheesecake edition of Esquire magazine features actress Scarlett Johansson as "The Sexiest Woman Alive." It's part of a fine photo display of "The Women We Love" from various fields -

DOJ_NMG_0086155

- movies, news, television commercials. The section includes "Women We're Ashamed to Love," topped by White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino .

"Hotter than Tony Snow and Scott McClellan combined," Esquire says of Perino. "Plus, the executive branch seems so much more capable in her dulcet voice. Lie to us, Dana. Lie to us."

Oddly, there is no picture of Perino included. So for Loop fans who don't read Esquire:Forgive and Forget

Former president Bill Clinton , talking to Democratic contributors here last week, recounted how he had earlier chatted with Jim Webb , a Virginia former Republican who is running for the Senate as a Democrat.

"He said: 'I can't believe you're going to campaign for me after all the terrible things I said about you,' " Clinton said.

Clinton said he told Webb that "if that was my test, I'd have no one to campaign for."

No doubt. Not even Hillary.Smash-Mouth Politics

It's getting rough out there in Wyoming, where six-term Rep. Barbara Cubin (R) is heavily favored over Democrat Gary Trauner .

During Sunday's televised debate, Libertarian Party candidate Thomas Rankin criticized Cubin for taking contributions from former House majority leader Tom DeLay . Moments after the lights went down, an upset Cubin said to Rankin: "If you weren't sitting in that chair, I'd slap you across the face," the Casper Star-Tribune reported.

Rankin has multiple sclerosis and uses an electric wheelchair.

Cubin publicly apologized yesterday, saying, "It was person to person and it was not an attack on the disabled. In retrospect, I was wrong in what I said and I apologize."

The popular Cubin is a Class of '94 member who pledged to serve no more than six terms.There's a Fox Following the Ambassador

Famed Washington lobbyist Tom Korologos , a Nixon and Ford White House aide and former Senate confirmation guru, is said to be leaving his fine posting as ambassador to Belgium early next year. Korologos, 73, often known as the 101st senator, helped out in Iraq in 2003.

Word is the White House has tapped wealthy St. Louis developer Sam Fox , 77, to replace Korologos. Fox, a major GOP fundraiser, is national chairman of the Jewish Republican Coalition.Five Governments, One Crazy Guy

The press keeps badgering the Bush administration over why it won't negotiate one-on-one with the government of lunatic North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il over the latter's nuclear program.

The reasons are obvious, but reporters just don't get it. CNN's Zain Verjee , in an interview last week with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Beijing, asked: "What do you have to lose?"

"Well, what we have to lose," Rice explained patiently, "is the power of five countries telling the North Koreans . . . that the program is unacceptable. The North Koreans would like nothing better than to divide us so that they can negotiate with each separately and they don't have to face the collective power of the five parties."

Ah, the indomitable power of five. Worked pretty well so far.

White House's Chief Usher Is Bowing Out (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Gary Walters, the longtime chief usher at the White House who has kept the secrets of seven first families, will retire at the end of the year after nearly four decades of service.

Walters, 60, who manages the 132-room mansion with a staff of 95 and a $10 million budget, said last night that he told first lady Laura Bush and the president last week of his decision.

"It's been nearly 40 years of not having an opportunity to set my own agenda and never knowing when I'd be home, " Walters said. "It's been wonderful but it just felt like it was time for me to go."

In a statement, President Bush and the first lady praised Walters, who also worked for the first Bush White House, and said that they were "grateful for making our family feel at home."

Walters arrived at the White House in 1970 as a uniformed Secret Service agent. He joined the usher's staff in 1976 and became chief usher in 1986 under President Ronald Reagan.

He has been charged with special diets and teenage parties, tending dogs and overseeing chefs. In addition, he oversees housekeepers, cooks, electricians and carpenters. And everyone knows that he knows. Walters was even called to testify during the Whitewater investigation in the mid-1990s, when billing records that had been subpoenaed two years earlier suddenly appeared at the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0086156

"He's been pushing the buttons at the White House for 21 years, and he will not be an easy gentleman to replace," said Roland Mesnier, who retired as White House pastry chef in 2004. "It is a very difficult job. It's like a double-edged knife. You have to make sure everything is done properly at the institution, and you have to protect the first family. Sometimes it's a tough call."

Walters made one of those calls when the Clintons were departing in 2000. He approached the White House counsel's office to ask whether the family should be taking furnishings that he believed were government property. Although he was told that the items belonged to the Clintons, the items were returned. That was one instance when Walters was not shy about sharing a story with the media.

According to Susan Whitson, a spokeswoman for Laura Bush, Walters said his predecessor had once advised him to give his successor a couple of years to get ready for a new president. With the Bushes leaving the White House in 2009, now was his time to follow that advice.

Walters said he has given some thought to writing a book -- but certainly not a tell-all.

He said that he made suggestions to the Bushes about a process for succession, but he would not disclose whether he had recommended any specific replacement.

Trademark Office To Experiment With Telecommuting (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Want to work for a Washington area agency and live on the Florida coast, or in the Blue Ridge Mountains of North Carolina, or among the bluebonnets of Texas?

As fanciful as that may seem, it will be possible under a telecommuting pilot project developed by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office -- inside the Beltway in Alexandria -- and one of its unions.

Under the pilot, 10 experienced trademark lawyers with good job-performance ratings will be permitted to move anywhere in the continental United States and work from home.

"To my knowledge, there is no other program like this in the federal government," said Howard Friedman , president of National Treasury Employees Union Chapter 245.

There is a catch. The lawyers must show up once a week at the Alexandria headquarters, at their own expense. That requirement will allow the PTO to keep the employees on the roster at agency headquarters and avoid triggering a law that mandates reimbursement for employee travel and per diems.

The "geographic expansion pilot," as the PTO calls the project, is scheduled to start next year and will be evaluated after six months. If the program is successful, the PTO plans to allow more lawyers to volunteer for it and to seek a waiver from Congress and the Bush administration so that the long-distance telecommuters do not have to report in person each workweek to headquarters.

"Ultimately, we'd like to get to a point where people come in the office less frequently than once a week," said Deborah Cohn , deputy commissioner for trademark operations. "We'll be trying to get to a point where, if they live in North Carolina or Florida, they don't have to come in except on rare occasions."

Cohn said the PTO decided to sponsor the pilot program after hearing from employees who want to be able to move away from the Washington area for family or lifestyle reasons. "Telework is a fabulous retention tool," she said. "We want to keep them; they are good employees."

Cohn and Friedman said the pilot builds on a nearly 10-year-old trademark office program that permits attorneys to work from their homes. About 220 trademark lawyers, out of 265 who are eligible, are telecommuters. Trademark lawyers typically can apply to telecommute after they have worked at the agency more than two years and show they can successfully meet rigorous productivity standards.

Program rules require the telecommuters to live within 110 miles of the PTO -- a limitation Cohn said was designed for an era when the agency installed desktop computers in employees' homes and arranged for cable companies to provide Internet service.

Today, most trademark lawyers work on laptops, and changes in technology have made it easier for them to connect to agency networks from their homes. The advent of Internet-based telephone service also makes it less expensive for trademark lawyers to provide services to companies and others who do business with the agency.

The PTO is in the vanguard of the government's work-at-home movement. In addition to trademark lawyers, about 500 senior patent examiners are telecommuting in a program that began in February. Over time, it could grow to as many as 3,000 examiners.

DOJ_NMG_0086157

Telecommuting has been increasing in the federal government since 2000, but only 7.7 percent of the federal workforce telecommuted in 2004, according to the government's most recent report. The participation rate jumped to 19 percent when measured by the number of jobs that agencies have declared suitable for telecommuting.

Cohn noted that the trademark office has some experience with long-distance telecommuters. The agency has permitted at-home work by an employee in Harrisburg, Pa., and one in Long Island, N.Y., she said. A number of agency telecommuters live in the Annapolis and Baltimore areas, she noted.

The pilot, Friedman said, shows the value of telecommuting, especially for agencies updating contingency plans for redeploying employees if federal offices are closed because of pandemics or terrorist attacks.

Office chatter indicates that some trademark lawyers are interested in moving to Texas, Florida, North Carolina, Delaware and Illinois, Friedman said.

"Our people are chomping at the bit," he said. "I'll be curious to see how many people apply, and curious to see where they move."

Face Facts (NYT)

By Lawrence M. Wein

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Stanford, Calif.

DESPITE all the attention given to anthrax and smallpox and potential weapons of mass destruction, pandemic influenza is probably the world's most serious near-term public health threat. If a strain similar in effect to the 1918 Spanish flu (which killed tens of millions of people worldwide) emerges in the next several years, it is highly likely that an effective vaccine will not be available during the pandemic's first wave, that we won't have enough antiviral drugs for large-scale prophylactic use, and that hospitals will be too overwhelmed to treat most cases.

Consequently, as in 1918, we will need to combine medical efforts with voluntary and forced social changes — closing schools and churches, canceling public gatherings, keeping workers at home — to hinder the flu's spread. Our government must draw up a plan for educating the public about effective nonpharmaceutical interventions like hand washing and face protection like masks.

A prerequisite for doing so is determining the biggest culprit in spreading influenza: droplet transmission, in which an infected person sneezes or coughs directly into the mouth, nose or eyes of someone who is susceptible); contact transmission, in which virus is transferred via hands either directly, say, through a handshake, or indirectly through an object like a doorknob; and aerosol transmission, in which evaporated virus-containing particles are inhaled.

Remarkably, this issue has not been resolved: the Department of Health and Human Services' Pandemic Influenza Plan states that "the relative clinical importance of each of these modes of transmission is not known." As a result, the government enthusiastically endorses frequent hand washing — which would reduce contact transmission, and costs nothing — but remains noncommittal about face protection. While the government says that it might be beneficial, it doesn't make respirators or masks available. Yet face protection would guard against aerosol and droplet transmission, and even reduce contact transmission by making it difficult to place fingers into one's mouth or nose.

A Stanford graduate student, Michael Atkinson, and I recently performed a detailed study of the routes of transmission, using data on influenza and on rhinovirus, which causes the common cold. Our findings suggest that the dominant mode of transmission for influenza is aerosol — implying that hand washing will make little difference. This is consistent with the views of leading researchers several decades ago, views that have somehow been forgotten by the public health community.

We found that ventilation, like placing a fan in an open window, and humidifiers (most influenza strains survive in the air for much less time when the humidity is raised to about 65 percent) can reduce transmission slightly. Sleeping in separate bedrooms (and working in separate offices) can help even more.

But the single most effective intervention is face protection. And because roughly one-third of influenza transmissions occur before an infected person exhibits symptoms, these precautions should be taken whenever people are in the same room throughout the pandemic period.

There are two kinds of face protection: N95 respirators, as worn by construction workers, for instance, and surgical masks of the sort worn by dental hygienists. (The respirators cost roughly a dollar apiece, the surgical masks 10 cents.) Their efficacy in preventing aerosol transmission depends on three factors: the extent to which the face filter prevents virus particles from passing through, how tightly the device fits and — most important — how long people can be coerced into wearing them.

To our surprise, we found that the filters in surgical masks, although not as good as the filters in N95 respirators, are still quite effective. And although a surgical mask fits much more loosely and allows more leakage, it's also more comfortable — and therefore likely to be effective because it's used more. Wearing nylon hosiery over a surgical mask essentially eliminates the face leakage, making this combination a practical, albeit macabre, alternative. The less comfortable N95 respirators would probably result in lower compliance.

DOJ_NMG_0086158

The government doesn't stockpile masks and respirators, and the manufacturers aren't able to produce a huge number of them quickly. But the way forward seems clear: the government needs to build up a supply of respirators and masks just as it does with vaccines and antivirals. It should first hire a whiz-bang design company to create, within one month, a surgical mask that comfortably adheres to the face, and then decide on the appropriate mix of respirators and masks. Next, it needs to sign contracts with manufacturers to stockpile masks and respirators, relieving the manufacturers of liability issues.

Although there is very little technological risk involved (masks and respirators are easier to make and safer to use than vaccines), several issues need to be ironed out. First, the effectiveness of N95 respirators and masks varies widely. The government needs to educate the public (the brands are anonymous in the published studies) and should stockpile only the most effective brands.

Also, if respirators and masks are discarded daily, as they are in many hospitals, the national demand during a three-month pandemic could be 10 to 20 billion, and the cost for respirators for a family of four several hundred dollars. Such waste isn't necessary. The virus does not survive longer than a few hours on the material used for masks and respirators, so they should be re-used until they disintegrate.

The government and the public health community must switch mindsets, from the current perspective of protecting workers paid to do a dangerous job everyday, to that of providing citizens with the tools to best protect themselves during a pandemic.

It may take 18 months to build a stockpile of respirators and masks, so there is no time to lose. The American people's faith in their government will be seriously undermined if, along with larger measures like school closings, it cannot provide effective face protection for its citizens during a deadly pandemic. Masks and respirators may be our main lines of defense during a pandemic.

OTHER NEWS:

US Stocks Quiet As Fed Meets (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

US stocks were caught in narrow ranges on Tuesday, as earnings continued flowing while unsettled investors were distracted by the two-day policy meeting of the Federal Reserve.

At the close, the S&P 500 was up 0.36 points, or 0.03 per cent, at 1,377.38 while the Nasdaq Composite was 10.72 points, or 0.5 per cent, lower at 2,344.84. The Dow Jones Industrial Average settled up 10.97 points at 12,127.88, marking its fourth record close in five days.

Some observers warn that the surge in equities since markets bottomed in July might not be sustainable. "The break-neck expansion of the past three months may give way to a needed short-term pause in the coming weeks," noted David Shairp, global strategist at JPMorgan Asset Management.

Among steel-makers Nucor was up $6.47, or 11.74 per cent, at $61.58 and US Steel up $3.61, or 5.4 per cent at $70.19. Carmaker General Motors hit a 52-week peak for the second successive day with investors expecting good earnings on Wednesday as GM executes its turnround plan. GM rose $1, or 2.8 per cent, to $36.19 and is up 86 per cent for the year.

Chemicals group DuPont, trimmed earlier gains, but closed 55 cents, or 1.2 per cent, higher at $46 after posting stronger than expected earnings and reiterating a solid outlook for 2006.

Hurting the Nasdaq was a decline in Qualcomm. Its shares fell $1.37, or 3.6 per cent, to $36.71 on reports that its patent case against Nokia might be reviewed by the courts.

Lucent rose 15 cents, or 6.4 per cent, at $2.49, on earnings of 7 cents per share, above consensus estimates of 4 cents. The telecomms equipment maker is being acquired by France's Alcatel. The deal is expected to close at the end of the year.

Taking a tumble was Tellabs, down 62 cents, or 5.6 per cent, at $10.40 after the company reported a 41 per cent rise in profits, but its broadband division saw sales growth rise just 3 per cent.

TD Ameritrade fell 79 cents, or 4.75 per cent to $15.84 while shares in Omnicom were up $6.23, or 6.6 per cent, at $101.11 after the advertising group delivered earnings of estimates.

Appliance maker Whirlpool cut its estimate for appliance industry unit shipment growth in North America. Its shares were down $2.63, or 2.9 per cent, at $86.70.

Reporting weaker than forecast results for the third quarter was Kraft Foods, which dropped 94 cents or 2.6 per cent, at $35.36.

DOJ_NMG_0086159

Texas Instruments was down $1.36, or 4.3 per cent, at $30.52 after it missed estimates and lowered guidance for the fourth quarter.

First Data shares rose 54 cents, or 2.4 per cent, to $23.49 after the company announced a $700m share buy-back and first quarterly earnings since selling Western Union. Separately, Western Union rose 37 cents, or 1.9 per cent, at $19.95 after its earnings beat estimates.

Dow Edges Higher To Another Record Despite Rising Oil Prices, Fed Concern (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Investors shied from making big bets ahead of the Federal Reserve's latest interest-rate decision, due out this afternoon.

On a day when major stock indicators ended mixed, the Dow Jones Industrial Average did close at another record, its 11th in the past 16 sessions. The Dow rose 10.97 points, or 0.09%, to end at a high of 12127.88, up 13.2% on the year.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index inched up 0.36 point, or 0.03%, to finish at 1377.38. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 10.72 points, or 0.46%, to 2344.84, up 6.3% on the year.

Fed officials are expected to leave their interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25%, although their written statement, expected at 2:15 p.m. EDT, may offer surprises for Wall Street.

Even without the central bankers' thoughts in hand, investors' hopes for a rate cut by the end of the year have been fading in recent days, amid a generally strong batch of strong third-quarter corporate earnings reports.

Drew Matus, economist at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., said there is some risk that the Fed could sound a "hawkish" note about inflation fears, meaning a signal that higher interest rates may yet be needed to stem a general rise in prices throughout the economy. With earnings strong and falling pump prices putting more money in consumers' pockets, Mr. Matus said he sees little chance that the Fed will go the other way and signal a cut anytime soon.

Mr. Matus said he anticipates the "secondary effects" of a slowing housing market, including reduced consumer spending via home-equity loans, won't become evident until sometime in early 2007. "Until we see that, I don't think the Fed is going to go out of its way to convince people to price a rate cut into the markets," he said.

Rising crude-oil prices damped the mood in the stock market. Cold weather in the Northeast drove crude-oil futures for December delivery up 54 cents, or 0.92%, to $59.35 a barrel, off 2.8% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Meanwhile, gasoline futures jumped 6.65 cents a gallon, or 4.5%, to $1.5380, though 41% off the Nymex record high of $2.6145, made in August 2005. Heating-oil futures rose 2.62 cents a gallon, or 1.6%, to $1.6952.

In addition to the Fed announcement, investors will watch for fresh data on existing home sales due out from the Commerce Department.

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms, including a 5½-year high in London for the FTSE 100 index. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.09%, or 0.2 point, to 226.32.

In U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.78 billion shares, as 1,850 stocks advanced and 1,459 fell.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year note rose 1/32 point, or 31.25 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.824%, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond rose 3/32 to yield 4.946%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.30 yen, compared with 119.33. The euro rose to $1.2563, compared with 1.2550.

How Much Is Too Much? (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Behind the closed doors of the Federal Reserve's marble temple on Constitution Avenue, a fervent debate is underway this week. The subject might seem, at first glance, to reflect minor differences of opinion.

Should the Fed explicitly tell the public what level of inflation it wants to achieve? And if so, should that goal be in the 1 to 2 percent range, or "comfort zone," expressed by many central bankers in recent years, or should the upper limit be raised to as high as 3 percent?

Close as those numbers may sound, the implications for every American family are substantial. If the Fed enforces a low-inflation goal vs. one that is slightly higher, consider what a pair of pants or a loaf of bread would cost a decade from now, assuming they track the overall inflation rate.

DOJ_NMG_0086160

If inflation runs a modest 1.5 percent a year, typical of the level in the late 1990s, a $70 pair of pants would cost $81.24 in 10 years and a $2.79 loaf of bread would cost $3.24. But if inflation, running at more than 2 percent recently, is allowed to creep up to 3 percent a year, those pants would cost $94.07 in a decade, and the bread would cost $3.75.

How much people's paychecks will buy in the future, how far their retirement money will go, how many people might need to be thrown out of work to achieve a stated inflation goal -- all these outcomes could be influenced by a debate among the nation's central bankers at their meetings yesterday and today, to which the public has no access.

Among the main topics to be discussed is how the Fed might communicate more with the public about its private deliberations, economic forecasts, goals and strategies.

One option, long-advocated by Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, is for the Fed to adopt a formal, numerical inflation goal, a practice called inflation targeting and used by central banks in 25 countries. The Bank of England, for example, is one of several central banks that seeks to keep inflation at or near 2 percent.

Alan Greenspan, Bernanke's predecessor who retired in January, opposed inflation targeting, uneasy with rules that might limit his flexibility. He defined the Fed's goal of "price stability" more vaguely -- as inflation so low it does not influence consumers and businesses.

As long as Greenspan was chairman, inflation targeting was moot at the Fed. That changed overnight with President Bush's selection of Bernanke. His arrival has moved the issue to the top of the Fed's agenda.

The policymaking Federal Open Market Committee includes supporters and skeptics, making a quick decision unlikely. If committee members ultimately decide to adopt a target in principle, the next challenge would be setting the number.

Bernanke is among many Fed policymakers who have said in recent years they prefer to keep inflation in a range of 1 to 2 percent, using the central bank's preferred measure, which excludes volatile food and fuel prices. Such pronouncements about "core inflation" have led financial markets to view this range as the Fed's comfort zone, or informal target.

But some Fed committee and staff members believe the range of 1 to 2 percent may be too low. They think a better range might be 1 to 3 percent, or perhaps 1.5 to 2.5 percent.

Some financial analysts and investors say these views may help explain why Fed policymakers stopped raising interest rates after their June meeting, even though inflation has exceeded 2 percent for more than two years and is forecast to hover above that level through next year.

"Why are they so tolerant of inflation above 2 percent?" asked Laurence H. Meyer, a former member of the Fed Board of Governors. "Maybe because they aren't aiming for 1.5 percent. It's possible that in practice, the midpoint of the range we should infer from their actions is higher than 1.5 percent."

In contrast, Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, has said repeatedly that he wants to see inflation average about 1.5 percent over time, varying within the range of 1 to 2 percent. At each of the past two policymaking meetings, where the Fed left its benchmark short-term rate unchanged at 5.25 percent, he cast the sole dissenting vote.

The committee is widely expected to hold the benchmark rate steady today, while leaving the door open to more rate increases if inflation does not come down.

Gary H. Stern, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, said in an interview last week that "things are a little awkward now" because financial markets are not sure of the committee's inflation objective.

The difference between 1.5 and 3 percent inflation may sound small, but it can have big effects on investors, consumers and the economy. Consumer price inflation erodes the buying power of the dollar. That lowers returns on investments in stocks, bonds and other assets. It also eats away at savings and means a fixed income buys less every year.

High inflation disrupts economic growth by making it difficult for businesses, investors and families to plan, as did ruinous double-digit inflation during the 1970s.

Conversely, central bankers don't like to let inflation get near zero, fearing that prices could cross the line and actually start falling, a phenomenon known as deflation. Deflation discourages consumers and businesses from borrowing and spending, as happened during the Great Depression of the 1930s and in Japan for most of the past decade.

Fed policymakers were delighted in the late 1990s when the economy grew at a strong pace and inflation averaged 1 to 2 percent.

But their thinking shifted after the stock bubble burst, leading to the 2001 recession and an initially weak economic recovery. Mindful of Japan's deflation, Greenspan and others grew worried as inflation drifted toward 1 percent. By May 2003, they announced they would prevent inflation from falling farther; Bernanke, then a member of the Fed Board of Governors, declared that summer that inflation below 1 percent was "undesirable."

By October 2003, Bernanke said in a speech that academic research suggested "something in the vicinity of 2 percent" would be the best long-term average.

DOJ_NMG_0086161

More recently, many analysts and investors say Fed policymakers have already moved their informal inflation goal slightly higher than 1 to 2 percent, but will not say so publicly for fear financial markets will question their inflation-fighting resolve.

The Fed "is acting as if the comfort zone is somewhat higher, just not saying so," said Paul McCulley, managing director of Pacific Investment Management Co.

A recent survey of bond investors by Macroeconomic Advisers LLC found about half of them do not believe the Fed is setting interest rates as though it were trying to keep inflation within the range of 1 to 2 percent.

Financial markets would probably accept a Fed target of 1.5 to 2.5 percent, said David Shulman, a senior economist with the UCLA Anderson Forecast. But if policymakers said they would tolerate 3 percent inflation, he said, "you'll get a sell-off" in the stock and bond markets.

Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research Corp., said anything above 2 percent would be "a hard sell" on Wall Street.

"The markets are going to see this and say, 'Wait a sec -- you don't like what you see so you change the rules in the middle of the game?' " he said. "It absolutely crushes the inflation-fighting credibility of the Fed."

If Fed policymakers adopt a formal target, they would have many details to flesh out: Which inflation measure should they use? Should the target be a numerical point or a range? What would be the time frame for achieving the goal?

Stern, the Minneapolis Fed president, said last week he supports a numerical goal, but added, "I haven't decided on what it should be."

Winter-Heating Bills Are Tough To Forecast (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

A substantial drop in natural-gas prices won't help some U.S. consumers with their heating bills this winter. As a result, some utilities are waiting to see whether households dial back their thermostats -- and whether that could hurt their earnings.

Some utilities that raised rates significantly last year, in the aftermath of gas-production disruptions along the Gulf Coast, will offer substantial reductions this year because of the fall in gas prices. Others will have modest increases or decreases depending on whether they locked in gas supplies when prices were high or rolled the dice on the spot market. Gas-commodity costs make up 50% to 80% of a common residential bill, and gas heats more than half of all U.S. homes.

Many utilities sock away large quantities of gas in spring and summer so it can be consumed in the winter. The companies then make spot-market purchases, as needed. More utilities are making purchases in other months and are leaning more heavily on financial-hedging tools to protect their customers against price shocks. About 70% of gas utilities enter into financial hedges to protect their customers, according to the American Gas Association, a trade group in Washington, D.C.

The different approaches account for different consumer outcomes in different places. AGL Resources Inc., of Atlanta, said it will offer reductions of 5% to 28% this winter at the five utilities it owns in six states, with the largest decrease in Virginia. That is partly because Virginia is one of the few states that discourages hedging, so it relies more on current market prices.

That has worked out well this year because prices have dropped. In recent trading, a 12-month strip of gas -- a contract for a set supply monthly for a year -- could be purchased on the New York Mercantile Exchange for $7.97 a million British thermal units, compared with $11.67 a million BTUs a year earlier, a decline of 32%. U.S. gas inventories have swelled to 3.44 billion cubic feet, their highest level ever, according to the Energy Information Administration, of Washington, D.C.

PIPED IN FROM RUSSIA

· Energy Diary:1 Many European countries depend on natural gas brought in by pipeline from Russia.

MORE ON ENERGY

· Entergy to Keep New Orleans Unit2

· BP's Net Falls 3.6% on Prudhoe Bay Shutdown3

At AGL's Chattanooga Gas Co. in Tennessee, a 24% reduction in the commodity portion of each bill will translate into savings of $29.50 in November and $56.60 in December for the average household. Although that is welcome news, it leaves prices relatively high because rates jumped 39% last winter.

Even though gas-commodity costs are a pass-through expense for utilities, the companies can suffer if their customers suffer. NiSource Inc., of Merrillville, Ind., said in August that it expects to lose 1.2% of its residential customers this year, most due to shutoffs for nonpayment. That is a 10% increase in customer losses from 2005 and is twice as great as what it expected. NiSource owns 10 gas utilities in nine states with 3.8 million metered customers.

Overall, residential-gas use at NiSource companies has fallen 5% this year, on top of a 4% drop last year, Chief Executive Bob Skaggs told investors. He said in August it is "highly unlikely" the company will meet its earnings targets for 2006, as a result of this growing conservation effect.

DOJ_NMG_0086162

NiSource's experience suggests there may be more pain ahead -- both for utilities and customers -- than what the federal government expects. In its annual winter-fuels outlook, the EIA said it expects less conservation this year than last year, because of reduced prices.

Some utilities with successful buying strategies are raising rates. Customers of Northwest Natural Gas Co., of Portland, Ore., will pay 3.5% more for gas this winter. What consumers won't necessarily know is that it could have been far worse. Normally, Northwestern locks in prices for 90% of the gas its customers need, but "we really backed off this year," said Randy Friedman, gas-supply manager, because prices quoted early in the year for deliveries this winter "seemed nuts to us."

It held off on purchases and later was able to buy gas more cheaply. By deviating from its normal plan "we cut the amount of our price increase in half," said Mr. Friedman. This year's increase comes on top of a relatively modest 15% increase last year, when a larger hedging program protected customers against price increases late in the year. Its earnings aren't affected by conservation because the company revised its rate structure in 2002 so it can earn its authorized rate of return even if gas usage drops.

Many utilities are reluctant to change their buying programs, afraid they will be second-guessed by regulators. Consolidated Edison Inc. takes a "disciplined approach" to procurement, says Terry Agriss, vice president of energy management. "We didn't do anything substantially different this year than what we do in any year."

ConEd, of New York, expects the average household to pay about 5% less this year than last. That means a total gas expense of nearly $2,000 from November through March, compared with an average cost of $2,090, $1,658, and $1,415 the prior three years.

Judge Rules Against Boy's Circumcision (CHIT)

By Judy Peres

Chicago Tribune, October 25, 2006

In a case that has been closely watched by anti-circumcision groups nationwide, a Cook County judge ruled Tuesday that the medical benefits of the procedure are not clear enough to compel a 9-year-old Northbrook boy to be circumcised against his will.

The boy's mother and her new husband had claimed the operation was necessary to prevent recurrent episodes of redness and discomfort. The boy's father sought a court order barring the circumcision, which he called an "unnecessary amputation."

The mother has sole custody, but their 2003 parenting agreement gave her ex-husband a say in non-emergency medical decisions. The Tribune is not naming the parents in order to protect the boy's privacy.

In a written opinion handed down Tuesday, Circuit Court Judge Jordan Kaplan said, "The evidence was conflicting and inconclusive as to any past infections or irritations that may have been suffered by the child.

"Moreover," he continued, "this court also finds that the medical evidence as provided by the testimony of the expert witnesses ... is inconclusive as to the medical benefits or non-benefits of circumcision as it relates to the 9-year-old child."

Kaplan said the boy, as a minor, cannot make his own medical decisions but had indicated in a written statement that he does not want to be circumcised.

"The injury to the child as a result of an unnecessary circumcision would be irreversible," Kaplan wrote, adding that his order would remain in effect until the boy turns 18 and can decide for himself whether or not he wants to undergo the procedure.

Because there are no U.S. precedents, other courts could look to this ruling in future cases, said George Hill of Doctors Opposing Circumcision.

Geoffrey Miller, a law professor at New York University, called the ruling a "significant victory" for the growing "intactivist" movement, which has argued circumcision is harmful and violates the rights of children, who can't give informed consent.

Miller conceded Tuesday's decision was "limited by the facts of the case," including the agreement that gives the father the right to be consulted on medical care. Nevertheless, he said, "The fact that a non-custodial parent was able to prevent a custodial parent from having this procedure done is a sign that courts are more receptive to arguments against circumcision than they were in past years."

The father, a 50-year-old building manager from Arlington Heights, said he was relieved by the decision and "so happy."

His lawyer, Alan Toback, said, "We always thought it was not in the child's best interest to have a circumcision at age 9 that was not medically necessary, and the judge agreed."

The mother was not in court Tuesday, and her lawyer, Tracy Rizzo, also was not there because of the death of her father, famed Chicago private investigator Ernie Rizzo. The mother was represented instead by Gail O'Connor, who said, "We're disappointed, of course, but we will abide by the injunction."

DOJ_NMG_0086163

Circumcision, in which the foreskin of the penis is surgically removed, usually before a newborn leaves the hospital, was extremely common in the U.S. during the last century. But the percentage of U.S. babies being circumcised has gone from an estimated 90 percent in 1970 to about 55 percent today. In most other countries, circumcision is performed only for religious reasons.

The boy, who never appeared in court, was represented by attorney David Pasulka, who recommended against circumcision at this time.

The eight-month dispute took some nasty turns. Rizzo charged that the father did not care about the boy's health but feared his ex-wife and her new husband were trying to convert the boy to Judaism.

The father's attorneys hinted that the mother's aim was to spite her ex-husband and please her current husband, who is Jewish.

The boy's stepfather and stepbrother are both circumcised, while the biological parents are Catholic immigrants from Eastern European countries where circumcision is rare.

But Kaplan said he did not address "issues of ethnicity or religious beliefs relative to circumcision" because the parents did not raise them in their legal pleadings.

Dan Strandjord, a self-proclaimed "intactivist" who attended every hearing in the case, was elated Tuesday. "I believe this is a human rights issue," said Strandjord.

Hip-Hop Editor Wins Suit Over Her Firing (WP)

By Peter Carlson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

After a tumultuous two-week trial, Kimberly Osorio, a former editor in chief of the Source magazine, won a workplace lawsuit against the popular hip-hop monthly, and a Manhattan jury awarded her $15.5 million.

"This is a victory for women in hip-hop," Osorio told the hip-hop Web site SOHH.com after the verdict Monday night. "I stood up and I won."

Osorio, who was fired by the Source last year, sued the magazine and its founders, David Mays and Raymond Scott, alleging sexual harassment, gender discrimination, defamation, retaliatory discharge and maintaining a hostile work environment. The defendants responded that Osorio was fired in March 2005 for "poor performance," including her decision to publish a cover photo of rapper Nelly without his posse and running a negative review of a CD by rapper Fat Joe.

Osorio, now an editor at BET.com, testified that Scott repeatedly begged her for sex, and that another editor threatened to "knock me upside my [expletive] head."

The jury of six men and two women threw out the discrimination and sexual harassment complaints but found that Osorio was fired in retaliation for complaining to her bosses about discrimination and sexual harassment. In addition, the jury ruled that Scott had defamed Osorio in an interview after her firing.

The defendants quickly announced that they would appeal the verdict.

"This will be knocked out on appeal," Mays said in a telephone interview yesterday. "She won't collect on any of this."

The eight-day trial was enlivened by testimony about life in the Source's offices in New York, which was said to include watching porn videos, graphic threats of violence, and the spreading of rumors that Osorio, Mays and Scott had sexual relations with various rappers.

During the trial in U.S. District Court, Osorio's attorney, Kenneth Thompson, told Judge Jed S. Rakoff that Scott -- who is also a professional rapper known as Benzino -- shouted "Coward! Chump! Uncle Tom!" at him as he walked to the men's room during a recess. Scott denied the charge. The judge gave Scott the choice of staying in the courtroom or being escorted out of the building by a marshal.

"I'll leave," Scott said, and a marshal took him out.

Scott has long been a controversial figure in the rap world. In 2003, he released a Benzino album that included a song attacking rapper Eminem, and the Source promoted it by publishing a cartoon that depicted Benzino holding the bloody severed head of Eminem. "That's all part of hip-hop," Mays explained yesterday. "That's part of the game of being a hip-hop artist."

Both Mays and Scott left the Source in January and recently started a new publication, HipHop Weekly, which published its first issue this week. According to its press release, the magazine includes "exclusive photos of DMX going after the sound man at a recent Long Island concert" and "an exclusive report on Jay Z stating, 'I'm out for dead president Bush' while performing."

Yesterday, Mays praised Scott as "a great man" who was unfairly maligned by Osorio's lawyers during the trial.

"They tried to assassinate his character because he didn't go to Harvard like me," Mays said.

Bush Campaigns On Pocketbook Issues (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0086164

By Jennifer Loven
AP, October 25, 2006

Look around the dinner table and add $500 to your tax bill for each child, President Bush said Tuesday as he sought to convince voters that Democrats would destroy the economy and the family budget if they took over Congress.

"When you go to the voting booth in two weeks, the lever you pull will determine the taxes you pay for years to come," Bush said on a fundraising swing through Florida aimed at adding nearly $1.4 million to GOP coffers. "You will feel the results every April 15."

Each one of the president's recent political speeches has offered new zingers aimed at making more ominous the specter of Democrats in charge of the House or Senate, either on the subject of tax cuts or fighting terrorism. On Tuesday, Bush singled out for special emphasis the gradual doubling of the child tax credit from $500 to $1,000, one of several cuts passed during his administration with expiration dates.

"If you're sitting around a dinner table and there's two children, your taxes just went up $1,000 if they take control," the president said, continuing to do the math for three children, or four.

But he didn't get it quite right. Bush skimmed past the fact that the child tax credit is not yet $1,000 and doesn't reach that level until 2010.

He also ignored that many Democrats now say they want to retain that tax cut. In 2001, when it originally passed by a 282-144 vote, most Democrats voted against it because they said it was part of an overall Bush-backed tax package that provided meager tax relief in the early years, was far more costly than GOP estimates and was tilted toward wealthy taxpayers.

"The question is: Why hasn't the president and his rubber-stamp Republican Congress joined Democrats' efforts to expand the child tax credit?" said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., referring to Democrats' wishes to make low-income families eligible for the credit.

It was the president's second day in a row emphasizing economic good times — fallen gas prices, low unemployment, a record-setting stock market, rising consumer confidence — as the elections approach.

But polls show the public isn't prepared to give Bush's party the credit. When likely voters were asked earlier this month in an AP-Ipsos poll whom they trusted more to handle the economy, 51 percent said Democrats, 38 percent said Republicans.

Bush made his cash-raising visit for GOP congressional candidate Vern Buchanan cheaper for the Republican businessman's campaign by stopping briefly at Gyrocam Camera Systems. The rules governing how a campaign reimburses the government for an appearance by Bush or another official dictate that scheduling an official event alongside the political one reduces the share of the president's travel costs that must be funded by the candidate.

Gyrocam supplies the military with detectors for roadside bombs in Iraq and Afghanistan. In a company hangar, Bush repeated his argument that a Democratic-led Congress would raise taxes, and noted that the military's use of Gyrocam's detection product helps prove his administration's commitment to adapting the Iraq war to changing circumstances.

Buchanan is in a tight race against Democrat Christine Jennings for the south Florida seat being vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris, who is running an uphill race for the Senate, against her party's wishes. Later Tuesday, Bush raised $1 million for the Republican National Committee at a closed event in a Boca Raton mansion in the district of GOP Rep. Clay Shaw, who is running one of the nation's most difficult re-election races.

Bush has campaigned just two to three days a week throughout October, usually with only a couple of stops each day.

The White House had promised the pace of the president's campaigning would pick up significantly after September, with more events, more of them open to media coverage and the advent of rallies instead of only fundraisers. The White House contends Bush's campaign activity this year is as or more aggressive than before the 2002 midterm elections.

But by the same date in October 2002, a more popular Bush had appeared at eight huge candidate rallies and headlined six open fundraisers. This October, he has so far held 11 open fundraisers but has still, with two weeks left until the Nov. 7 voting, not attended a single rally.

"His campaign, in terms of the number of events, it's been very aggressive," said White House deputy press secretary Tony Fratto.

Fratto also said that any 2007 planning at the White House is not taking into account the possibility of having to work with a Congress at least partially controlled by Democrats.

"We're still in the game, and if you're in the game, you're in it to win," he said. "We're ready to work with a Republican Congress."

The president remained positive as well, even making light of the heightened pre-election speculation.

"The Democrats make a lot of predictions. As a matter of fact, I think they may be measuring the drapes," Bush said. "If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions, November 7th is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

In Sarasota, Bush Urges GOP Faithful To Get Out The Vote (HTRIB)

By Jeremy Wallace

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), October 25, 2006

MANATEE COUNTY - During a brief stopover, President George W. Bush exhorted Republicans to show up on election day, saying that a strong GOP turnout is critical to preserving his tax cut package and winning the War in Iraq.

"We're going to do everything we can to protect you before the enemy attacks," Bush told a crowd of about 1,500 supporters at the Sarasota-Bradenton International Convention Center.

Appearing at a $20 a person fundraiser for Republican congressional candidate Vern Buchanan, the president spent a good portion of his speech warning the audience that Democrats, if they gain control of Congress, will discontinue tax cuts and disrupt U.S. efforts in Iraq.

Bush also told voters not to believe Democrats who say they want a tax cut for the middle class.

"You will feel the results every April 15" if Democrats win, Bush said. "Americans should not be fooled by their rhetoric."

After his speech, Bush's motorcade made a stop at Gyrocam Camera Systems, a local company with a $51 million contract to provide the Armed Forces with explosive-detecting cameras that can be mounted on personnel carriers and other military vehicles.

Bush then headed to the airport and boarded Air Force One, which left for Florida's East Coast about 2:45 p.m.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 8:11 pm

Worst seat in the house?

Jeremy Wallace

» Read blog: Political Insider

Could there be a worse seat for a United State Senator to have to sit next to me for an hour?

That's exactly what happened today, when U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez, a Republican, sat down to hear President Bush speak at the Sarasota Bradenton International Convention Center.

His reserved seat was next to where Secret Service agents had positioned the media. No press handlers. No staff. Just me and Martinez for an hour.

After reminiscing about his recent campaign stop for Buchanan at a Sarasota bowling alley, the first term senator and I talked about the war in Iraq.

Martinez said it's so difficult to talk about the war because the media is being so aggressive to determine if Republicans are supporting or opposing the president.

Virginia Republican Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, seemed to open the floodgates to Republican criticism of Iraq policy this month when he warned after a trip to Iraq that the war was "drifting sideways" and a course correction might soon be warranted.

Martinez said he's more than willing to sit down and explore the situation in Iraq in a thoughtful way, but is convinced the media will seize on one two-word statement like with Warner, and pit him against or with the President.

So, Martinez said he'd just as well prefer to wait until after election day.

Martinez has been hitting the campaign trail for Buchanan pretty hard. This is his third visit to Sarasota in the last 60 days. Prior to that, it had been almost two years since his last public visit.

Martinez told fellow reporter Doug Sword last week that he's in part paying back political IOUs. When Martinez ran for the Senate in 2004, Buchanan was chairman of his fundraising committee.

"It's a result of my gratitude for him, for what he did for me, and the fact that I believe he'd be a good congressman," Martinez said.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 6:19 pm

By ASSOCIATED PRESS

Cheney says Hillary Clinton could win presidency

WASHINGTON -- Vice President Dick Cheney said Tuesday he thinks Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton could win the presidency. He said Sen. Barack Obama might be viewed by voters as too inexperienced.

Cheney handicapped the Democratic field of potential candidates in an interview with conservative talk show host Sean Hannity.

"I think Hillary Clinton is a formidable candidate," Cheney said. "I think she could win. I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

DOJ_NMG_0086166

Cheney said Obama, an Illinois Democrat, was an "attractive guy. Don't know him well, met him a few times. I think at this stage, my initial take on him was he's been two years as a senator. I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in. But certainly, he's an attractive candidate. If he decides to run, he'll be a player on the Democratic side."

Obama said Sunday he was considering a run for president in 2008, backing off previous statements that he would not do so.

As for himself, Cheney said he would not budge from his oft-stated decision that he will not run for president. "It's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable," the vice president said. "I don't know how else I can say it. If nominated, I will not run; if elected, I will not serve."

Cheney also said he was optimistic about Republican hopes in the Nov. 7 elections.

"I think we'll hold both the House and the Senate." Last week, Cheney raised eyebrows when he sounded less sure about GOP prospects. "I think we'll hold the Senate and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House," he told Rush Limbaugh.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 6:00 pm

By SNN NEWS 6

(SNN NEWS 6)

Cooler temps to continue

SNN News 6's David Karnes says the mercury will dip a little lower overnight Tuesday.

Comments | Watch the video

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 5:25 pm

By STAFF REPORT

County to pay $15,000 for medical bills for woman hurt in crash with cop

BRADENTON — County commissioners Tuesday agreed to pay $15,000 to cover the medical expenses for a teenager injured when a Manatee County sheriff's patrol car struck her vehicle.

Andrea Malara was 15 years old when the deputy's car, with its lights flashing, ran a red light eastbound on State Road 70 at Tara Boulevard in June 2001.

Malara was a passenger. The driver of the vehicle was not injured. Authorities said the deputy's patrol car flipped several times after the crash.

Malara, county records show, refused to be taken to the hospital by ambulance. Her parents drove her to Manatee Memorial Hospital. Malara said she suffered injuries to her neck, head, shoulders, back and jaw.

The county's agreement to pay $15,000 terminates a lawsuit Malara's attorneys filed against the Sheriff's Office in November 2004. The settlement was reached last month through mediation, court records show.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 5:20 pm

By Staff Report

Bradenton man dies from injuries in Sunday wreck that resulted in a fire

BRADENTON — A 51-year-old Bradenton man was killed in a one-vehicle crash this week after his Jeep slammed into a trailer and caught fire, Florida Highway Patrol troopers said.

The man, John E. Geier, was eastbound on Whitfield Avenue on Sunday about 10:15 p.m. when his vehicle struck a trailer in a construction site, authorities said.

Troopers said Geier died Monday afternoon at Tampa General Hospital from injuries sustained in the crash, which happened near Prospect Road. Geier suffered burns to more than 80 percent of his body.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 5:09 pm

By : David Karnes, Chief Meteorologist SNN News 6

Cool again Wednesday

Weather First

» Read blog: Weather news

Tuesday morning saw a record low of 51 degrees at SRQ. The old record was 52 degrees back in 1982.

Wednesday morning will be another near record morning with lows dropping into the low 50s along the coast and mid to upper 40s inland.

Wednesday afternoon will be a little warmer than Tuesday was. Highs will still be well below normal, however, in the mid to upper 70s.

We will start to warm back into the low 80s by Thursday, but another front will move through and bring us some showers and storms Friday with another shot of beautiful weather for the weekend.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 5:03 pm

By Steve Echeverria Jr.

WSLR Costume Party @ Khrome Cancelled

» Read blog: Entertainment

The Fogartyville Cafe and WSLR (96.5 FM) have cancelled the planned costume party at Club Khrome meant to celebrate the community radio station's Guiness World Record crown for having the "World's Youngest Radio DJ."

The party was planned for Sunday, Oct. 29.

The owner and manager of Khrome were recently arrested on durg possession and money laundering charges.

Instead, WSLR officials will present seven-year-old Joshua Rabow, who hosts "The Saturday Morning Cartoon Show," with an award at the Sarasota Blues Festival between 7-8 p.m.

For more information call (941)741-9755.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 4:26 pm

Kitson picked to build Murdock Village

In a bid to end months of frustation, County Commissioners Tuesday chose Kitson & Partners to develop the 1,100-acre Murdock Village site.

Unless the county hits another negotiation snag, Kitson & Partners -- the developers of Babcock Ranch -- will transform the land into a hopping downtown center, possibly anchored with a satellite campus for Florida Gulf Coast University.

A month ago, the county was in negotioation over the same project with Stock Development.

The developer backed down early this month, blaming a slow real estate market for its unwillingness to pay the $94 million it promised in its bid.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 4:11 pm

By Susan Rife

A full Book Review section

It's not that often that the New York Times Book Review section is packed with reviews of things I either have already glanced at (and set aside on my "get to right away" pile or have already begun to read), but such was the case on Oct. 15. Of nine fiction reviews, I'd actually already read "Abundance" by Sena Jeter Naslund and put aside "Human Traces" by Sebastian Faulks, "Black Girl/White Girl" by Joyce Carol Oates and "The Light of Evening" by Edna O'Brien.

Several books on the nonfiction list also had already piqued my interest, but at the top was Bill Bryson's memoir, "The Life and Times of the Thunderbolt Kid." Sadly, this book has yet to fall into my greedy little outstretched hands, but reading the review remnded me of how much I loved "A Walk in the Woods," Bryson's hysterically funny book about hiking the Appalachian Trail, and got to me to pull "A Short History of Nearly Everything" off my shelf and renew my interest in it, and also to read his 1989 memoir, "The Lost Continent: Travels in Small-Town America" (Harper Perennial).

Like "A Walk in the Woods," this is a deeply personalized travel journal as Bryson sets out from his native Des Moines in search of the perfect small town. He logs more than 13,000 miles onto his mother's Chevette as he crisscrosses the country, horrified by the strip-malling of America and how generally ugly many places are (this is after he had spent 20 years living in England, so there you have it).

As the reviewer in the Times notes, "The Lost Continent" is convulsively funny: "In fact, I remember reading it on the couch and disturbing my wife in her kitchen-table academic studies with my howls," he writes. "When she asked me what was so funny, I would, in reading the passage aloud to her, inevitably be reduced to body-racking, tear-inducing, de-couching laughter."

That was my experience as well, both with "The Lost Continent" and with "A Walk in the Woods," which I read while flying across that very lost continent, trying to stifle my giggles in order to not overly alarm my seatmates. I highly recommend the book, especially to anyone who's experienced the joy and pain of backpacking.

In "The Lost Continent," Bryson loosely recreates the childhood vacations of his family, when Dad would drive and Mom would navigate and Billy and his sister would duke it out in the back seat. Dad of course would stop only at bona fide historical monuments and never at the kind of roadside attractions kids so dearly love. I can relate, since my dad was that same unhappy guy behind the wheel and I was among the kids crowded three across in the back seat of the station wagon cruising through the west and never once stopping at goofy roadside attractions. National parks, you bet. Anything with a side show, not so much.

Here's Bryson on visiting Gatlinburg, Tennessee.

DOJ_NMG_0086168

"I loved it. When I was growing up, we never got to go to places like Gatlinburg. My father would rather have given himself brain surgery with a Black and Decker drill than spend an hour in such a place. He had just two criteria for gauging the worth of a holiday attraction: Was it educational and was it free? Gatlinburg was patently neither of these... So Gatlinburg to me was a heady experience. I felt like a priest let loose in Las Vegas with a sockful of quarters. All the noise and glitter, and above all the possibilities for running through irresponsible sums of money in a short period, made me giddy.

"I wandered through the crowds, and hesitated at the entrance to the Ripley's Believe It or Not Museum. I could sense my father, a thousand miles away, beginning to rotate slowly in his grave as I looked at the posters. They told me that inside I would see a man who could hold three billiard balls in his mouth at once, a two-headed calf, a human unicorn with a horn protruding from his forehead and hundreds of other riveting oddities from all over the globe collected by the tireless Robert Ripley and crated back to Gatlinburg for the edification of discerning tourists such as myself. The admission fee was five dollars. The pace of my father's rotating quickened as I looked into my wallet and then sped to a whirring blur as I fished out a five-dollar bill and guiltily handed it to the unsmiling woman in the ticket booth. 'What the hell,' I thought as I went inside, 'at least it will give the old man some exercise.'"

Bryson goes on to report that the museum was the ultimate guilty pleasure. As is reading any of his works, all of them subject to the highest levels of comic exaggeration. If you need a break from the grim realities of the world, Bryson's books certainly offer it. I can't wait to get his newest, "The Life and Times of the Thunderbolt Kid." In fact, I think I'll head to the bookstore right now. There's no better way to spend an evening than de-couching oneself with laughter.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 3:50 pm

By SNN NEWS 6

(SNN NEWS 6)

Bush, Buchanan speak at rally

Portions of speeches by Congressional Candidate Vern Buchanan and President George W. Bush in Sarasota this afternoon.

Comments | Watch the video

Advertisement

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 3:40 pm

By STAFF REPORT

Dropping fuel costs to be passed on to FPL customers

STAFF REPORT

There is even more good news on the petroleum front: dropping fuel costs have prompted Florida Power & Light to bolster the cut it plans to customer bills starting in January.

FPL forecast a 1.8 percent drop in September; now it is 5 percent.

That would take the average customer's bill from $108.61 per month to $103.51.

The Juno Beach-based power provider said that it expects a similar drop for business customers.

Comments | Permalink

Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 3:21 pm

By Jeremy Wallace

President Bush delivers remarks at a 'Vern Buchanan for Congress' event in Sarasota. (ASSOCIATED PRESS)

In Sarasota, Bush urges GOP faithful to get out the vote

MANATEE COUNTY - During a brief stopover, President George W. Bush exhorted Republicans to show up on election day, saying that a strong GOP turnout is critical to preserving his tax cut package and winning the War in Iraq.

"We're going to do everything we can to protect you before the enemy attacks," Bush told a crowd of about 1,500 supporters at the Sarasota-Bradenton International Convention Center.

Appearing at a $20 a person fundraiser for Republican congressional candidate Vern Buchanan, the president spent a good portion of his speech warning the audience that Democrats, if they gain control of Congress, will discontinue tax cuts and disrupt U.S. efforts in Iraq.

Bush also told voters not to believe Democrats who say they want a tax cut for the middle class.

"You will feel the results every April 15" if Democrats win, Bush said. "Americans should not be fooled by their rhetoric."

After his speech, Bush's motorcade made a stop at Gyrocam Camera Systems, a local company with a $51 million contract to provide the Armed Forces with explosive-detecting cameras that can be mounted on personnel carriers and other military vehicles.

Bush then headed to the airport and boarded Air Force One, which left for Florida's East Coast about 2:45 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0086169

Comments | Permalink
Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 2:00 pm
By STAFF REPORT
President Bush, right, waves as he arrives with Florida congressional candidate Vern Buchanan on Tuesday at Sarasota-Bradenton International Airport. (ASSOCIATED PRESS)
Air Force One on the ground at SRQ
President George W. Bush has arrived in Sarasota. He disembarked from Air Force One at Sarasota-Bradenton International Airport a few minutes before 1 p.m.
Bush was joined on the tarmac by Pinellas County resident Tom Cooney. Bush presented Cooney with a Volunteer Service medal for Cooney's 20 years of teaching sign language.
Bush's motorcade then proceeded to the nearby Sarasota-Bradenton International Convention Center, where the President will appear at a fundraiser for Republican Congressional Candidate Vern Buchanan.
Come back to HeraldTribune.com for continuing coverage of the president's visit to Sarasota.
Comments | Permalink
Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 2:00 pm
By SNN NEWS 6
(SNN NEWS 6)
President Bush arrives at SRQ
Herald-Tribune reporter Todd Ruger reports from the tarmac as the President arrives in Sarasota aboard Air Force One.
Comments | Watch the video
Tuesday, October 24, 2006, 7:11 am
By STAFF REPORT
Daybook: What's ahead in the news today
There's nothing like a presidential visit to get a newsroom whipped into a frenzy. Air Force One will be landing at Sarasota-Bradenton International Airport today, and we will of course have reporters from the Herald-Tribune and SNN News 6 on the scene. SNN News 6 will bring you live coverage from the airport a little before 1 p.m., and we will also be reporting from the Vern Buchanan fundraiser President Bush is coming to Sarasota to attend. We'll have lots of picture and video here at HeraldTribune.com later in the day.
Tuberculosis testing begins at Nolan Middle School today, for the 200-plus people exposed to a case of TB there. Results are expected to be available later this week.
CFO candidates Alex Sink and Tom Lee and attorney general candidates Skip Campbell and Bill McCollum will debate later this morning in Key Biscayne.
And at 8 p.m. tonight, candidates for governor Charlie Crist, Jim Davis and Max Linn will debate at Nova Southeastern University in Davie. The debate will air live on public television stations around the state.

President Brings His Clout To Boost Florida Hopefuls (MH)

By Jennifer Mooney Piedra And Lesley Clark
The Miami Herald, October 25, 2006
SARASOTA - This one should have been a cakewalk. Republicans have held the U.S. House seat here since before Rep. Katherine Harris, the former Florida secretary of state, parlayed her celebrity into winning the job.
But polls suggest Democrats are poised to seize control of the House -- in part by possibly picking up this seat and two others in South Florida. President Bush swooped into the cavernous convention center in Sarasota on Tuesday to raise money for the Republican candidate and to label Democrats as "genetically disposed" to increase taxes and weak on fighting terrorism.
Bush's visit to Florida -- in which he touted his record on the economy -- comes just two weeks before a critical midterm election in which Democrats need 15 seats to retake the House.
"The stakes in this election are high," Bush told a crowd of 2,000 at a reception for Republican Vern Buchanan, locked in an unexpectedly tight race to replace Harris, who is vying for Democrat Bill Nelson's U.S. Senate seat. Polls put Harris at least 20 points behind Nelson.
Democrats, Bush noted to laughter, ``have made a lot of predictions. Matter of fact, I think they may be measuring the drapes."
Buchanan promised that with Bush's help, "we will maintain a Republican majority in the House," and a defiant Bush predicted victory.
`A GOOD DAY'

"If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions," Bush said of the Democrats, ``Nov. 7 is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

Strategists, though, suggest Democratic prospects have been aided by bleak reports out of Iraq, mixed with distaste for corruption scandals -- topped by U.S. Rep. Mark Foley's resignation last month after graphic Internet exchanges with former House pages were made public.

Foley's Palm Beach-area district -- in which Republican Joe Negron will face Democrat Tim Mahoney -- is among three Florida seats Democrats hope will help their cause. Democrats also are gunning for the the seat long held by Fort Lauderdale Republican Rep. Clay Shaw. Independent polls show the race in a dead heat, as does polling done by Shaw and his Democratic opponent, state Sen. Ron Klein.

Some Democrats suggest it would be particularly satisfying to secure the Republican-leaning Sarasota seat vacated by Harris, who likely would have won a third term.

Buchanan has had trouble gaining traction since he limped out of a bitter primary with 32 percent of the vote amid attacks on his business practices. The millionaire auto dealer and major GOP donor has pumped nearly $4.5 million of his own cash into the campaign, making it one of the nation's costliest.

Internal polls are said to show him trailing Democrat Christine Jennings.

Bush called Buchanan a ``decent, honorable man who deserves to be elected to the United States Congress."

BIG NAMES

Republicans are clearly focused on the race: Vice President Dick Cheney attended a recent fundraiser; Gov. Jeb Bush, U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney campaigned for Buchanan last week; and first lady Laura Bush will speak at a Buchanan fundraiser on Friday.

As for Jennings, Bill Clinton will headline a fundraiser for her campaign next Tuesday in New York, and Sen. Hillary Clinton is to speak at a fundraiser today, also in New York.

"We've got the wave, but it's also candidate recruitment," said Democratic donor Kirk Wagar, a Coconut Grove lawyer who has maintained for a year that the three Democratic candidates would be competitive.

Though the president's popularity ratings are low and Democrats have proven eager to nationalize the Sarasota race and make Bush the issue, Sally Tibbetts, a spokeswoman for Buchanan, said the campaign welcomed the president's support.

"They offered to do whatever they could to help, and we're honored to have the president," she said.

Shaw has worked to position himself as a moderate, in part by distancing himself from Bush. His campaign called a reporter Tuesday to underscore that a Republican National Committee fundraiser in Boca Raton that Bush attended Tuesday had "nothing to do" with Shaw's campaign.

Laura Bush, though, will headline a Shaw fundraiser on Friday.

The Republican faithful in Sarasota waved American flags and cheered Bush on as he spoke. Among the fans: 70-year-old Bob Spencer.

RED, WHITE & BLUE

Spencer, decked out head-to-toe in red white and blue, said he's optimistic the GOP will prevail and that the president's visit helps the cause.

"The president might take this race right over the edge," said Spencer, of Bradenton. ``President Bush is loved by the conservatives as much as Ronald Reagan was -- if not more."

Miami Herald staff writers Erika Bolstad and Beth Reinhard contributed to this report.

President Says Democrats Are 'Disposed' To Increase Taxes (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla., Oct. 24 -- President Bush accused Democrats on Tuesday of being "genetically disposed" to raise taxes, as he sharpened his rhetoric on the economy in an effort to rally Republicans to the polls next month.

Appearing here on behalf of GOP congressional hopeful Vern Buchanan, Bush mocked Democrats for what he described as their misplaced pessimism that tax cuts would not stimulate the economy. He said it was only one of many poor predictions by the Democrats and suggested they are making another mistake in their growing confidence that they might take the House next month.

"I think they may be measuring the drapes," Bush said to titters within the crowd of GOP partisans. "If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions, November 7th is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

"George Bush sure has a lot to say for a guy who added $3 trillion to the nation's debt," responded Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0086171

While the president was in Florida, Vice President Cheney tried to rally the party faithful Tuesday on Sean Hannity's radio talk show. He warned of "some jeopardy, depending on how the election comes out, as to whether or not we'll be able to continue" the administration's national security policies.

Cheney also offered some political commentary, describing Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) as a potentially "formidable" candidate in the 2008 presidential sweepstakes. "I think she could win," Cheney said. "I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

And he described Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) as an "attractive guy" who will be "a player on the Democratic side" if he decides to run for president. But with only two years as a senator, he said, "I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in."

Bush Battles For GOP Dominance (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Using mocking language to belittle Democrats, President Bush launched a muscular political attack Tuesday in his campaign to preserve Republican majorities in the House and Senate, challenging the Democrats' economic record and their commitment to fighting terrorism.

Two weeks before an election that threatens to bring upheaval to Capitol Hill, the White House is yielding not a bit to the possibility that come January, Bush might have to deal for the first time with a Democratic majority.

"The Democrats make a lot of predictions. As a matter of fact, I think they may be measuring the drapes," he said.

"If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions," Bush said, recalling Democrats' grim projections after Congress enacted his tax cuts, "Nov. 7 is going to be a good day for the Republicans."

The president, who has made the Iraq war a central element in his stump speech as he seeks to convince voters that a Democratic-led Congress would weaken the effort, has also been trying to gain political traction from such upbeat economic news as falling energy prices and a rising stock market.

On Tuesday, he turned to taxes, seeking to raise the prospect that they would go up if Democrats took charge.

"When you go to the voting booth in two weeks, the lever you pull will determine the taxes you pay for years to come," Bush said. "Americans will cast their ballots on Nov. 7, but you will feel the results every April 15."

He cited, as he has in the past, a statement by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the likely speaker if her party wins a majority, expressing Democrats' "love" of tax cuts.

Citing Democratic opposition to tax cuts he had proposed, the president said: "If this is the Democrats' idea of love, I wouldn't want to see what hate looks like."

Democrats have argued that the tax cuts were responsible for the soaring budget deficit, which is now dropping, and have said that they oppose wholesale extension of some of the cuts as they expire in coming years and want to balance them more toward middle-class taxpayers.

"Democrats who have made fiscal responsibility a high ethical standard and middle-class tax cuts a priority must be a frightening prospect for President Bush and his rubber-stamp Congress' failed economic policies and ballooning budget deficits," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said.

The president spoke at a rally here that Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt said raised $375,000 for Vern Buchanan, a Republican House candidate in a tight race in a Republican-leaning district. Later, Bush spoke at a private party in Boca Raton that Schmitt said raised $1 million for the RNC.

The event here was Bush's first in Sarasota since Sept. 11, 2001. He was in a classroom with elementary school students when he was told a second plane had struck the World Trade Center.

Seeking to use Democrats' opposition to elements of the Patriot Act, which beefed up law enforcement intelligence operations after Sept. 11, and to legislation creating military tribunals to try alleged terrorists, Bush said: "The vast majority of Democrats opposed the right of this administration to have a tool necessary to protect you…. They must not think we're at war. They must think that the best way to protect you is to respond after the attack.

"The vast majority of Democrats voted against giving our professionals the right to interrogate to protect America. These are patriotic souls, but their vision of the world is wrong, and we want to make sure that we continue to control the House of Representatives to provide the protection necessary."

Critics of the measures questioned whether they abrogated defendants' rights and opened the door to unnecessary spying on Americans.

Minutes from the Sarasota airport, Bush made an unannounced stop at Gyrocam Systems, a company that makes cameras used to help soldiers spot roadside bombs in Iraq. The visit illustrated two of the president's themes: the role of small business in boosting the economy, and — as he moves away from the phrase "stay the course" to describe his policy in the war — the shifts taking place to counter insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0086172

"Our goal in Iraq has not changed…." he said to reporters. "Our tactics are adjusting."

President's Boca Visit Pulls In $1 Million (PALMBEACHP)

By George Bennett And Michael Laforgia

Palm Beach Post, October 25, 2006

BOCA RATON — President Bush raised more than $1 million for the Republican National Committee during a brief stop here as the costly battle over which party controls Congress entered its final two weeks.

After campaigning in Sarasota with Republican congressional candidate Vern Buchanan earlier in the day, Bush attended a late-afternoon fund-raiser at the home of advertising executive Jordan Zimmerman in The Sanctuary neighborhood between Federal Highway and the Intracoastal Waterway.

The $25,000-a-head event raised more than $1 million for the party, a GOP spokeswoman said. Gov. Jeb Bush and U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez also attended.

Zimmerman is the 50-year-old founder and chairman of Fort Lauderdale-based Zimmerman Advertising, which lists the Miami Dolphins, Lennar Homes and Office Depot among its clients.

Zimmerman is a registered Republican who contributed to Democratic Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman's presidential and Senate campaigns and to Democrat Peter Deutsch's 2004 Senate bid in Florida, according to data compiled by the nonprofit Center for Responsive Politics.

Zimmerman also gave $500 apiece to Republican governor candidates Charlie Crist and Tom Gallagher before the September primary.

The president arrived at Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood International Airport around 3:30 p.m. and traveled by 20-vehicle motorcade to the fund-raiser. Bush returned to Fort Lauderdale and departed on Air Force One just before 6:30 p.m.

When Bush arrived in Fort Lauderdale, he presented a volunteer service award to Parkland resident David Greenberger, a mentor with Big Brothers Big Sisters. Bush spent about five minutes greeting supporters, including consultant and Republican money-raiser Tom DeRita of Palm Beach Gardens.

"I just told him to keep going the direction he's going. We love him and he's doing a great job," DeRita said.

"It's always important when the president comes down," he said. "He's going to boost the morale. He's going to get us on target, and the rest is up to us to get the voters out and make sure we win."

In Boca Raton, several onlookers and a handful of antiwar protesters gathered across the street from the entrance to The Sanctuary to watch the president's arrival.

Bush, who helped Republican U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw raise more than $800,000 at a May event in Fort Lauderdale, did not appear with or raise money for any candidates in South Florida on Tuesday.

Shaw's Democratic challenger, Boca Raton state Sen. Ron Klein, has accused Shaw of being too closely allied with Bush.

Shaw spokeswoman Gail Gitcho said there was no significance to the fact that Bush and Shaw didn't appear together Tuesday and noted that first lady Laura Bush is coming to Palm Beach to raise money for Shaw on Friday.

Bush Stops By Boca Raton, Raises A Cool Million For GOP (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 25, 2006

President Bush passed through Fort Lauderdale on Tuesday to raise last-minute cash in Boca Raton for Republican candidates fighting to hold onto the party's majority in Congress.

On his 44th trip to Florida since becoming president, Bush did not stop to shake hands or tout his administration's policies.

Instead, supporters who gathered at Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood International Airport to see Air Force One touch down received just a quick glimpse of the president before his motorcade sped off to a Boca Raton fundraiser.

The private event held at the mansion of advertising executive Jordan Zimmerman raised $1 million for the Republican National Committee.

The money likely will fuel advertising and get-out-the-vote efforts to motivate the Republican base in districts with close congressional races. That could help counter voter dissatisfaction with the party because of perceived congressional inaction, scandals and the war in Iraq.

On Friday, first lady Laura Bush is expected to attend a Palm Beach fundraiser for U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw, who is in a tight race against Democratic state senator Ron Klein for Florida's 22nd Congressional District.

DOJ_NMG_0086173

Shaw, who has held the seat for 26 years, was notably absent from the small cadre of Republicans who greeted the president on the tarmac.

Palm Beach Gardens Republican Tom DeRita, chairman of Shaw's fundraising efforts, said the candidate had a scheduling conflict.

U.S. Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, D-Weston, said she thought Shaw was keeping his distance for political reasons.

A key part of Klein's campaign strategy has been linking the veteran Republican legislator to Bush as the president's approval ratings dip in the polls, largely over his handling of the war.

"There's nowhere in the country where the president is more unpopular than South Florida," Wasserman Schultz said. "All he is at this point is a cash cow for them."

Democrats need to win 15 seats to gain control of the House, and Florida has three of the nation's most fiercely fought congressional races.

Larry Sabato, a political science professor at the University of Virginia, said the White House recognizes that candidates in politically divided districts like Shaw's may need to distance themselves from Bush to win.

"President Bush is not in high demand this election season, unlike 2002 and 2004," Sabato said.

Still, for Bush supporter Barbara Wing of Coral Springs, who turned out for the president's arrival, just seeing his plane land was "awesomely exciting."

"I don't care if you're a Democrat or a Republican, he's still the president," she said.

After stepping off Air Force One, Bush presented an award to David Greenberger, 42, of Plantation, for his volunteer work with Big Brothers Big Sisters of Broward County.

The president's 3:30 p.m. landing in Fort Lauderdale and 6:15 p.m. departure went smoothly. However, his visit disrupted evening rush hour traffic on Interstates 95 and 595 near the airport.

Earlier in the day, Bush campaigned in Sarasota, a traditional Republican stronghold, for GOP congressional candidate Vern Buchanan. He is in a fierce race for the seat of U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, who is running for the Senate.

In addition to the Shaw and Harris seats, Republicans are fighting to elect state Rep. Joe Negron to Mark Foley's House district. The disgraced Republican resigned and dropped out of the race after revelations that he sent inappropriate e-mails and text messages to boys who had served as congressional pages.

Bush's remarks in Sarasota focused on the economy and his administration's doubling of the child tax credit.

"When you go to the voting booth in two weeks, the lever you pull will determine the taxes you pay for years to come," Bush said.

It was the president's second consecutive day emphasizing a positive view of the nation's economy. Republicans cite falling gas prices, low unemployment, a record-setting stock market and rising consumer confidence as signs of growth.

Social Security Enters Elections (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

More than a year after Social Security reform faded from the political radar screen, the debate erupted anew yesterday, as Democrats seized on news that President Bush hopes to revive an unpopular proposal to make changes in the national retirement program.

In recent days, Bush has said Social Security remains one of the "big items" he wants to tackle next year and he continues to "believe that a worker, at his or her option, ought to be allowed to put some of their own money . . . in a private savings account, an account that they call their own."

The statement appeared to represent no substantive change for the White House, and it varied little from the president's previous remarks.

But with just two weeks to go until the Nov. 7 congressional elections, Democrats highlighted Bush's comments, seeing an opportunity to remind voters about a Republican proposal that polls have shown is highly unpopular with many voters.

"Just when you thought your Social Security was safe from privatization, George Bush is bringing back his plan to privatize Social Security and cut guaranteed benefits," declared a news release from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, the party's fundraising arm for Senate races.

Democratic strategists were gleeful about the chance to draw a sharp distinction between the parties on Social Security, an explosive issue among elderly voters. "I couldn't believe it. What an opening," Democratic pollster Celinda Lake said. "I think he had an out-of-body experience."

Some Republicans were equally perplexed by Bush's timing.

DOJ_NMG_0086174

"I guess you could argue if it gets Iraq off the front page, it was probably a good thing at this point," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), a top Republican strategist who opposed the president's Social Security plan. But a new White House push on the issue "is not going anywhere. This president never likes to back down. I think he's putting it on the table, but I don't think anybody's going to pick it up."

The administration is trying to mount a new, bipartisan effort to rein in the costs of Social Security, along with Medicare and Medicaid.

Though Bush's plan stalled in Congress last year, the new Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., has said he took the job in part to tackle the rising cost of government health-care and Social Security spending, which he has called "the biggest economic issue facing our country." And Bush regularly mentions his desire to take another stab at the issue.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto yesterday said that the president "is interested in addressing the long-term challenges our country faces, and he's not going to be shy about doing that."

Fratto was traveling with Bush in Florida, where last year's aborted attempt at Social Security reform has been an issue in competitive House races. In South Florida, where Bush attended a Republican National Committee fundraiser, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) has touted his opposition to Bush's push for private accounts in a television ad.

"I represent the state of Florida, not a political party," Shaw says in the ad. The 13-term incumbent is locked in a tight race with Democratic state senator Ron Klein.

Republicans elsewhere have also scrambled to distance themselves from the president on the issue. In Ohio, Rep. Deborah Pryce and Sen. Mike DeWine have struggled, under attack, to explain their positions on the president's plan.

DeWine said he opposes using tax dollars for private accounts, according to a candidate survey by AARP, the group formerly known as the American Association of Retired Persons.

And Pryce said in a debate last month that while she still agrees with the concept, she has heeded voter demands to drop the issue, according to news reports. Her campaign has called her strong backing of the Bush plan "ancient history."

AARP yesterday released candidate surveys from 35 competitive House races and 10 competitive Senate races in which Republican candidates overwhelmingly refused to take a definitive stand on private accounts -- or opposed them outright.

One of the few exceptions was Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), chairman of a Senate subcommittee on Social Security and an outspoken advocate of the president's plan. He is trailing Democrat Robert P. Casey Jr. in recent polls.

Santorum told AARP that he continues to support private accounts, so long as they are voluntary. On the campaign trail, he has lashed out at Casey -- and Democrats in general -- for failing to offer their own ideas for tackling the Social Security problem.

"He won't give you an -- he won't give you an answer on Social Security. He won't give you an answer on anything to make any changes," Santorum said in a television debate last month. "My question to Mr. Casey is: If you're not for personal retirement accounts, which he says he's not, how much are you going to raise their taxes? Or how much are you going to cut benefits to fix the Social Security problem?"

Bush Finding Welcome Mats As G.O.P. Looks For An Edge (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla. Oct. 24—President Bush cannot show up just anywhere in the waning days of this midterm campaign. But there is a certain class of Republicans who are somewhere between eager and willing to have him at their sides.

There are those facing ethical questions or struggling to recover from gaffes. There are those desperate for the cash Mr. Bush can bring in just by showing up for lunch. There are those who need the president to turn out a demoralized base. And there are those who, like Vern Buchanan, the Republican candidate for the House here, are a little bit of all three.

In another year, with another candidate, a Republican would be a shoo-in in Sarasota. But Mr. Buchanan, a wealthy car dealer dogged by accusations of business improprieties, is lagging behind his Democratic opponent, even though the district — currently represented by Representative Katherine Harris, who is running for Senate — tilts Republican and the candidate has poured more than $4 million of his own money into his campaign.

So Mr. Buchanan did what a handful of other Republicans in trouble are doing. He called in Mr. Bush, who zipped through here Tuesday to raise a little money and, more importantly, fire up Republican voters.

“The Democrats have made a lot of predictions.” Mr. Bush told cheering supporters who had gathered in a cavernous warehouse-turned-convention-hall, where tickets to hear him could be had as cheaply as $20. “Matter of fact, I think they may be measuring the drapes. If their electoral predictions are as reliable as their economic predictions, Nov. 7 is going to be a good day for the Republicans.”

DOJ_NMG_0086175

The appearance, which Republican officials said raised $375,000, offers a hint of how White House strategists will use Mr. Bush in the final two weeks of the midterm campaign. With his public approval ratings hovering around 37 percent, Democrats making effective use of advertisements attacking the president and Republicans in many races distancing themselves from him, Mr. Bush is far more limited than he was four years ago in where he can appear.

One Republican strategist close to the White House, granted anonymity to speak candidly about campaign strategy, said some Republicans — among them Senate candidates in tight races in Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Tennessee — simply do not want their final campaign images to include Mr. Bush, and have spurned White House offers for help.

Instead, White House strategists are sending Mr. Bush to Republican-leaning districts like Sarasota, where he can help energize the base and increase voter turnout. The president will also appear in swing districts where the Republican candidate has calculated that the last-minute infusion of cash he can bring in is worth more than any bad publicity surrounding the visit.

"You probably won't see him too much in the Northeast or the areas where he has less popularity," said Charlie Black, a Republican strategist who consults regularly with Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's chief political adviser. "But we do have a number of races that are very close, where the president, as champion fund-raiser, can still get some extra money in there and allow us to outspend the opponent."

Then there are those whose campaigns took unfortunate turns. Over the past several weeks, Mr. Bush has come to the aid of Representative Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania, who admitted having an extramarital affair; Senator George Allen of Virginia, whose campaign has been plagued by accusations of racial and ethnic insensitivity; and Representatives Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle of California, both of whom have been touched by corruption scandals in Washington.

Mr. Bush is also still raising money for his party at private events. After his Sarasota appearance on Tuesday, he flew across the state to Boca Raton, where he scooped up $1 million at a private dinner for the Republican National Committee. The committee has been using money raised by Mr. Bush to help candidates around the country, especially in its effort to retain control of the Senate.

On Thursday, Mr. Bush is to campaign in Iowa with a House candidate, Jeff Lamberti, and in Michigan, with Mike Bouchard, who is trying to unseat Senator Debbie Stabenow. On Saturday, he will travel to Indiana to campaign with Representative Mike Sodrel. On Monday, he will attend Republican rallies in Georgia and Texas.

Presidents do not often make return trips during campaigns — ordinarily, it is a big deal to get the commander in chief to come just once — but Mr. Bush has already campaigned for both Mr. Sodrel and Mr. Bouchard. Mr. Sodrel won in 2004 thanks in part to a heavy turnout in his district for Mr. Bush. Republicans say Mr. Bouchard could pull ahead if he had more money.

How much the president can help these candidates is an open question — even among the candidates themselves. In a carefully worded statement, a spokesman for Mr. Bouchard, David All, refrained even from mentioning the president by name when asked why Mr. Bush was coming back.

"Any time we can bring decision makers to Michigan and have the opportunity to talk with them about Michigan's future, regardless of whether they are Republican or Democrat, we're going to take it," Mr. All said.

Here in Sarasota, Mr. Buchanan is running against Christine Jennings, a banker who is positioning herself as someone who will manage taxpayers' money wisely. Analysts of both parties say that message is going over well in this seaside community, where economic conservatives have been critical of deficit spending by the Republican-controlled Congress.

With Democrats trying to make the election a referendum on Mr. Bush, the president is trying to turn the tables and make it a referendum on Democrats. He used his remarks on Tuesday to hit the opposition party hard, calling Democrats "genetically predisposed" to raising taxes and accusing them of thinking that "the best way to protect you is to respond after the attack."

The unstated message, analysts say, is, Vote Republican — no matter who the candidate.

Bush Welcome To Raise Cash, But No Pictures And No Press (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla. -- President Bush has become the Stealth Campaigner.

Candidates across the country, especially those in tight races where the president's power to draw cash is most valuable, want him to drop by for a fundraiser. They just don't want their picture taken with the head of the party -- mainly because they know it will end up in their opponents' television commercials.

So far this year, Mr. Bush has done 10 times as many closed-press fundraising events compared to 2002. He has also not appeared at a single major Republican rally, unlike four years ago, when he did 32.

"What a difference a few years makes," said Democratic National Committee spokesman Stacie Paxton. "Republicans are happy to take his cash, but when it comes to photo-ops and campaign stops, President Bush is persona non grata. ... Clearly, President Bush is toxic to many of the candidates across the country."

DOJ_NMG_0086176

So far this campaign cycle, the president has followed a different path than he did in the last midterm congressional elections in 2002. While he has done about the same number of fundraising events -- 71 in 2002 and 67 so far this cycle -- just three events four years ago were deemed "closed press" by the White House, meaning that no reporters were allowed inside.

This year, the president has barred the press from 33 events, including a Republican National Committee dinner last night in Boca Raton, Fla.

While the White House plays down the marked rise in closed events, candidates are wary of being photographed with the president, whose approval rating has plummeted to record lows.

Democrats in 78 House races nationwide are using images of Mr. Bush and seeking to tie the unpopular president to the local Republican candidate, according to ABC News. In five of the seven Senate races on which the Democrats are making their strongest efforts -- Virginia, Tennessee, Ohio, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania -- Mr. Bush plays a leading role in campaign commercials.

With some projections having Republicans losing as many as 40 House seats this election, one prominent Republican strategist said yesterday that the White House is also wary of weighing in.

"Who wants to have their fingerprints on this mess," the strategist said on the condition of anonymity.

Mr. Bush has kept a very lean schedule of late. The president will attend just two open events this week, two weeks before the election. First lady Laura Bush has had a far more rigorous schedule, as has Vice President Dick Cheney.

By the numbers, from August to mid-October in 2002, Mr. Bush spoke at 29 events with candidates. This year's equivalent number is 15, according to Congress Daily. More incredible, Mr. Bush has yet to show up at a major political rally, although he plans to attend several starting this weekend. By contrast, on Oct. 24, 2002, he did two rallies in the same day -- one in Columbia, S.C., and one in Charlotte, N.C. -- his 11th and 12th rallies of the campaign season.

All told, in 2002 he would do some 32 voter rallies at airports and sports arenas, including three or four a day in the five days before the election.

The closest he has come to a mass rally this year was when thousands of people met him at Salt Lake City International Airport in August for a bipartisan rally to support the troops. It was not a political event, though, but one meant to counter an anti-war protest of Mr. Bush's visit to Utah to speak to the American Legion.

The president stopped yesterday in Sarasota for Vern Buchanan, the Republican who is running for the U.S. House seat currently held by Senate candidate Katherine Harris. Mr. Bush won the district in 2004 by 10 percentage points, but Mr. Buchanan is trailing by three in the latest polls. He decided to have Mr. Bush come down to help his cause -- despite the drawbacks.

"It helps to solidify the base," he said, noting that the district has twice as many Republicans as Democrats. "We have to take the positive with the negative."

The White House notes that new fundraising laws have altered the landscape. In 2002, political rallies could be paid for with a mix of federal and state party cash known as "soft money," but this year, if a congressional candidate is involved in the rally, only "hard" money can be used.

Although many candidates this year prefer to keep a presidential visit under wraps, calls are still flooding into the White House requesting a drop-by by the fundraiser-in-chief. In 2002, Mr. Bush helped pull in $144 million, and so far this cycle, he's collected $124 million for candidates and the RNC.

For example, last night's Boca Raton fundraiser, at a massive stucco mansion in a gated community called the Sanctuary, collected more than $1 million for the RNC.

But most candidates have to make their last press buys Friday, so new money will likely not make it into this year's campaigns.

Top Republicans say the reason for the sparse schedule with just two weeks to go is simple: The party raised plenty of cash early, and is poised for a press blitz in the final days.

"The AP ran a story saying these Democrat congressional candidates outraised their Republican incumbents in the third quarter," senior Bush political adviser Karl Rove told The Washington Times last week. "What they didn't say is part of the reason they did is because we raised the money earlier so people would be able to deploy.

"If you look at the 31 top races ... we've got $31 million cash on hand, they have $15 [million]. That's odds I like. And it doesn't count what you see or what you don't yet see at the national committees," Mr. Rove said. "So you know: having incumbents, the structure, a plan, our financial advantage, all these things are going to come to play in the campaign."

Bush Should Focus On Korea (HILL)

The Hill, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086177

President George Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have succeeded beyond expectations in lining up China as a strong ally in forcing North Korea to abandon its nuclear ambitions. The New York Times reports that the Chinese are even threatening to ratchet back on their oil shipments to North Korea, which is totally dependent on Beijing for fuel.

But Bush is getting no credit for it and neither are the Republicans. All of the focus has been on the role that Rice and UN Ambassador John Bolton are playing in forcing North Korea back from membership of the nuclear club. President Bush needs to do much more to rivet popular attention on Korea, as opposed to Iraq.

No matter how Bush says that he is going to revise our Iraqi strategy, the war in and around Baghdad will always be a political loser for the Republican Party. But the president always has the power to change the subject. He must use that power to focus attention on a front that promises success as opposed to one that seems to offer only the prospect of more casualties.

There is increasing evidence that the Republican base is returning to the fold, just as Karl Rove, the president's close adviser and electoral strategist, predicted that they would. The state-by-state polls reflect GOP gains in Tennessee, New Jersey, Montana, Missouri, Virginia and in the national generic ballot tests. Since the Democrats must win two of the Senate seats in Tennessee, New Jersey, and Missouri and they are trailing in all three, there is a new possibility that the Republicans could pull out a midterm win. In John Zogby's generic ballot polling, the Democratic margin has collapsed from +9 two weeks ago to only +3 today. (Since America is not a democracy but chooses its House of Representatives in gerrymandered districts, a three-point Democratic win would not give the party control of the House, just as the popular vote win in 2000 failed to guarantee it the White House).

But, as Rove and Co. realize, almost every election features an endgame Democratic uptick as downscale voters, who normally pay no attention to politics, begin to focus on the election. Like non-baseball fans who only pay attention to the national pastime during the World Series, these downscale voters only enter the process in the end. Since downscale voters tend to vote Democrat, this usually gives the party an edge as the election approaches. It was this last-minute move that erased a Bush surge in 1992 and closed the Bush lead over Gore in 2000.

To guard against this Democratic close, Bush needs to distract the country from Iraq, and North Korea offers the best way to do so. Americans are justifiably scared by the prospect of a nuclear North Korea and Bush's efforts to assemble a global coalition to press Pyongyang have shown that Rice has learned how to play the game and win. But the president needs to bring the issue to public attention and use it to save himself from two years of subpoenas and hearings by making the next two weeks about Korea.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including "Rewriting History," a rebuttal to "Living History" by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Bush Advisers Blitz Radio Airwaves (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Associated Press, October 25, 2006

President Bush's political top gun Karl Rove gushes with optimism about Election Day. National security adviser Stephen Hadley says the Iraqis need to do more to secure their nation — and do it faster. Presidential confidant Dan Bartlett takes a few verbal punches at Democrats.

It was "Radio Day" at the White House where more than 30 talk show hosts were invited to set up shop in a heated white tent on the North Lawn to quiz senior administration officials. Beginning at 5:30 a.m., the broadcasters chatted live about everything from Iraq to homeland security to the Nov. 7 elections.

Rove predicted the Republicans would retain control of Congress, discounting polls that show the Democrats threatening to take over.

"You heard it here first," Rove declared in his interview with Fox News Radio.

Nearby, Charlie Sykes with WTMJ in Milwaukee, Wis., told White House counselor Bartlett, "I think we're about a minute out."

Bartlett, sitting with earphones hugging his head, also predicted a Republican victory. He said that while the Democrats attack the president, they don't articulate a different direction for America.

"They have yet to make the case about what they are for, and that's why I think they're going to come up short in this election," he said.

Talk about Iraq was buzzing in the tent.

"We are going to adapt," Bartlett said. "We are going to have a dynamic approach to the situation on the ground, but we're not going to throw up our hands and say, 'It's unwinnable.'"

Hadley said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the fledging government are starting to take steps to quell rising sectarian violence to help move Iraq toward prosperity and peace, but he added that they must do so more quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0086178

"We're not making the progress we would like, and that's why we have to look at what we are doing and see what we need to change to get the kind of progress that we need," Hadley told Robert Siegel from National Public Radio.

"I think they've got to do more and they've got to do it faster, and I think if you talked to Prime Minister al-Maliki he would say, to you, the same thing."

Other officials who stopped by the tent or were interviewed at other spots at the White House included Vice President Dick Cheney, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and White House press secretary Tony Snow.

Radio Hosts Get Closer To The White House -- If Only Physically (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

It sounded like the kind of friendly interview that administration officials expected when they invited 42 mostly conservative radio hosts to broadcast yesterday from beneath a long, heated white tent on the president's doorstep.

"The American people, in my humble opinion, don't realize we're at war," Neal Boortz, an acerbic libertarian based in Atlanta, told presidential counselor Dan Bartlett. "How do you communicate to the American people that there is a grave threat that must be addressed?"

Moments after Bartlett moved down the rows of folding tables to the next interview, however, Boortz said during a break: "I've adopted the opinion that maybe I'd like to see the Republicans take it in the teeth in this election, lose the House and lick their wounds. They just haven't done enough to be rewarded with continued control in Washington."

For 15 years, the conservatives who dominate talk radio have served as shock troops for the GOP, bashing Democrats, hitting the hot buttons and rallying their listeners. Since the Republicans won back Congress in 1994, a feat in which Rush Limbaugh played a catalyzing role, through the disputed election of 2000 and President Bush's first term, the radio talkers have wielded a powerful megaphone for their ideological side.

But as Bartlett, Karl Rove, Tony Snow, Michael Chertoff and other top administration officials worked the tent during yesterday's day-long event, it became apparent that there are serious cracks in this once-solid wall of support.

"The corps of Bush supporters are just seething, angry and disappointed," said Jan Mickelson, a fixture in Des Moines radio. Iraq, he said, has become "ungovernable," voters are upset about "perceived corruption in the Republican Party," and "social conservatives feel like they've been used again." But in a point echoed by several of the hosts, Mickelson said that "immigration is the number one issue" fostering disgruntlement with the Republicans, because his listeners are "seeing the effects of lack of border control every single day."

Asked whether he wants the Democrats to win the midterm elections, Mickelson said: "I don't really give a rip. The conservatives would say, 'What's the worst that can happen? We're not getting anything we want now. We're getting nothing but frustration and ulcers.' " Charlie Sykes, a Milwaukee host, told Bartlett during an interview: "If the Republicans lose control of the House, they won't have anybody but themselves to blame."

Still, most of the conservative broadcasters are not rooting for a Democratic victory next month. Some say they are just reflecting the unease of their listeners. Others say they cannot abide the thought of a Democratic House or Senate.

"The Republicans certainly deserve to get spanked," said Steve Gill, a Nashville host. "The problem is, if you turn the Senate over to Hillary [Rodham Clinton] and Ted Kennedy, and Nancy Pelosi in the House, it's America that gets spanked."

Sykes said that "we've spent the last nine months being disappointed with the administration and being disillusioned." But now, he said, "people are getting more focused on the choice. . . . I don't think the Democrats have an alternative vision."

Administration officials have periodically blitzed the radio airwaves, where conservatives command big national or regional followings, as a way of circumventing the mainstream media. Progressive radio has made modest inroads in the past two years, but Air America, the fledgling liberal network, declared bankruptcy earlier this month.

Though a handful of liberals, such as Juan Williams of National Public Radio and Fox News, were allowed in the White House tent, others say they were shut out. Rachel Maddow, an Air America host, said the White House did not return her calls when she sought an invitation.

The talkathon enabled Rove, Bartlett and other officials to warn about the consequences of a Democratic takeover of Congress while being questioned in tones ranging from sympathetic to politely skeptical.

Martha Zoller, a host from Gainesville, Ga., said that "national security trumps everything," even though she does not like the administration's position on some domestic issues. "I don't think it does any good to say we're going to punish these guys by putting the other party in power, because it could be 10 to 15 years before we get conservatives back in power," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0086179

The biggest star on the right yesterday was Sean Hannity, who is heard on 515 stations. He was granted interviews with Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, whom Hannity hailed as "a great American."

Even Hannity, who campaigns for GOP candidates, said he has disagreed with the White House on immigration and on the ill-fated Dubai ports deal, "and I think spending has been a little out of control." But he remains a fierce administration defender, calling the Democratic Party "pathetically weak" on defense and terrorism, and dismissing predictions that the House minority leader may soon move into the speaker's office.

"The Democrats and Nancy Pelosi picked out the drapes and carpet a little too early," Hannity said.

White House Hosts Mass Talk Radio Event (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two weeks before a pivotal election, the Bush administration brought some of the Republican Party's conservative base to its front yard Tuesday by inviting talk radio hosts to broadcast from the North Lawn of the White House.

About three dozen radio hosts set up inside a huge tent, interviewing administration stars such as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and political guru Karl Rove. The hosts, both national and local, hailed from cities from New York to San Diego. They included a smattering of liberals.

“There are so many talking heads in one tent,” joked Jan Mickelson, a “conservative-slash-libertarian” who hosts a morning show based in Des Moines. “It is not conducive to sound conversation.”

Michael Harrison, publisher of the trade magazine Talkers, said the White House has held “radio days” before, including one President Clinton hosted in 1993 to promote his health care proposal. The Bush White House hosted a radio day less than a week before the elections in 2002.

Harrison said the difference this year is that some conservatives, such as economist Bruce Bartlett and blogger Andrew Sullivan, have been critical of Bush policies on the war in Iraq and federal spending as elections loom Nov. 7.

“Right now, the Bush administration is worried about its conservative base defecting,” Harrison said.

Bush spokesman Tony Snow, himself a former radio talk show host, sat for at least 34 radio interviews in the big white tent. His list included national hosts Glenn Beck and Neal Boortz, as well as Inga Barks of Bakersfield, Calif., and Dave Jaconette of Kalamazoo, Mich.

“The chief objective is to make our case as clearly as possible, to as many people as possible,” Snow said.

According to Talkers magazine, four of the five top talk radio audiences tune into conservatives: Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity, Michael Savage and Laura Ingraham. Of those, only Hannity showed up at the White House on Tuesday, and his day included an interview of Vice President Cheney to be run on both his radio and Fox News television programs Tuesday.

Cheney said the election could be decided on local issues. “I think sometimes we overestimate the extent to which these (midterm elections) are national in scope because we try to bring some order and understanding to it,” he told Hannity.

Hannity, who also interviewed Rice, Rumsfeld, Rove and Snow, said the White House is appealing to “new media” because they have a “pretty significant audience.”

Harrison, who reviewed a list of the 38 invited talk shows, said “a majority lean conservative” but noted there were others more moderate and liberal. Juan Williams, a senior correspondent with National Public Radio who has been critical of the administration, also interviewed Cheney.

The White House has used talk radio from time to time to get out its message. Last week, Cheney phoned in to Limbaugh's top-rated program to boast about the economy. In the midst of his campaign for changes to Social Security last year, President Bush gave an interview to Mickelson.

Bush was campaigning Tuesday, so Mickelson said he spoke with Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty and presidential counselor Dan Bartlett.

Mickelson said his listeners are particularly upset about “not controlling our borders” against illegal immigration.

Some of Bush's base “has abandoned ship, because they perceive he's abandoned them,” Mickelson added. He didn't know if radio day would help Republicans on Election Day: “It's a little late in the game.”

The GOP Leans On A Proven Strategy (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086180

Beset by discouraging polls and division within ideological ranks, the White House is accelerating efforts to woo back disaffected conservatives and energize the Republican base in a reprise of a strategy that succeeded in the last two campaign cycles.

President Bush and Vice President Cheney have given multiple interviews to conservative journalists, senior adviser Karl Rove has telephoned religious and social activists, and the White House has staged signing ceremonies for legislation cracking down on terrorism and illegal immigration. Two weeks before Election Day, Bush aides invited dozens of radio talk show hosts for a marathon broadcast from the White House yesterday to reach conservative listeners.

The message that Bush and others are sending to alienated supporters is that, no matter how upset they have been about various policies or political missteps over the past couple of years, life would be far worse under the Democrats. They name liberal lawmakers who would take charge of key committees and warn conservatives that taxes would go up and protection against terrorists would go down. And they cite, in particular, the confirmation of two conservative Supreme Court justices who might have been blocked by a Democratic Senate.

"The White House strategy is to remind us who would be in leadership in the House and Senate" if Democrats win, said Gary L. Bauer, president of a group called American Values and a Christian conservative who sends a daily e-mail to 100,000 supporters. "The idea is that that's going to be enough to get out most of this vote."

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a close Rove associate, said the White House team is blanketing the conservative circuit. "They're out there, they're talking to people, they're at our meetings," he said. "This is a full-court press." Norquist dismissed conservatives who are threatening to stay home on Election Day: "They're not doing anything other than whining."

Some conservatives said it is too late. "They honestly need a baseball bat against the head," said Republican pollster Frank Luntz, who helped Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) take over Congress in the 1990s. "Because if they don't change the lexicon immediately, as bad as this election is going to be, they're going to lose the presidency in 2008. I've given up on 2006. They've already made so many mistakes, there's no way they can fix it in two weeks. But I'm worried now they're going to lose all the marbles."

The White House courtship of the right paid enormous dividends in the past, but this year it is complicated by a far more skeptical audience than in 2002 and 2004. Conservatives who were key to those victories have grown frustrated with the Bush policies on federal spending, immigration, Iraq and foreign affairs, and uncertain of his commitment to issues such as preventing legalized same-sex marriage. The Mark Foley page scandal did not help reassure "values voters," as strategists call them, nor did the publication of a book by former White House official David Kuo saying that Bush aides dismissed Christian conservatives as "nuts."

Republicans in Washington Post-ABC News polls are unified behind GOP House candidates, but somewhat less so than Democrats are behind theirs. Ten percent of Republicans in the latest survey said they plan to vote Democratic this year, compared with 4 percent of Democrats who intend to cross over. One reason is that Democrats have made some headway among traditionally conservative groups.

In the most recent poll, 29 percent of self-identified conservatives said they plan to vote for Democrats for the House, compared with 17 percent in 2004. Among white evangelical Protestants, 30 percent favor Democrats, compared with 25 percent two years ago. At the same time, Republicans report being as enthusiastic as Democrats about voting this year, belying the assumption that they might stay home.

"This is going to be a very important part of the election," said White House political director Sara Taylor. "In a traditional midterm headwind, Republicans are going to have to make sure they turn out their base. In places where they do that, Republicans are going to win races they're supposed to win. In places where they don't do that, they're going to have a much harder time."

The White House has tried to rev up its base in various ways. Bush has given interviews to Fox News host Bill O'Reilly, the Wall Street Journal's Paul Gigot, and groups of conservative columnists and talk show hosts. Cheney appeared last week on Rush Limbaugh's radio show and yesterday gave an interview to conservative television and radio commentator Sean Hannity.

"Nancy is not in sync with the vast majority of the American people," Cheney said, referring to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who would become speaker if Democrats took over the House. "Nancy represents what I think is that side of the Democratic Party that has not been aggressive of and does not believe in a really robust, aggressive prosecution of the global war on terror."

To maximize the blitz, the White House set up a tent on the North Lawn yesterday and let 42 radio hosts broadcast live during the day. Because it was on government property, "Radio Day" included outlets such as National Public Radio, but "it's mostly conservative talk," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "This is a chance to talk to people and get heard," said

DOJ_NMG_0086181

Snow, a former talk show host who did more than 20 interviews yesterday and has also been dispatched to talk to conservative Web sites such as the Power Line blog.

Rove wandered into the tent with a piece of paper guiding him to a dozen interviews yesterday. Others on hand included Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, presidential counselor Dan Bartlett, White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend, and budget director Rob Portman.

Iraq was a subject of discussion as officials tried to explain Bush's evolving rhetoric. Snow minimized the decision to no longer describe Bush's policy as "stay the course," telling Fox that he found only eight times when Bush used the phrase. The liberal Center for American Progress then quickly posted a list of 30 instances when Bush argued to "stay the course." And Rumsfeld told Hannity that it is "nonsense" to say Bush is "backing away from 'stay the course,' " saying he only wants to avoid confusion.

The White House has reached out in other ways, too. Rove hosted a conference call Monday with key conservative leaders, reminding them of the stakes of the elections. And the White House has staged events to highlight Bush's conservative positions. In Scottsdale, Ariz., Bush signed a spending bill that pays for more border patrol agents and the beginning of a new fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, a nod to conservatives who consider him soft on illegal immigration.

At times, though, the White House does not highlight actions that would help it with the right, leaving it to activists to do it themselves. In the same bill, unmentioned by Bush, is a provision banning authorities from confiscating lawfully owned guns during emergencies, a response to reports of firearms taken away in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

"I certainly didn't get a call about a signing ceremony," said National Rifle Association lobbyist Chris Cox. "But quite frankly, it was irrelevant as long as the bill was signed into law." The NRA notified its 4 million members and reminded them, as the group's Web site put it, that it "makes it clear why gun owners can never, ever sit on the sidelines during an election."

Paul M. Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, said the White House is not doing enough to repair relations with the base. "I'm not seeing anything," he said. "Maybe they're doing certain things with people who are closer to them. But in my case, I've not gotten any special treatment or invitations or whatever."

Still, Weyrich said the White House may yet benefit from conservatives coming home. "It'll all come down to conservatives," he said. "For a long time, I've heard nothing but 'I'm not going to vote for these jerks.' Now I'm hearing 'Well, I suppose we'll have to vote the jerks back in and see what we can do.' "

Polling director Jon Cohen contributed to this report.

Republican Base Loses Faith (CSM)

By Jane Lampman

The Christian Science Monitor, October 25, 2006

Ever since George W. Bush named Jesus as his favorite philosopher and positioned himself as a strong man of faith, Republicans have increasingly been viewed as the party sympathetic to religion - with the Democrats found seriously wanting.

That may be changing.

With the Congressional election less than two weeks away, recent surveys show signs of a shift among religious voters that could give Democrats a boost.

A Gallup poll earlier this month found white religious voters "equally as likely to say they will vote Democratic as Republican." And a Pew Research poll last week found just 57 percent of white Evangelicals planning to vote Republican, a drop from 68 percent in 2002 and 74 percent in 2004. Among white Catholics, the decline was even greater.

"The GOP's problems with white Evangelicals are important, but they have even bigger problems with white Catholics," says John Green, senior fellow at Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life. "The survey shows a majority of white Catholics saying they'll vote for a Democratic congressional candidate; that's a return to where white Catholics would have been a decade or two ago."

The shift reflects plummeting support for the Republican administration and Congress over the war in Iraq and multiplying political scandals. But it appears that Democratic candidates' efforts to articulate their faith and values - and tie them to a broader range of issues - are also resonating with voters.

The party has initiated a serious effort to reach out to people of faith. For example, after a series of meetings with religious and lay leaders across the state, the Michigan Democratic Party has written language on the role of faith into its party platform.

Meanwhile, Christian conservatives are working hard to ramp up support for their priority social issues and get out the Republican vote, but they admit there is less enthusiasm this time around.

DOJ_NMG_0086182

"Several factors play into a level of enthusiasm that is less than it was two years ago," says Tony Perkins, president of Family Research Council, a conservative religious group. "It's not a presidential election year, ... the threat [of same-sex marriage] has diminished in the minds of many, and you've had scandal in the Republican party.

"The Foley episode has caused some to step back and say, 'Wait a minute: What are the core values of the Republican party?' " he adds. "That's caused some to ask whether the big-tent strategy has led to the point where we've got a three-ring circus."

The buzzword after the 2004 election was the "values voter." Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John Kerry was criticized for not speaking convincingly in the language of faith, while the party was charged with being hostile to religion.

That opened the door wide for religious folk outside the conservative camp to begin to speak more openly. A host of books by progressive people of faith hit the market asserting that Christian values ranged far beyond what conservatives were promoting, particularly caring for the poor and environmental issues. A number of new organizations formed to galvanize moderate and liberal Christians. 'Christian' doesn't mean 'Republican'

Red Letter Christians - named for the teachings of Jesus printed in red letters in some Bible editions - advocate "an evangelicalism marked by compassion and justice," in the words of cofounder Tony Campolo, professor emeritus at Eastern University, a Baptist-affiliated university in St. David's, Pa.

The Catholic Alliance for the Common Good organized to inform Catholic voters on the "full range of issues" they should consider given Catholic social teachings. Last month the group distributed more than a million voter guides.

Christian Democrats established a new online community, Faithfuldemocrats.com, to engage religious and political leaders and ordinary Americans in discussions on putting faith into action. They aim to show that the Republican party doesn't have a monopoly on values or on being Christian.

"I don't know how many Tennesseans have told me that their pastor or Sunday School teacher told them you cannot be a Democrat and a Christian," says State Sen. Roy Herron, a Democratic leader in the Tennessee legislature and a co-founder of the online community.

He says Democrats bear some responsibility for such perceptions. "The charge that some Democrats have been insensitive to religion is a valid one, and others of us have been keeping our lights under a bushel," he explains. "Some of us have been reluctant to speak of our faith in the political arena ... because we can see a danger that people deeply rooted in faith will seek to use God rather than be used by God." But now it's imperative "to tell the truth about our faith." Democrats play up their faith

In the current campaign, a number of Democratic candidates are seeking to do just that. Prominent party leaders have led the way: Sen. Barack Obama's speech on faith and politics last June won wide play in the press and accolades from the public; Senator Kerry followed with a speech about his own religious convictions that many say he should have given in 2004.

Others in the political fray are opening up. In Ohio, Democratic gubernatorial candidate Ted Strickland has talked regularly about faith and values and is way out in front of his religious conservative opponent, Ken Blackwell. Ohio went for President Bush in 2004, but Republican scandals and a deteriorating economy have put the social issues promoted by conservatives on the back burner for many voters. Instead, raising the state minimum wage is garnering support from more than three-quarters of Ohioans, according to a recent poll.

In Tennessee, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., who is running for the US Senate, filmed a TV ad from his home church explaining his values and has a faith statement on his website. Pennsylvania state treasurer Bob Casey Jr., an anti-abortion Democrat running against conservative Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, has given the Democrats a different face on the abortion issue.

Such efforts "may help particular Democratic candidates get Evangelical votes, but it might be even more effective with Roman Catholic and mainline Protestants, groups that have been voting Republican but aren't as strongly wedded to the GOP," suggests Dr. Green, a longtime political analyst from Ohio.

Two other innovations may also benefit Democrats as they try to bring religious voters into the fold. A number of Democratic candidates are advertising for the first time on Christian radio. And national and state Democratic parties are working hard on outreach to religious groups. The chief of staff of the Democratic National Committee, in fact, is a Pentecostal pastor. Strategies to change perceptions

Mark Brewer, chair of the Michigan Democratic Party, says their "listening meetings" with faith groups and rewriting of the platform have helped change perceptions. They also have policy initiatives involving faith groups, such as seeking common ground on abortion reduction.

"I want to make sure on an ongoing basis that people of faith feel comfortable participating in the party," Mr. Brewer says.

On a national level, however, this outreach is controversial among some secular party members. And the impact of such efforts remains to be proven.

DOJ_NMG_0086183

Disillusionment among Christian conservatives may also be a factor. Along with the scandals, an explosive new book by David Kuo, former deputy in the White House office for the faith-based initiative, describes an administration that looked down on Christian leaders and chose not to deliver on promises while exploiting the Christian base for political advantage. In "Tempting Faith," Mr. Kuo calls on fellow Christians to go on "a fast" from politics for the next two years.

The religious right has been intensely active in recent weeks, holding a "values summit" and working to energize churches and voters. The Family Research Council sponsored a national TV broadcast from Boston Oct. 15, highlighting the same-sex marriage issue and its potential link to religious liberty.

Yet Mr. Perkins of the FRC is well aware of the changing environment. "The core of the Evangelical community sees voting not just as an opportunity, but as an obligation, so they'll vote," he says. "The real question is how many people they'll call and take to the polls with them."

He also acknowledges Democratic efforts. "It's going to have an impact, but to the degree of getting people to switch to the Democratic party, I doubt it at this point in time," he says. If Democrats begin to establish a track record on issues people care about, they could, he adds, "but it's going to take awhile."

Still, it's notable to hear a religious-right leader long wedded to the Republican camp then add: "I think competition is good for our economy, and it's good for our political environment as well."

Disillusioned Insider's Book Tests Bush's Image As 'Pastor-in-Chief' Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

LEBANON, Ohio -- On a recent evening, Lori Viars and Jim Winters sit at a table in a dining room, stuffing envelopes and chatting as if about a mutual friend.

Only the "friend" is President Bush. And the old house in the center of this historic town isn't a home any longer. It is undergoing renovations to become Republican Party headquarters for Warren County, north of Cincinnati--reflecting the population growth, and conservatism, of so many exurban counties where the Bush-era Republican Party has staked its fortune.

MIDTERM SURVIVAL GUIDE

· Chief Concerns: Who Heads Key Committees if Democrats Win the House?1

· Review the results of the latest polls2 in hot Senate races, and see what the data could mean for the breakdown of seats in the chamber after Election Day. (Oct. 19)

· Tracking the House Polls: Check recent numbers3 (Oct. 19)

· Representative Races: Data on 15 key districts4 (Oct. 19)

WASHINGTON WIRE

5

See the expanded online version of Washington Wire6. The Journal's Washington bureau updates the Wire each weekday with analysis, news and buzz from inside and outside the Beltway. Plus, continuously updated campaign coverage7

Jim, the music minister at nearby Grace Baptist Church, wears a wrist band reading, "One Nation Under God." He asks Lori, a party official and mother of two, if she'd heard that the president lately is praying from a new daily devotional book. Lori says she hasn't; Jim can't remember which book it reportedly is. Yet both know that Mr. Bush had been using the long-popular prayer book, "My Utmost for His Highest," by the early 20th century Scottish minister Oswald Chambers.

Meanwhile, they go on stuffing envelopes for would-be voters with brochures for local, state and federal Republican candidates, their enthusiasm seemingly undiminished by persistent bad news and bad polls for the president's party. On a recent Saturday, volunteers—mostly Christian conservatives—made 3,556 calls to potential voters from this old house, urging them to come out on Election Day Nov. 7.

Another Book

The conversation between Mr. Wilson and Mrs. Viars comes amid publication of another book that perhaps should be required reading for evangelical conservatives: "Tempting Faith." Author David Kuo worked in the White House office for the faith-based social initiatives that were a foundation block of Mr. Bush's 2000 platform. The book recounts his disillusionment with officials, up to the president. On his promotional tour, Mr. Kuo is calling for Christians to "fast" from politics for two years.

From pages 229-230: At the White House, "They know 'the nuts' were politically invaluable, but that was the extent of their usefulness.….National Christian leaders received hugs and smiles in person and then were dismissed behind their backs and described as 'ridiculous,' 'out of control,' and just plain 'goofy.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086184

When then-Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle called to give a green light to a faith bill, Bush aides, concerned about its cost, said "maybe next year." (p. 196) Privately, aides called the legislation "the f---g faith-based initiative" (p. 243), and the president "knew it was languishing and had no problem with that." (p. 257) The promised $8 billion a year, mostly in tax credits for helping the poor, didn't make it into the Bush tax-cut bills. The White House "was mocking the millions of faithful Christians who put their trust and hope in the president and his administration." (p. 253)

Perhaps understandably, Mr. Kuo's book hasn't gotten the attention of another, best-selling author Bob Woodward's "State of Denial" on the administration's mal-administration of the Iraq-Afghanistan war—the biggest issue on Americans' minds generally these days. Yet even among Christian conservatives, the reaction to the Kuo book—where there is any—is a shoot-the-messenger dismissal.

"David Kuo? Who is he?" asks Paul Weyrich, co-founder with Jerry Falwell of the Christian conservative political movement in the late '70s. "The person at the White House I talk to every week is Tim Goeglein"—a top liaison to Christian conservatives with a long history in evangelical political circles. "I know he does not ridicule us."

Faith in the President

But forget Mr. Goeglein. What's more important, as Mrs. Viars's and Mr. Wilson's chat suggests, is that the Christian conservatives seem to have faith that the president is sincere. And that's what the White House is counting on, as it looks to Christian conservative voters to come out next month and at least blunt the big losses the party almost certainly will suffer.

Not far from here in Ohio, the president of the statewide Christian conservative group Citizens for Community Values, Phil Burress, says, "I do not know the president and I've never to my knowledge been in the same room with him. But I do know a half-dozen people who have been in the room with him, and have been with him in prayer." Moreover, Mr. Burress adds, Mr. Bush's appointments of John Roberts and Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court were "huge" for conservatives dreaming that Roe vs. Wade will someday be overturned.

As a sanguine Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's top strategist, puts it, "It's David Kuo and George W. Bush, and who do you think has greater credibility in the evangelical community?"

Calling from the road, Mr. Kuo (pronounced "kwo") resignedly acknowledges the slings and arrows from his former White House colleagues, and from among the leaders of the Christian conservative political groups. He says one conservative columnist has dubbed him "the axis of evil."

As for those leaders, he says, "Here's the bottom line: Christians have traded in the priceless gift of God for political hay." Going back over the 30 years that the national Republican Party has been making common cause with the religious right, Mr. Kuo says, "Christians have been utterly exploited," but "as long as the politician mentions Jesus, they are happy." He dismisses as not credible the White House's categorical denials that anyone there has ever spoken negatively about Christian conservatives. He will not answer the most frequently asked question: Who exactly called the religious leaders "nuts" and "goofy?"

Given the cynicism that pervaded White House deliberations, he says, "Who didn't say it? Who didn't, in some way or another, say it?"

Mr. Kuo will say that he never heard Mr. Bush say those exact words.

Meanwhile, Mr. Kuo says he isn't surprised that the president is accorded greater credibility than he is. After all, Mr. Kuo says, "the news in the book…is that everything about his public faith"—from the Bushes' church attendance to accounts of his readings—"has been the mostly closely guarded imagery of his presidency. Everything is done to preserve the Christian image—President Bush as pastor-in-chief. Because when he's pastor-in-chief, Christians don't have to think critically."

That said, Mr. Kuo says that Mr. Bush's "faith is real, his empathy is genuine and his compassion is astounding." But the president is, at bottom, "a political person in a political institution trying to achieve political ends." And those, it seems, too often are at odds with the ends that Christians were led to believe the president would seek.

Rove Upbeat About GOP Money, GOTV (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, October 25, 2006

Karl Rove told Republican supporters last Friday that the media was misreading the political environment — that the combination of money and mobilization of religious conservatives could keep the House in Republican hands after November.

Speaking at a fundraiser for Ohio GOP congressional candidate Joy Padgett at the Old Ebbitt Grill, Rove said polls showed that evangelical Protestant voters were still enthusiastic and suggested that Republicans started with a two- to three-point advantage because of their successful voter turnout operations in 2002 and 2004.

When asked if Rove remains as confident in private about the 2006 election, Padgett said, “Even more so.”

DOJ_NMG_0086185

Despite evidence that voters could direct a barrage of negative public opinion against Republican officeholders on Election Day, Rove and President Bush have been upbeat, making some Democrats nervous about current predictions and worrying some Republicans.

"Even if you know the ship is sinking, you have to act like it's a sunny day," said former Democratic Party Chairman Terry McAuliffe. "You got to keep your folks motivated to get them out to vote."

"Rule Number Six of politics: Don't believe your own spin," said Joe Gaylord, a Republican strategist and aide to former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who guided the Republicans to victory in 1994.

Nevertheless, Republicans believe their significant financial advantage and the Republican National Committee's get-out-the-vote (GOTV) operation can protect them against the anti-Republican trends reflected in opinion polls.

"Republicans are building on their record," Rove said at the event, referring to the GOP's successful voter turnout efforts in 2002 and 2004. "Democrats are building on theirs."

The RNC's vaunted 72-Hour GOTV program has been in the works for months, taking hundreds of steps to help endangered incumbents, said a GOP lawmaker familiar with the efforts. The RNC even has set aside money and volunteers to dispatch to problem areas.

The party committee spent $350,000 for a GOTV effort in New Hampshire where the state party has been ravaged by scandal and helped register more than 3,000 new voters in GOP Rep. Heather Wilson's congressional district in New Mexico.

In regards to turnout, Rove said a question in a recent New York Times-CBS poll skewed findings that religious conservatives were discouraged. Instead, he pointed to a survey conducted by the Pew Research Center showing that 54 percent of white evangelical Protestants viewed Bush favorably (still, a 20-point drop from 2004) and 57 percent said they supported GOP candidates (a nine-point decline from 2002).

Moreover, a Gallup poll released this month found that the GOP's 22-point advantage among white frequent churchgoers in September had evaporated.

"The situation is exactly the opposite and under-appreciates just how catastrophically bad the situation is for Republicans among independent voters," said David Rhode, a political scientist at Duke University.

Rhode pointed to polls showing that independent voters are breaking toward Republicans. A Washington Post-ABC poll released Tuesday showed that they favored Democrats by a 2-to-1 margin.

Former Rep. Tony Coelho (D-Calif.) said that Rove was speaking in absolutes in order to excite Republican voters. He added that he expected that religious Republicans would turn out to vote, but they would not do so in the numbers they did in 2004.

In 2000, Rove overestimated Bush's showing in the election, predicting Bush would win 320 electoral votes; he won just 271. Four years later, Rove predicted Republicans would pick up seven House seats, but the GOP gained just three.

Democrats Won't Count Votes Before They're Cast (WT)

By Amy Fagan And Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

Democrats, stung by unexpected defeats in the past two national elections, are trying to fend off poll-generated overconfidence by staying on the offensive and focusing on get-out-the-vote efforts.

"We've learned our lessons. The last two elections we thought we'd do better. Nobody's taking their foot off the gas," said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network.

"There's a cautious optimism that's broken out. I don't think anyone's overconfident right now," said Mr. Rosenberg, whose group works on Democratic message and voter turnout.

Danny Briscoe, a campaign media consultant and former Kentucky state Democratic Party chairman, says from party leaders and pundits to grass-roots Democrats, feelings swing between disbelief and superconfidence -- at least when it comes to House control.

"Mostly, our people are afraid to believe it," he said of favorable polling.

"They think [Karl] Rove may have something up his sleeve, they remember exit polls said Kerry beat Bush, they remember Republicans not losing seats in 2002 and 2004 under Bush when history said they should have."

Fighting those feelings of disbelief, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi has emphasized that a Democratic takeover of the House isn't definite and that there's still work to be done.

"While the indicators look good, it drives us to work harder," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for the California Democrat.

But Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, recently told the New York Times that some Democrats are in "somersault land" already, a luxury he said he doesn't have.

DOJ_NMG_0086186

With polls showing a notable lead for their party, some Democrats have clearly found it impossible to temper their extreme confidence.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, predicted at a recent party event that Democrats will exceed the 15-seat net gain they need to retake the House.

"Democrats will take 40 seats in the House, and if the election were held today, we'd take control of the Senate too," he said, according to the Pittsburgh Tribune Review.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, recently told New Hampshire's Union Leader that he's "very confident" of a House victory for Democrats and "hopeful" of one in the Senate, where Democrats need a net gain of six seats.

And even Mrs. Pelosi laughed and told the Associated Press this month: "I'll have any suite I want" when asked where her office would be if she becomes speaker of the House.

Polls in the past few days have indicated that Democrats lead Republicans by an average of 16.8 percentage points in generic party-preference polls. The latest nonpartisan Cook Political Report poll reported that most likely voters prefer a Democrat-controlled Congress by 22 percentage points.

"Waves come crashing in; they also pull you out," cautioned Chris Redfern, chairman of the Ohio Democratic Party.

"We have to focus on our efforts between now and election night and spend less time focusing on ... the drapes we'll pick out."

There is some evidence that Democrats' confidence may be premature.

Dick Morris, a former strategist for President Clinton, yesterday wrote that the Republican base "seems to be coming back home," according to vague emerging trends in polls.

In the Tennessee Senate race for instance, Republican Bob Corker has taken a lead over Democrat Harold E. Ford Jr., according to Zogby and Rasmussen polls. In New Jersey's Senate race, Republican Tom Kean Jr. now leads Democratic incumbent Robert Menendez in the latest Zogby poll.

The generic Democratic edge is down from nine points a few weeks ago to four points now, according to the Zogby survey -- all of which prompt the two strategists to say control of Congress has shifted from "lean Democrat" to a "tossup."

A Gallup poll over the weekend also found 54 percent think their own representative deserves to be re-elected.

Still, both parties know the ultimate outcome largely hangs on voter turnout.

"You don't count polls; you count heads," Mr. Redfern said.

He said his get-out-the-vote operation is shunning "the unbridled enthusiasm" for Democrats that he sees coming from Washington pundits and pollsters.

In Ohio and elsewhere, Democrats are working this year to match the successful voter turnout program Republicans put in place.

"I've seen no signs of Democratic overconfidence as I travel the country, because overconfidence is when you believe something will happen but don't have a lot of good reasons," said Merrill Matthews, a political analyst for the Texas-based think tank Institute for Policy Innovation.

Democrats May Be Poised To Win, But They're Still Lost (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

There are lots of reasons why businesses run into trouble, but a few pop up with remarkable regularity.

Misreading or ignoring market signals.

Focusing more on competitors than customers.

Confusing management with leadership, tactics with strategy.

Promoting leaders who misunderstand their jobs and surround themselves with blind loyalists.

It should be no surprise that these business missteps are also common in politics.

They are the key mistakes that led Republicans to overplay their hand and perhaps throw away the chance to renew their political lease on Congress and the White House.

Though the election is still two weeks away, there are signs the Democrats, if they win, are determined to make the same mistakes.

Let's start with the "Six for '06" plan that Democrats promise to ram through the House in the first 100 hours, or 100 days -- I'm a bit confused as to which. The very premise of the document represents a fundamental misreading of the political marketplace.

First, there is no mandate for a Democratic agenda because until last week, there wasn't one. Like most political turning points, including the one in 1994, this election is fundamentally a referendum on the party in power rather than on the promises of the opposition. The voters are angry at Republicans, dissatisfied with their programs and disenchanted with their governance. It's less that Democrats will have won this election than Republicans will have lost it.

DOJ_NMG_0086187

Second, if Democrats want to show they are different from Republicans in how they would govern, it inspires little confidence that they want to push a Democratic version of former House speaker Newt Gingrich's "Contract with America" through the House without consulting the Senate, the White House or the other party. That's precisely how the House has been run for the past four years, with little to show for it.

Worse still, the Democrats' six-point program is more a compendium of political slogans and ideological hot buttons than a serious policy agenda -- again, the very thing the customers say they don't want.

It may be fun to talk of ending "tax giveaways" to big oil companies and big drug companies and corporations that send U.S. jobs overseas, but people serious about governing know those are complicated issues involving powerful interest groups that can't be resolved in isolation.

Or take rising college tuition, which everyone would agree is a problem. Unfortunately, if Democrats had bothered to consult any good Democratic economist, they would have found that creating an expensive new tax deduction for tuition payments is not only lousy and regressive tax policy but will drive tuitions even higher.

You'll be relieved to know that once the Democrats take power, there will be "no privatization of Social Security, in whole or in part." But don't bother looking for how they plan to make this bedrock social program solvent again. It ain't there.

Certainly, I feel much safer knowing that Democrats plan to "require the Iraqis to take responsibility for their country" -- no details on that one quite yet. And I'll be fascinated to learn how Democrats plan to "double the size of special forces," "rebuild a state-of-the-art military" and screen every car, truck, airplane and cargo container crossing the border while "restoring fiscal discipline." And all that before the Easter recess!

Indeed, reading through the "Six for '06" document, it's pretty clear Democrats have followed Republicans into the trap of thinking more about competition (winning elections) than consumers (voters). Instead of offering a credible strategy for extricating us from the horrible mess in Iraq, confronting difficult fiscal trade-offs and reversing the powerful market forces that are leading us toward economic insecurity and inequality, they offer nothing more than political tactics.

One House member told me this week not to pay much attention to the "Six for '06" plan, that it was just some "easy stuff" designed to build momentum by gaining quick passage in the House. What he and his colleagues seem to miss is that the voters have become disillusioned with the focus on the easy stuff. They're ready to follow politicians with the guts and creativity and honesty to tackle the tough stuff.

The chief architect of Democrats' strategy has been House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, who would be the first female speaker of the House if the Democrats win control. Pelosi comes honestly to the role of political boss and manager: Her father was a Baltimore mayor and congressman who taught her the art of ward politics, the effective use of the "favor bank" and the bedrock importance of party and personal loyalty.

But it's an open question whether Pelosi can make the transition from being a tough, effective manager of the opposition to leader of the whole House in what will remain a divided government. The times call for a speaker who can stand above the partisan fray, who is wise enough to hold her enemies as close as her friends, and trusted and respected enough by the other party and the other chamber to broker deals and get things done.

For Pelosi, those skills would be a stretch. Even now, she has trouble with Democrats who once opposed her election as majority leader, let alone those who defied her by cooperating with Republicans. And she has surrounded herself with loyal colleagues and staffers who reflect her weaknesses more than compensate for them. She has turned down compromises that might have won half a loaf for her side and refused to stand behind President Bush when national unity was called for. But she has rarely missed an opportunity to pile on when Republicans were down. It's telling that despite a lifetime in politics and six years as opposition leader, Pelosi has never mastered the art of losing gracefully.

In politics as in business, the way to create enduring advantage is not by beating the competition at its game but changing the nature of the game. Up to this point, all Democrats have been doing is beating the Republicans at their game.

Democrat Waxman Could Give The Bush Administration Fits (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - He's not as high profile or as flamboyant as Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who would become the first female speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives if Democrats win control on Election Day.

He doesn't promise the drama of Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., who would take over the House Judiciary Committee and has talked since 2003 of impeaching President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0086188

Yet if you want to watch a Democrat who could give the Bush White House hell for the next two years, keep an eye on Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.

You might cheer him on. You might hate him. But you won't be bored.

A stranger to many Americans, the 67-year-old Waxman would become chairman of the House Government Reform Committee if the Democrats take over the House. He's one of the shrewdest, most effective inside players in Congress. And armed with the committee's subpoena power, he'd force the Bush administration to spend much of its last two years in office answering questions about its first six.

For one, he'd haul in the vice president's staff and energy industry executives to find out what went on behind closed doors when Dick Cheney and the industry wrote the administration's energy policy in 2001.

For another, he'd summon the Commerce Department brass to answer reports that they manipulate media coverage of global warming, including steering an MSNBC reporter away from a climate expert who believed the problem is worsening.

And he's certain to probe into abuses by contractors in Iraq, for he has criticized Halliburton and other such firms continually since 2003 for various schemes that he says ripped off U.S. taxpayers.

Giving Waxman the gavel would be a dramatic shift for the House, which all but dropped congressional oversight of the executive branch when a Republican administration was sworn in on Jan. 20, 2001.

It would also be a shift for Waxman, who spent the 1990s largely defending the Clinton administration and accusing the Republican House of overreaching in its investigations.

"When President Clinton was in office, congressional committees were themselves on steroids and investigated every possible allegation of wrongdoing, no matter how small," Waxman said at a recent panel sponsored by the Center for American Progress, a Democratic think tank.

"But when President Bush took over, oversight virtually ceased. No matter how big the issue, Congress now often looks away."

Since then, he said, "we've had an imperial presidency and a subservient Congress for the last five years, and the costs to the nation have been enormous."

Waxman is a veteran of three decades in the House, a member of the large Democratic class elected in 1974 in the wake of the Watergate scandal. A liberal's liberal whose wealthy district includes Beverly Hills, he managed to win expansion of Medicaid health coverage for poor children between 1984 and 1990 - as an unfunded mandate to state governments, which consumed ever-larger chunks of state budgets.

He spent years on the Energy and Commerce Committee, fighting to preserve and then expand clean-air laws so important to his Los Angeles constituents. For years one of the best shows in town was watching Waxman wrangle with Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who fought against clean-air laws on behalf of his Detroit hometown's interest, the auto industry.

In the end, Waxman and other environmentalists prevailed and Congress passed a new Clean Air Act - with major help from the first President Bush.

Voters' Doubts About Sharing In Prosperity Send A Danger Signal (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

You don't have to be a political pundit to know that next month's elections aren't about the economy. They're about Iraq, mostly; congressional scandals, secondarily; and a host of regional and local issues after that.

Still, there's something unnerving about watching an anti-incumbent tidal wave roll in at a time when the economy, by most macro measures, is cruising. Unemployment is at a historic low -- 4.6% -- and inflation remains under 3%. The big economic bugaboos of earlier this year -- rising interest rates and soaring oil prices -- have both eased off. Even the Dow Jones Industrial Average is hitting historic highs. Yet a majority of voters who responded to last week's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll say they disapprove of President Bush's handling of the economy.

Some of this may be the normal noise of midterm elections, when national economic performance is less important than other things. Republicans took control of Congress in 1994 in the midst of an economic expansion. Unemployment that September clocked in at 5.9% and inflation at about 4% -- not as good as today, but not bad.

TALKING BUSINESS

Email business@wsj.com1 and read reader comments Saturday at WSJ.com/TalkingBusiness2.

Still, the economic backdrop for election 2006 should raise a warning flag about the future. Large numbers of Americans seem to have lost their belief in John F. Kennedy's famous aphorism that a rising tide lifts all boats. "They know the economy is white hot," says political analyst Charlie Cook, "but they also know they aren't in it....There's a feeling that some people are getting theirs, but we aren't getting ours."

DOJ_NMG_0086189

There's a well-known litany of reasons for that. Median earnings have been growing at a disturbingly slow pace, even as profits and high-end pay have soared. Health-care costs are not only increasing, they increasingly are being paid by consumers, not by employers or the government. Pensions are disappearing, as is job security -- and any sense of long-term loyalty from employers. As pollster Peter Hart puts it, "there's no gold watch" waiting at the end of a career these days. He cites a cartoon in which the boss says: "Mr. Jones, the reason we are letting you go is because you've given us the best years of your life."

Meanwhile, a thin slice of America is enjoying unprecedented prosperity. CEO pay is one of the most visible manifestations, rising in the past decade at triple the rate of the median worker's pay. In my home town of Greenwich, Conn., skilled financiers bring home eight- and nine-digit paychecks, unimaginable in the not-so-distant past. Americans have never been big on the politics of envy, in part because they hoped someday they would join those at the top. But increasingly, they wonder whether the economic game is rigged, and whether all these riches are the result of backdated options or insider trading or some other trickery that doesn't benefit them.

The danger for business is that the broad social support for pro-business and pro-market policies that has characterized American politics for a quarter century or more could be breaking down. You see tame hints of that in popular Democratic proposals for a minimum-wage increase or for government negotiations to push down drug prices.

A much stronger dose comes from Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown -- who is given good odds of winning his challenge against Ohio Senator Mike Dewine. He calls for renegotiating the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Permanent Normal Trade Relations agreement with China. "This election's a referendum on the special-interest stranglehold in our government," Rep. Brown said in an interview with NBC's "Meet the Press."

"The drug industry always gets its way, the HMOs always get their way, the oil industry always gets their way, the big companies that outsource jobs always get their way. Who's fighting for the middle class?"

A Democratic wise man told me recently that if he were asked what economic platform would offer a Democratic presidential contender the best chances of success in 2008, he would have to say it's an antitrade, antiglobalization, anti-immigration platform. For now, none of the best-known possible Democratic candidates -- Hillary Clinton, John Kerry, Al Gore or, the latest fad, Barack Obama -- are taking that tack. But the problem here isn't Democratic leaders. It's Democratic followers. If the reservoir of dissatisfaction grows strong enough, it's only a matter of time before some candidate figures out how to tap in.

NRCC Targets 33 Districts (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, October 25, 2006

With Democratic momentum mounting and control of the House at stake, senior Republican strategists are urging donors to contribute to 33 GOP members and candidates who are “most in need of support right now.”

The National Republican Congressional Committee’s (NRCC) “Final Push List” consists of 29 Republican seats and only four Democratic seats, indicating that the GOP is playing defense.

The list, obtained by The Hill, provides a rare glimpse of the races that congressional strategists are concentrating on close to Election Day.

NRCC focuses on most but not all toss-up House races in its Final Push roster, dated Oct. 19.

In an e-mail to congressional officials, NRCC PAC Director Jenny Sheffield states, “…it’s crucial at this point to send in some late money to some [of] our campaigns. The funds our candidates receive now will allow them to increase their TV buys and will make the difference on Nov. 7.

“I have attached our Final Push list for those Members and candidates most in need of support right now. If your boss has not maxed out to those on the attached list, please ask him or her to consider sending a check from a leadership PAC and/or reelection account … IMMEDIATELY!”

Republicans have also sent the list to lobbyists, seeking donations. The NRCC list (see chart) has many endangered Republicans, including four each from Ohio and New York, and three from Pennsylvania. It also contains some surprises, such as Rep. Cathy McMorris (R-Wash.), whose seat was considered safe earlier this month.

Conservative GOP candidate Tim Walberg, who defeated centrist Rep. Joe Schwarz (R-Mich.) in a bitter primary earlier this year, is also on the Final Push roster. Even though he has significantly outspent his Democratic opponent, Sharon Renier, Walberg leads the race by just eight points, according to a recent poll.

Renier has $1,379 cash on hand while Walberg has over $85,000 in the bank. President Bush won the district in 2004 with 54 percent of the vote.

Republican incumbents who did not make the Final Push cut include Reps. Chris Chocola (Ind.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.), John Hostettler (Ind.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Jon Porter (Nev.), Clay Shaw (Fla.), Christopher Shays (Conn.), and Charles Taylor (N.C.).

DOJ_NMG_0086190

These Republicans are in highly competitive races, but several have major fundraising advantages over their opponents and are not in dire need of NRCC assistance.

But Fitzpatrick, Hostettler, and Taylor have less cash on hand than their Democratic opponents.

Hostettler is in serious jeopardy of losing his seat. The sixth-term incumbent is a lackluster fundraiser and trailed Democratic candidate Joe Donnelly by 23 points in a recent poll.

Taylor is behind in his race against former pro quarterback Health Shuler by single digits, while Fitzpatrick's race is expected to go down to the wire.

NRCC spokesman Ed Patru said the Final Push List "is fluid," suggesting it has been revised since late last week. He noted that Hostettler does not accept PAC money and that Fitzpatrick's opponent, Patrick Murphy, has "greatly underperformed." However, the nonpartisan Cook Political Report recently moved the Fitzpatrick-Murphy race from lean Republican to toss-up.

Asked about Taylor's exclusion from the list, Patru said, "Taylor has always written his own check."

Spokespersons for Fitzpatrick, Hostettler, and Taylor did not comment for this article.

In her e-mail to congressional officials, NRCC's Sheffield suggests she can "tier" the list of 33, adding, "We very much need your help as our most endangered Members and candidates go into the final stretch!!! Your support now could make or break a Republican majority next cycle!!!"

The NRCC seems willing to concede former Rep. Tom DeLay's (R-Texas) seat. Former Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas) has $1.7 million cash on hand and Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, the GOP nominee, is not on the ballot, running an uphill write-in campaign.

Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who heads the NRCC and is in a tight race with Democrat Jack Davis, is not on the Final Push list.

Reynolds has repeatedly said there will be three dozen hotly contested House races this fall, but polls suggest the universe of competitive contests is closer to 50. Most political experts anticipate Democrats will win the necessary 15 seats to gain control of the lower chamber, with some predicting they could gain a net of 30 seats.

Some Republicans who made the NRCC cut already enjoy significant cash advantages over their opponents. Rep. Geoff Davis (R-Ky.) has $1.65 million in the bank compared to his adversary, former Rep. Ken Lucas (D-Ky.), with over $380,000 cash on hand. Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R-Colo.), also on the list, has a three-to-one cash advantage over her opponent.

Peter Roskam, the GOP nominee to replace retiring Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) is on the list, even though he has $1.5 million to play with while Democrat Tammy Duckworth has just over $200,000.

These numbers do not include the infusion of cash to candidates from the NRCC and DCCC.

Joe Negron, who is seeking to fill ex-Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) seat, needs 16th district voters to punch in Foley's name in order for him to win. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) publicly conceded that Republicans are unlikely to win this race, but the NRCC nonetheless has Negron on its list.

The four Democrats that the NRCC is targeting in its Final Push are Reps. John Barrow (Ga.), Melissa Bean (Ill.), Leonard Boswell (Iowa), and Jim Marshall (Ga.). Independent political analysts say Republicans will be fortunate to win one of these races.

Earlier this year, NRCC was targeting Reps. John Spratt (D-S.C.) and Alan Mollohan (D-W. Va.). Republicans now appear to be throwing in the towel on those races by pulling back ads on these two Democrats and not targeting them in their Oct. 19 document.

Open seats that the NRCC is not making a final push for include the competitive contests for retiring Reps. Bob Beauprez (R-Colo.) and Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) as well as Rep. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who is running for the Senate. Peter Welch, the Democrat seeking to win Sanders' seat, enjoys a major cash-on-hand advantage over Republican Martha Rainville.

Patru said Rainville is "where she needs to be in fundraising." Rainville's campaign did not return a phone call seeking comment.

The NRCC is concerned about the open seat of retiring Rep. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.). Even though Bush won the district with 66 percent in 2004, GOP candidate Doug Lamborn is struggling and trails the money race to Democrat Jay Fawcett. Hefley has refused to endorse Lamborn, criticizing how Lamborn ran his campaign in the GOP primary. Lamborn was included on the Final Push list.

Similarly, Bush won 68 percent in Idaho's first district, but NRCC wants more resources put into the race. Retiring Rep. Butch Otter (R-Idaho) is running for governor and GOP nominee Bill Sali has struggled to gain traction against political neophyte Larry Grant.

Political observers say that House Republicans are headed for a long election night if they have to worry about seats in these two conservative districts.

DOJ_NMG_0086191

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokesman Bill Burton said, “This list makes clear they have finally caught up with the reality that even in places so Republican that George Bush received 60-70 percent of the vote, their candidates are deeply endangered.”

Of the 33 races on the GOP list, nine are open-seat contests.

A leadership aide familiar with the NRCC Final Push initiative said it has raised $2 million.

Upping The Dosage Fearing A Democratic Victory, Drug Makers Fund Key Races (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

HERSHEY, Pa. -- Few businesses have more at stake in next month's congressional elections than pharmaceutical makers. Assailed by Democrats, drug companies are pouring millions of dollars into close races, giving some Republicans a financial edge. In the process, the industry is becoming not just a campaign backer, but also a campaign issue.

Pennsylvania Republican Rick Santorum is a big beneficiary of the industry's push. He was a leading proponent of the 2003 law that gave seniors Medicare coverage for prescription drugs, and helped shape the law in ways that benefited the industry. Battling to keep his seat in a crucial Senate race, Mr. Santorum's campaign has received almost $500,000 from pharmaceutical interests and their employees, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan research group. The industry has also helped fund television advertisements and aided get-out-the-vote efforts.

Mr. Santorum's opponent, state treasurer Bob Casey Jr., regularly attacks the Medicare program as "a giveaway to Big Pharma," in part because it bars the government from negotiating prices. He and many fellow Democrats say they will overhaul the benefit if they win control of Congress on Nov. 7. Not surprisingly, Mr. Casey counts just $11,850 in contributions from pharmaceutical interests.

Companies and business groups have long thrown money at candidates to further their interests. But with a Democratic victory increasingly likely, few recent elections have been so critical, particularly for the drug industry. On the campaign trail, Democrats frequently lump "Big Pharma" with "Big Oil" in attacking Republican ties to industry. Within the first 100 hours of taking over the House, promises House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, Democrats will rewrite the prescription-drug benefit to take away most of the advantages it handed to pharmaceutical companies.

HOUSE PAYMENTS

1

Businesses are pouring unprecedented sums into this year's midterm congressional elections. Take a look at several key donors2. · Center for Responsive Politics3

"It'll take five minutes" to make the biggest change of all -- the proposal to let the government negotiate prices, Ms. Pelosi told a group of about 100 retirees in Sunrise, Fla., earlier this month. She said the benefit was a product of "corruption, putting pharmaceutical companies and HMOs first at the expense of America's seniors."

Congressional Democrats propose lifting a ban on the broad-scale reimporting of inexpensive drugs and could toughen the drug-approval process. They've talked, too, of holding hearings into conflicts of interest among Republicans now working for the industry.

"All elections are important, but this one is probably more important than most, because of the threats to the Medicare drug benefit," says Ken Johnson, senior vice president of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the industry's trade group.

Through early September, drug-company political action committees had given about $8.7 million to campaigns, compared with $7 million for all of 2002, the last midterm election, according to CRP. Employee contributions are up, too, rising to about $5 million from $3.3 million four years ago. About 69% of the industry's campaign contributions are going to Republicans.

Other industries are also pouring money into races in the hopes of protecting their favored candidates. Oil and gas interests worry about a Democratic Congress axing subsidies and have spent $13.6 million on the campaign so far, of which 83% has gone to Republicans. For all of 2002, they and their employees contributed $14.8 million in hard-money donations. Montana's troubled Republican Sen. Conrad Burns is the second-biggest recipient of oil money, according to CRP. He supports drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and sits on the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

His opponent, state Sen. Jon Tester, hammers on the theme in debates and speeches. He opposes drilling in ANWR and advocates more government support for alternative energy sources, such as biofuels, as well as a greater use of coal, which is abundant in his state.

Electric utilities, fearing tougher environmental rules, have contributed $11.9 million, with 66% going to Republicans, compared with $12.8 million in 2002. Commercial banks, bracing for tighter lending standards, account for $19.2 million, 63% of which is going to Republicans. That's already more than 2002's $16.5 million.

DOJ_NMG_0086192

Despite campaign-finance laws designed to limit the influence of big business and unions, the 2006 midterm elections are on track to be the most expensive ever, costing about $2.6 billion, according to a new study by CRP. That compares with about $2.2 billion in 2002. Business interests account for about three-quarters of this year's contributions.

The Republican-controlled Congress has been kind to drug makers. As the prescription-drugs benefit was crafted, Republicans battled not just Democratic critics but also fiscal conservatives in their own party who opposed creating the expensive government program.

Congressional Republican leaders prevented Medicare from negotiating prices with the industry. They also killed a proposal that would have allowed the government to offer its own coverage in competition with those sold by private companies. The industry successfully argued that the government's clout would mess up prices and stifle innovation.

Sen. Jim Talent of Missouri benefited from $900,000 in ads this year touting his role in the prescription-drug benefit, according to a tally by Americans United for Change, a liberal advocacy group with close ties to congressional Democrats. Mr. Talent made a similar pitch in two TV ads as well as in a recent debate with his Democratic challenger, Claire McCaskill.

Ms. McCaskill attacked the drug companies -- and by extension Mr. Talent -- in a recent ad, saying, "it's a senator's job to always put our seniors before big drug companies and Washington special interests."

In previous years, PhRMA, the industry's trade group, has come under fire for its political activities. In 2002, it was criticized for funding TV ad campaigns run by relatively small and little-known nonprofit groups.

PhRMA's president, former Louisiana Republican Rep. Billy Tauzin, says he wants the group to become less confrontational to increase its effectiveness. This year, the industry is working through the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The chamber's TV ads cost about $10 million, according to chamber officials. While the drug industry hasn't disclosed its share, Mr. Tauzin says it has contributed to the effort. The chamber's last-minute get-out-the-vote effort, which will include emails, fliers and phone banks, will focus on the drug benefit, among other issues, and will cost another $10 million or so.

Pennsylvania is one of the biggest battlegrounds in this year's political drug wars. It has a large concentration of seniors -- second only to Florida -- so Medicare could play an outsized role in the state's campaigns. Seniors are also the most reliable voters and carry extra clout. While people 65 years and older make up 16% of the state's population, they cast more than a quarter of the ballots in 2002.

Pennsylvania is home to a number of pivotal races for both houses of Congress. Democrats need 15 seats to take control of the House and four of their most promising pickups are in Pennsylvania. In late July and early August, drug companies helped pay for the Chamber of Commerce's TV ads on behalf of the four endangered Republicans, thanking them for supporting the Medicare drug bill, even though one, Mike Fitzpatrick, wasn't serving when Congress passed the benefit.

In the Senate, a swing of six seats would tip the balance of who's in charge. Strategists from both parties consider Mr. Santorum one of the Democrats' best targets.

In the campaign, both Mr. Santorum and his opponent are playing up the senator's central role in crafting the Medicare drug benefit. He's the biggest recipient of pharmaceutical money, according to CRP, up from 15th last time he ran in 2000.

"We support folks who agree with us on the issues, and he's been a strong and good supporter," PhRMA's Mr. Tauzin says of Mr. Santorum.

Mr. Casey and his backers have tried hard to use that against Mr. Santorum in the race. Speaking on the sunny front porch of a Clarion, Pa., bed-and-breakfast in August, Mr. Casey lashed out at one of the benefit's most-criticized features -- the "donut hole." The basic plan requires people whose drug costs reach $2,250 to start paying their own bills for the year, until they've spent a total of $3,600, although in practice many of the private-sector insurers providing the benefit have reduced or eliminated the donut hole.

Democrats want to fill the gap with savings earned from allowing the government to negotiate prices with the industry. Many Republicans oppose that move.

Mr. Casey told the crowd of about 100 that the donut hole is "a symbol of the White House and the Congress' failure to enact a real prescription-drug plan for older Americans."

An anti-Santorum advocacy group called the Lantern Project -- with funding from big Pennsylvania Democratic donors -- ran $800,000 of ads over the past year criticizing Mr. Santorum, including one that sniffed: "No wonder the drug lobby gave Santorum committees half a million dollars."

A spokeswoman for Mr. Santorum, Virginia Davis, says the senator supports the drug industry for policy reasons, not political ones. She says he opposes drug importation on safety grounds, for example, and also notes that Pennsylvania is home to about 200,000 pharmaceutical-industry jobs.

On the stump, Mr. Santorum cites the drug benefit as one of his leading accomplishments. At a Harrisburg luncheon in August, he noted that Pennsylvania's Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell had said the senator "delivers." Mr. Santorum ticked off the reasons why, starting with "the Medicare bill that we passed that [includes] language in there that saves Pennsylvania almost $200 million a year."

DOJ_NMG_0086193

At a September appearance before the Pennsylvania Chamber of Business and Industry in Hershey, Mr. Santorum argued that the program is helping not only retirees, but also businesses dealing with rising health-care costs. It also provides "a very generous benefit" for seniors, especially in combination with state aid, he said in an interview. "I wrote it to do that."

Drug companies helped fund the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's TV ad campaign, which featured gauzy images of happy, active seniors, as well as photos of Mr. Santorum and luminous blue pills in a pharmacist's tray.

Under new federal campaign-finance restrictions, those TV ads had to stop by early September. The chamber's get-out-the-vote mail pieces aren't covered by that law and in the campaign's final days they will tout the prescription-drug benefit. One shows a gray-haired woman in a sweater chatting with her smiling pharmacist. On the other side, a picture of Mr. Santorum is superimposed on a spreading oak tree in full autumn glory. The text urges recipients to "vote for Rick Santorum November 7th."

Polling by the Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonprofit research group focused on health care, showed a sharp turnaround in seniors' views of the program between late 2005 and mid-2006. In December 2005, 50% of seniors said they had an unfavorable impression of the program while just 28% viewed it favorably. By June, after the signup period ended, the unfavorable rating had fallen to 30% and the favorable rating had risen to 32%.

By midsummer, the Kaiser poll showed, about eight out of every 10 seniors who had signed up said they were satisfied with their plans. That result has been confirmed by other polls.

Whether or not this will help Mr. Santorum is far from clear. Recent polls show that while the chamber ads helped Mr. Santorum close the gap with Mr. Casey, he continues to trail by anywhere from five to 13 percentage points.

Trio Of Linked Districts Could Make Florida Pivotal To House Takeover (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, October 25, 2006

SARASOTA, Fla. – Republican House candidate Vern Buchanan laced up his rented hot pink and yellow shoes, straightened his ailing back and rolled the heavy ball down the lane. Veering too far left, it caromed off a bumper, and an otherwise-gutterball knocked over seven of 10 pins.

Just as he had intended, Buchanan joked: “That’s that turn I had on the end.”

This campaign season, Buchanan and fellow Florida Republicans are facing another late turn of events on which they had no designs. What have been the top two battleground districts in the state – Buchanan’s 13th and Rep. Clay Shaw’s (R) 22nd – both border former Rep. Mark Foley’s (R) south Florida district, and the month-old scandal surrounding Foley’s communications with House pages has thrown a wrench in the final month of the campaign, Buchanan said.

Foley’s 16th District, now a tight battle between Democrat Tim Mahoney and Republican Joe Negron, lies in south Florida between the Sarasota-based 13th on the west coast and the Fort Lauderdale-based 22nd on the east coast. The Democrats hope to turn the three of them into a blue belt across the peninsula, chipping away at the Republicans’ 18-7 House advantage in this very purple battleground state.

The three would go a long way toward a possible Democratic majority in Congress, and Florida could rival states like Indiana and Ohio, which have long been considered prime pickup territory for the Democrats, as an impact state in 2006.

Two years ago, no race in Florida was decided by fewer than double digits. This year, as many as five seats could be in play, including long shots in Rep. Ric Keller’s (R) 8th District and retiring Rep. Michael Bilirakis’s (R) 9th.

According to a poll released yesterday by Buchanan’s Democratic opponent, Christine Jennings, the 13th is likely to flip in two weeks. Jennings leads Buchanan 52-41 in the poll, which mirrors a previous Jennings poll that had her up 50-38.

Both polls came out since the Foley scandal broke in late September. Buchanan actually broaches the Foley issue unsolicited while talking with reporters, saying it makes things tougher for him with the story frequently in the local media.

The same day he bowled alongside Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) at Sarasota Lanes here last week, the Sarasota Herald-Tribune broke the story about the clergyman who allegedly abused Foley.

“It’s more local because I share a county with him,” said Buchanan, adding that the Foley scandal killed the momentum he felt coming out of the House Republican Conference in Washington in late September: “I thought we had a positive session, and unfortunately instead of talking about that, we end up talking about the Mark Foley thing.”

While Buchanan faces Jennings in an open-seat battle to replace Senate candidate Rep. Katherine Harris (R), Shaw has been ensconced in his seat for 26 years. And while Buchanan calls his race vital to Republicans maintaining control of the House, Shaw shrugs at the notion that Republicans need a strong showing in Florida to stay in power.

DOJ_NMG_0086194

In fact, Shaw said he doesn't even understand why there is such a fuss about this race. After he won by 600 votes in 2000, redistricting bolstered the Republican advantage in his district. He beat a well-funded challenger 61-38 the following election and won by 28 points in 2004.

Still, a Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel poll released Saturday shows Shaw ahead of Democrat Ron Klein by a slim margin, 48-43, with a 4 percent margin of error. And despite the redistricting, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) won by the same 52-48 margin then-Vice President Al Gore carried in the 2000 presidential election.

"I'm delighted to think that national politics is going to be determined by this district, because I'm going to win," Shaw said. "It's closer than I'd like it to be, but we're not going to have to stay up till 1 o'clock in the morning to find out who won."

One shouldn't mistake Shaw's verbal confidence for over-confidence, however. Klein has raised the third-most money among House challengers at $3.2 million, and Shaw has been a step ahead of him almost every quarter, bringing in $3.9 million.

Shaw has also grown fond of invoking his work with former President Clinton in the 1990s to illustrate his bipartisan credentials.

With Clinton in town for a Klein fundraiser on Friday, Shaw ran a radio ad noting his work with the ex-president. In a debate Friday in Palm Beach, Shaw seemed to be almost longing for Clinton's tenure, repeatedly bringing up the bills he passed and Clinton signed.

"Tonight, President Clinton is coming to town to help his political party," Shaw said at the debate, turning to Klein. "Ron, give him my best."

Klein said Shaw can say what he wants about the former president but that it's simply an effort to "minimize the nasty partisan environment" currently in Washington. He said he mentioned Shaw's strategy to Clinton at a rally several hours after the debate.

"He said, 'Well tell him that's all fine and good, but look what happens when Republicans get in total control: they run the country off the edge,'" Klein said. "So I don't exactly consider that to be a badge of honor."

The 13th District isn't as evenly split, with President Bush winning 56-43 in 2004. Harris has won by 10 points each of the past two elections, but neither included a Democratic opponent who could compete with her financially.

Jennings, for that matter, isn't close to competing financially with Buchanan either. With a net worth reported at more than $50 million, he has plugged nearly $4.5 million of his own money into the campaign. With $4.9 million in receipts, his was the richest House campaign in the country, including incumbents, after the third quarter.

Buchanan's self-funding has made the race to replace Harris is the second-most expensive in the country, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, with Shaw's race third.

Jennings raised a comparatively paltry $1.3 million by the end of the third quarter. But with the support of groups like Emily's List and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, she said she is more than able to compete in the current environment.

"If the incumbents don't know it and if the people running this country don't realize how distressed the American people are with a do-nothing Congress, I don't know what it would take," Jennings said.

GOP Incumbents Use Tough Underdog Tactics (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, October 25, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio – Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) mounted a flatbed truck outside a downtown office building last week with a bullhorn in hand and Van Halen blaring to challenge her Democratic opponent to a debate.

Her opponent, Mary Jo Kilroy, was miles away at the time, but the stunt is another example of the guerrilla tactics Pryce has embraced this fall as she fights for her political life. Such campaign tactics are usually employed by challengers, not senior leadership officials.

The fourth-ranking Republican in the House is one of the many veteran lawmakers running like an underdog this campaign season. In this environment, Pryce's biggest asset – her leadership post chairing the Republican Conference – has also become a liability.

"For me, it's been a double-edged sword," Pryce said from her campaign headquarters during halftime of the Ohio State-Indiana football game last Saturday. "It's really helped me be able to deliver for this community, but it's also made it easier for the moniker of Bush Rubber Stamp to stick."

Pryce joins National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) and a number of other senior GOP lawmakers who face serious challenges for the first time in years.

Meanwhile, freshman Reps. Geoff Davis (R-Ky.), Mike Fitzpatrick (R-Pa.) and Mike Sodrel (R-Ind.) are performing well in their own tight reelection fights because of the battles they fought just two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0086195

The expanding field of veteran Republicans in serious danger this October is further evidence of a national wave that appears to be cresting this fall, imperiling the GOP's majorities in both chambers. In some cases, this eroding political landscape has made seniority a millstone rather than an advantage.

The Wave – Both National and Statewide

In Cincinnati, about 100 miles down I-71 from Columbus, Rep. Steve Chabot (R), who came to Congress as part of the historic class of 1994, is one of the many members trying to avoid a similar wave this year in his closely contested rematch with Democrat John Cranley.

On a gray, blustery afternoon outside Paul Brown Stadium on the north bank of the Ohio River, Chabot shook hands with Bengals fans heading into Cincinnati's game with the Carolina Panthers. Wearing a blue blazer over a white Bengals jersey, the six-term incumbent stood with a lone volunteer who hoisted a red, white and blue Chabot-for-Congress sign and another who passed out stickers.

A few yards away, closer to the stadium, Cranley, who also wore a white Bengals jersey over his blue oxford shirt, gleefully shook hands with fans as a team of volunteers flanked him on either side holding blue and neon-yellow Cranley-for-Congress signs.

"This has been the best reaction yet," Cranley said as he bounced from one foot to the other and blew on his hands to warm them against the cold wind. "Now I get a lot of people coming up to shake my hand instead of me approaching them."

Later that day, during a Lions Club pig roast in rural Butler County, Chabot dismissed the effects of a national wave on his own campaign.

"We're not focused on the overall national environment," Chabot said in the smoky assembly hall, surrounded by predominantly Republican voters.

Whatever the drag President Bush and Congress have become this election cycle, incumbent Republicans in Indiana, Kentucky and Ohio have felt the effect of unpopular governors.

In Ohio, Chabot, Pryce and other Republican lawmakers must also overcome the flagging campaigns of gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell and Sen. Mike DeWine (R), who both appear to be losing ground against more popular Democratic opponents.

Similarly, Pennsylvania Rep. Melissa Hart (R) seems to be struggling against the strength of campaigns by Ed Rendell, the popular Democratic governor, and Bob Casey Jr., the Democratic state treasurer who looks poised to knock off Republican Sen. Rick Santorum.

The NRCC surprised many observers last week by dropping $170,000 on TV ads in Hart's Pittsburgh-area district criticizing her Democratic opponent, Jason Altmire, an administrator for a local hospital chain. The buy was viewed as a clear sign that the race is much closer than it was expected to be, and Hart's opponent believes the incumbent's perceived inactivity is a big reason the race is competitive.

"I think she made a tactical error by not going up [on television] earlier," Altmire said last week from the booth of an Eat N' Park just off the Pennsylvania Turnpike.

The Freshman

In the struggle to raise money, Davis, Fitzpatrick and Sodrel have become the most prolific fundraisers in their class, thanks in large part to competitive seats.

Davis has raised over $3.2 million for the cycle as compared with the over $1.1 million former Rep. Ken Lucas (D-Ky.) raised in his bid to bounce the Kentucky freshman after a single term.

In the rematch – Lucas narrowly survived a challenge by Davis in 2002 – the Republican Davis had more than $1.2 million in cash-on-hand as of the Sept. 30 filing deadline, and his campaign expects to report in excess of $475,000 from the period between Sept. 30 and Oct. 18, which should allow him to maintain a much stronger television presence in each of the district's four media markets.

Beyond fundraising, incumbency also has its disadvantages.

"Time management is one of the biggest challenges," Sodrel said over his breakfast of biscuits and gravy at the recently opened Big Daddy's Bar-B-Q in Aurora, Ind. "There is an advantage to being a challenger because you can be a candidate 100 percent of the time."

Leader on the ropes

In these final stages of the campaign, Pryce is relying on the fruits of incumbency by highlighting money she has appropriated for the district and using her connections in Washington and the district to help turnout the vote.

Her volunteers back in the Beltway work a phone bank from the Republican National Committee (RNC) every Wednesday night on her behalf, and many of her conference staffers are expected to travel to Ohio for the last weeks of the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0086196

Pryce volunteers canvassed her upscale Columbus neighborhood last Saturday, passing out absentee ballots using micro-targeted data compiled by the RNC.

The challenge for GOP organizers is to ensure that these likely supporters actually vote. The negative environment, particularly the spate of negative ads, could undermine those efforts.

Kilroy, whose campaign has agreed to a single debate that occurred earlier this month, said she has been "amused" by the incumbent's guerrilla campaigning. "It's a big switch from the game she was talking about the in the beginning when she was talking about my campaign as a nuisance."

Pryce, meanwhile, said she has been frustrated by Kilroy's perceived unwillingness to debate more frequently and attributes the tight contest to the national mood rather than the strength of her opponent.

The conference chairwoman laments not running television commercials in previous cycles, but she did not say she would bow out of the leadership if she hangs on this fall.

"I think this [reelection campaign] will be the biggest challenge," Pryce said. "We'll cross that bridge when we come to it."

Jackie Kucinich contributed to this article.

Hayworth Goads Mr. Nice Guy Into Fight In Arizona-5 (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, October 25, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. – When Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.) took the podium from Newt Gingrich at a fundraiser here last week, the decibel level doubled.

"Tell your friends! Tell your neighbors! Get them to the polls!" the 6-foot-5 former sportscaster bellowed into the microphone, employing the high-octane imperatives that have been his trademark in Congress.

At the same time, a dozen miles south, the Democratic candidate Harry Mitchell was also speaking to voters, but he used a decidedly different style. The avuncular former high school civics teacher and Tempe mayor was projecting a softer image to the Kiwanis Club of Tempe, making the race for Arizona's 5th Congressional District a contrast in styles. The contest pits a tough, boisterous Republican from upscale Scottsdale against an easygoing Democratic native son from a university town.

"I'm more low-key. I believe in building consensus and working toward compromise," Mitchell said Monday between fundraising calls. "J.D. is very aggressive, very loud. He's big. He'll invade your private space and I think that's how people view him."

Hayworth countered that Mitchell was too laidback to be effective.

"It's fine to try to project a quiet personality, [but] I walk to the talk and I get things done. If Harry were to go, he would go along to get along. He would be conspicuously inconspicuous."

In television ads and on the stump, the pair carve out stark differences in personality.

Mitchell, 66, sports an ear-to-ear smile, glasses and a grandfatherly gray comb-over. He portrays himself as friendly and accessible in campaign ads, appearing with children and senior citizens amid soft lighting and cheerful hues, a deliberate strategy, said one Democratic aide. He has pushed to make his support of embryonic stem-cell research a key distinction in the race. He welcomed Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) to a press conference on the issue last week.

He stresses his homegrown roots. His grandfather was a local developer for whom Mitchell Drive, Mitchell Park and the old Mitchell elementary school were named. He has lived in the same house in Tempe for over 40 years. He went to school at Tempe High, went to college just blocks away at Arizona State University (ASU), married his high-school sweetheart, then returned to his high school to teach. He spent 28 years there, simultaneously running for local offices. He served as mayor of Tempe for 16 years and earned such admiration that the town erected a 35-foot steel statue of him outside City Hall, which was renamed the Harry E. Mitchell Government Center. A local bar, Harry's Place, sits across the street.

"I think of him as your neighbor, the every-guy, the beloved ordinary guy," said Richard Herrera, associate professor of political science at ASU. "He's been a mayor but he's also a high school teacher. He's approachable and friendly. He's the opposite of J.D. Hayworth in that he's not bombastic. He's not somebody you would fear."

Hayworth, 48, with his buzz-cut, broad shoulders and booming voice, welcomes the tough-guy image, arguing that he delivers for his constituents. He is a vigorous campaigner with an uncanny memory for names and personal details that is rare even among seasoned politicians. His ads focus on cracking down on illegal immigration, showing him at a cattle ranch talking with worried residents. Images of border patrol vehicles, migrants slipping across the border and a high-speed dirt-road chase appear between jarring flashes of white and orange. One television ad, entitled "Gonna hurt," asserts that Mitchell favors allowing illegal immigrants to collect social security benefits.

That ad, coupled with other negative salvoes, aims to tarnish Mitchell's image as a popular Democratic mayor and "wonderful guy," said Bruce Merrill, a pollster and communications professor at ASU.

DOJ_NMG_0086197

"J.D.'s been very successful in the district. He's not a buffoon. He's really an intelligent guy and he's running pretty vicious attack ads against Harry," Merrill said.

In a district that leans Republican, that strategy can work. Outside of Tempe, Mitchell is less well-known.

The ads prompted Mitchell to retaliate with his own negative ads, pulling him away from his purely positive message. One Mitchell ad showed Hayworth apparently in the crosshairs of a firearm, prompting outrage from the Hayworth camp. Mitchell said he is not afraid of a brawl.

"J.D. is doing everything I expected because I was warned about the way he campaigns beforehand," Mitchell said. "But I am not taking it sitting down."

Recent independent polls show Mitchell gaining on Hayworth. A SurveyUSA poll commissioned by TV station KPNX showed Hayworth leading Mitchell 46 to 43 percent in mid-October, within the survey's margin of error. A similar survey by the same pollster a month earlier had Hayworth ahead by 12 points. During that time, however, Republicans across the country suffered political damage from the teenage page scandal involving former Florida congressman Mark Foley (R).

A Democratic poll conducted in mid-October showed Mitchell trailing by one point.

But Hayworth enjoys an ample lead in fundraising. According to recent disclosure reports, he raised $480,000 in the third quarter and ended with $1.35 million in the bank. Mitchell raised $320,000 and $570,000 in cash. National parties have been active on both sides.

And Hayworth could still use Mitchell's easygoing persona against him.

"Harry is the nicest man you'll ever meet but no one would ever accuse him of being very dynamic," Merrill, the communications professor, said.

Chatting after the Gingrich fundraiser, Hayworth suggested that Mitchell, in the twilight of his career, would not care enough to deliver results.

"The voters will have a choice of who in his mind's eye views this seat in Congress as a reward for a long time in office or someone who says what he means and means what he says and will continue to make things happen," Hayworth said.

Mitchell called that charge "absolutely wrong."

"My whole concern is to represent this district. I'm not going to run for speaker or Senate," he said. Hayworth launched an unsuccessful campaign in 2002 to lead the House Republican conference. He has been mentioned as a contender for statewide office.

"My heart is in this very much, let me tell you, because I think it would not be good to return J.D. to Washington," Mitchell said. "I think he underestimates my desire to run."

Whether Hayworth has underestimated Mitchell is an open question. He sent surrogates to speak at an Oct. 17 forum before the National Council of Jewish Women. Jonathan and Irit Tratt, Jewish friends of Hayworth, struck a sour note with the elderly Jewish crowd, which booed and hissed when the Tratts first appeared, when they mentioned slain journalist Daniel Pearl to underscore the ongoing threat to Jews and when they suggested that Mitchell apologize for putting crosshairs in his ad. At one point, an exasperated Jonathan Tratt gave up.

"I don't have to speak on his behalf if you don't want me to."

"Good!" "Get off the stage!" the hecklers responded.

Though Weakened, New Orleans Lawmaker Is Ebullient And Defiant (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 24 — With a publicized federal bribery investigation bearing down on him and facing a tight race for the first time in 16 years, Representative William J. Jefferson might be expected to show signs of strain in his re-election campaign here.

Yet the elephant in the room is not crowding out Mr. Jefferson, a veteran Democratic politician who still maneuvers with relative ease in the world of New Orleans politics, which he has partly owned since his opponents in the Nov. 7 primary election were barely in high school.

Attracted by the congressman's new vulnerability, 12 challengers have crowded in. Mr. Jefferson dismisses them as "these people" who "think they have an opportunity."

Spurned by House colleagues in Washington and the butt of jokes over $90,000 that the F.B.I. says it found in his freezer, Mr. Jefferson is outwardly projecting confidence in the biggest challenge of a career that stretches over nearly 30 years.

Unlike other incumbents in trouble this year, though, his difficulties have nothing to do with national politics and everything to do with cascading accounts of chicanery that have made local headlines for months.

DOJ_NMG_0086198

Over the congressman's protests, the state Democratic Party endorsed his leading challenger, Karen R. Carter, a state representative with a reputation for seriousness.

Experts reckon that he and Ms. Carter are the likeliest in the field to wind up in a runoff in December, to be held if no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote, under the state's idiosyncratic election rules.

Though Mr. Jefferson may be unwanted by fellow Democrats, a warm reception is always just around the corner on his home turf, where a web of relatives and associates has extended for years into many corners of public life.

Questionable financial dealings are rarely a bar to high office in Louisiana. The culture of tolerance means that Mr. Jefferson, an eight-term congressman, cannot be counted out on Election Day, experts say. Even Mayor C. Ray Nagin has endorsed him for re-election.

"I'm praying for you, brother," a woman said to him recently in a coin laundry in a desolate shopping strip in the Gentilly section, throwing her arms around the congressman, as do others.

"I'm on your side!" Paula Felton, shopping at a grocery store, cried out. "Hang in there. Not to worry."

Angrily dismissing the cash in the freezer, a woman at the Guste Home housing project said, "If I want to carry them in a sock, that's my business."

Helen Lang, an activist who introduced Mr. Jefferson to a friendly audience at the project, said: "Let's not get bogged down in all this foolishness. I've been bumping in politics a long time. He's not one who's abused us."

Buoyed by this grass-roots support, Mr. Jefferson is waging an aggressive campaign, strongly criticizing Ms. Carter for having the backing of establishment financial powerhouses like the developer Joseph Canizaro and angrily deflecting questions about the federal inquiry.

"I don't talk about that stuff," he snapped in an interview. "That's for the lawyers."

In court documents, the Federal Bureau of Investigation says Mr. Jefferson took bribes, including the $90,000, in exchange for helping an obscure technology company obtain government contracts here and in Africa.

Documents and interviews have painted an unflattering portrait of a public figure assiduously working for financial advantage for himself and his family through his contacts.

In June, House Democrats voted to strip him of his assignment on the House Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Jefferson, promising a yet-to-be-given "honorable explanation," has denied all wrongdoing and, comparing himself to other accused African-American congressmen, predicted legal vindication and political victory.

His visit to the semiabandoned Gentilly shopping area, once a heartland of the black middle class, now severely diminished here, illustrated the promise and the problems of his struggle. On the one hand the reception was friendly.

"I'm going to vote for you, I'm going to vote for you, I'm going to vote for you," a barber in the strip repeated.

On the other hand, most of the stores were closed, 14 months after Hurricane Katrina, and not many shoppers were there at a prime time, Saturday morning.

"Working against him are the changed demographics," said Susan Howell, a political scientist at the University of New Orleans.

Mr. Jefferson is unlikely to win many white votes. A recent survey found that blacks in New Orleans have fallen to 46 percent of the population, from 67 percent before the hurricane.

Indeed, a white motorist yelled a derisive comment out her window at Mr. Jefferson's campaign workers as they waved signs while awaiting him on Saturday on Elysian Fields Avenue.

Mr. Jefferson may advance to the runoff, experts say, but beyond that his prospects are dim.

"He can't play the race card the way Nagin could," Ms. Howell said, referring to the mayor's re-election in May, "because he'll be in a runoff with an African-American, Karen Carter, who is a very respectable person and has a good reputation. He's going to have a whiter electorate than Nagin, and that's going to work totally for Karen Carter."

Mr. Nagin ran for re-election against a white candidate, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, in a racially charged contest that drew many black voters who continue to live out of town. The Congressional race is unlikely to draw a similar turnout.

Mr. Jefferson is hardly giving up. To the audience in the housing project, he identified their struggle to return to the city with his own.

"There's some folks who don't want to see us come back home," he said, and he infused his message with themes of faith, suffering and persecution.

At a candidates' forum in the French Quarter, he sharply criticized his opponents, insinuating that they had their own ethics problems while denying his.

"This business about electing ethical people," he said. "In this country, one is presumed innocent. I have not been charged with anything. I am, in fact, an innocent person."

DOJ_NMG_0086199

Ms. Carter responded, "There is only one candidate in this race who is under federal investigation, and it's not Karen Carter."

A Congressional Endorsement (NYT)

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

The most fundamental rule of democracy is that when elected officials fail repeatedly, voters throw them out of office. If the polls are anywhere near accurate, most Americans have concluded that the Republican Party — particularly the Republican majority in the House of Representatives — has failed egregiously. On Iraq. On ethics. On oversight of a reckless White House. But that conviction sometimes comes into conflict with the feeling that a good representative should be rewarded with re-election, without regard to party.

All of that brings us to Representative Christopher Shays, a Republican from Connecticut's Fourth District. Mr. Shays has been in office for nearly 20 years, during which his state has grown increasingly Democratic. This year his race with Diane Farrell, a former first selectwoman of Westport, is regarded as one of the tightest in the nation.

The Times has endorsed Mr. Shays in every race in which he has faced a serious opponent. While this page has disagreed with him on many issues — from tax cuts for the wealthy to warrantless wiretapping — we have admired his independence and respected his leadership on issues like campaign finance reform.

Still, as his party has moved to the right, Mr. Shays has taken more and more stands with which we have profound disagreement. His position on immigration reform is far closer to the crabbed, xenophobic stance of the House Republicans than the fairer, bipartisan approach of the Senate. During the campaign, his remarks about the treatment of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison — which he minimized as "something less than torture" — were disturbing.

Ms. Farrell, Mr. Shays's opponent, is an excellent candidate. After eight years as first selectwoman, she has a better understanding than most legislators of the impact of federal mandates and tax policy on local government. She is smart and articulate, and her positions on the issues are extremely well thought-out.

When Ms. Farrell first challenged Mr. Shays two years ago, The Times chose to endorse him as a rare voice for moderation within a Republican caucus that seemed bent on distracting the electorate with assaults on gay marriage, flag burning and abortion while running up the deficit, encouraging a ruinous war in Iraq and supporting a White House bent on exalting the power of the president at the expense of the Constitution.

Now it is time to draw the line. Mr. Shays may be a beacon of integrity, but if he is re-elected, he will vote to continue House control by a party that has repeatedly sold out the country to special-interest lobbyists. His position on Iraq, which has gone through tortuous re-evaluations, now seems basically sensible. But if he is re-elected, he will support a Republican leadership that has refused to question even the most ruinous decisions by George Bush, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld about the conduct of American foreign policy.

Mr. Shays has been a good congressman, but not good enough to overcome the fact that his re-election would help empower a party that is long overdue for a shakeup. This decision is painful, but not difficult, given the high caliber of his opponent. With due respect for Mr. Shays's service, we strongly endorse Diane Farrell for Congress.

Taylor Still Holds Land (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 25, 2006

Public land records in Haywood County, N.C., show that a company registered to Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) owns 17 plots of land in the mountain community of Maggie Valley, an interest that tax records indicate is worth more than $500,000.

The records raise questions about an assertion Taylor made in an Oct. 12 statement, part of a strong public defense mounted by the House Appropriations "cardinal" after a Wall Street Journal report alleged this month that Taylor steered federal funds to projects that would benefit businesses in which he has an interest.

Taylor's statement was accompanied by a letter from his North Carolina attorneys that called for an apology and retraction from the Journal. Taylor is facing a well-funded Democratic election challenge from former pro football quarterback Heath Shuler.

Singling out 15 elements of the article that Taylor characterized as "innuendos and false statements," the lawmaker wrote that he owns no holdings in two residential subdivisions located in his district's picturesque Maggie Valley area.

"There is no development called Maggie Valley Leisure Estates," Taylor wrote, referring to a subdivision mentioned in the article. "A large development in Maggie Valley is called Wild Acres," Taylor added, where he held land 36 years ago but sold it "over 20 years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0086200

Haywood County land records still list a company called Maggie Valley Leisure Estates, Inc., founded 36 years ago by Taylor and two partners, as the owner of 17 land parcels. Fourteen of those plots are situated in the Wild Acres development and one is situated in a development named Maggie Valley Leisure Estates, according to land maps posted by the county.

Two area Realtors also use the MVLE name to offer online listings for homes in that development.

The North Carolina Secretary of State's office, which records business registrations, has no record of any sale of Taylor's interest in Maggie Valley Leisure Estates Inc., according to its website. The company's registered address with that office and Haywood County is a post office box used by Taylor in county board of elections and Federal Elections Commission filings.

Taylor attorney Robert Long Jr., who drafted the letter to the Journal, said Maggie Valley Leisure Estates' holdings in the Wild Acres area were unfit for residential development. Long referred to the 17 plots as "worthless" and "remnants," adding, "You couldn't build on it even if you tried."

Long said Maggie Valley Leisure Estates had sold the majority of its land in the area by 1990 and that the business was now defunct. Asked whether a development existed with the MVLE name, Long said "they may have called it that" in ensuing years.

The state's Department of Revenue suspended Maggie Valley Leisure Estates' charter in 2003, according to records, for failing to file annual corporate and franchise tax reports. The notification of that decision was sent to the same post office box used by Taylor that appears in county land records.

North Carolina revenue officials said suspended companies are not absolved of outstanding tax obligations, which could be as low as $35 a year if the business had no activity. Haywood County employees confirmed that the business is still a valid landholder despite its state corporate status.

The state keeps no records on the frequency of corporate suspensions. Two other companies incorporated by Taylor in the 1980s with his wife as director, Financial Guaranty Securities and Financial Guaranty Credit Life Corps., also were suspended in 2005 for failing to file tax reports.

"The acreage I have is not even close to [U.S. Highway] 19," which crosses through Maggie Valley, Taylor wrote later in his statement to the Journal.

Haywood County maps show that several of the land parcels owned by Maggie Valley Leisure Estates are within three miles of that highway. Another company, Gaybo, in which the lawmaker owns an interest worth as much as $250,000, according to his latest financial disclosure filing, maintains a 15-acre parcel of land located next to the highway, according to maps posted on the county's website.

Taylor's strongly worded defense comes in the thick of a hard-fought race between the wealthy lawmaker, whose estimated personal assets topped $50 million last year, and Shuler.

Taylor has spent heavily to keep his powerful perch as a senior appropriator, helping Shuler take the lead in cash on hand as of third-quarter fundraising reports. In addition to several ads bought by the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) – one of which assailed Shuler for a company bearing his name that was late in its tax payments – Taylor has taken out $1.6 million in personal loans to help his campaign.

Taylor also used the statement sent alongside his attorney's letter to blast Taxpayers for Common Sense (TCS), a nonpartisan watchdog group known for its exhaustive research into lawmakers' earmarks, for providing the Journal with corroborating information for its article.

TCS, Taylor wrote, "is neither an organization for taxpayers nor for common sense. It is a partisan, ultra-liberal organization whose report is produced in conjunction with the environmental extremist groups Friends of the Earth and U.S. PIRG."

TCS vice president Steve Ellis pointed out that the group has partnered with groups from both sides of the ideological spectrum, including the conservative-leaning Club for Growth and National Taxpayers Union, for previous efforts.

"Like an illusionist, [Taylor] is trying to divert public attention to his parade of irrelevant facts instead of concentrating on and answering to his dubious record," Ellis said in an Oct. 16 statement. "It's not too shocking that a senior appropriator is lashing out at a budget watchdog group. In fact, that is a good indication we are doing our job."

My Friend, Bob Ney (HILL)

By Ellen Ratner

The Hill, October 25, 2006

I happen to be a proud liberal, one who gets to spout off on 300 radio stations every day. I also represent the liberal point of view as a commentator on the Fox News Channel. I oppose the policies of the Bush administration and the Republican congressional leadership (give me at least a full afternoon, and I could begin to share some of the reasons why).

Yet even in the rancid atmosphere that passes for political interaction in Washington these days, one can occasionally reach across the partisan and ideological divide to form genuine friendships with those on the other side. Thankfully, that's what happened with me and my friend, Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio.

As Republicans distance themselves from him and Democrats use him as a campaign tactic, let me say that I'm heartbroken over what's happened to him.

I got to know Bob when, as a freshman congressman, he used to appear opposite me on radio programs in the Ohio River Valley. Most people know the region only from flying overhead or speeding through on Interstate 70, so the place bears description.

Bob grew up in Belmont County, along the Ohio-West Virginia border, in the area close to Wheeling that used to be called the "Steel Belt." Times were better then, as his dad, a TV cameraman, and his mother, a buyer for a local department store, raised him and his sister in a solidly working-class neighborhood. Today, 14 percent of Belmont County's residents live in poverty, 40 percent more than Ohioans as a whole. Incomes average 30 percent below the nation's, and homes sell for about 40 percent less than those statewide.

What first struck me about Bob was how much the poverty in his home region tore at him. This wasn't your typical Republican, nor did my reporter's nose pick up the cynical, "I-feel-your-pain" shallowness you often see in politicians on both sides of the aisle.

No, here was a guy who really did remember where he came from. He knew that the kids he'd grown up with couldn't afford to raise their children in quality housing, and he went to Washington determined to do something about it.

In the four years that he chaired the Subcommittee on Housing, he was relentless: 63 hearings, 22 housing bills signed into law. One bill he spearheaded helped 40,000 lower-income families buy their first homes; another renovated public housing units that had become badly dilapidated after decades of neglect.

The day he lost his House chairmanship he was conducting Katrina housing hearings in New Orleans. I called him to ask how he was feeling about losing the gavel. His reply: "I'm fine, I have a roof over my head and my family. These people in the Gulf have lost everything."

You probably won't read anywhere that Bob Ney spent his youth teaching English as a second language in pre-Khomeini Iran. He's a multi-faceted guy, the only member of Congress fluent in Farsi.

His politics were similarly nuanced and complex. He was one of only three Republicans to vote against the President's Patriot Act when it was first proposed in 2001, and he supported its curtailment five years later. "Everybody's against terrorism, but there has to be reason in the way that we fight it," he told reporters at the time. It was bold, courageous stuff from somebody whose district went 55 percent for Bush in 2000 and 57 percent for the president in 2004. I only wish some Democrats shared his courage.

Now, of course, he's pleaded guilty to corruption in office, but the Bob Ney I know refused even to use his title to get a good table at a local restaurant when the line was out the door. I only wish he'd had a chance to tell his side in a court of law — and, take it from me, there is another side to this.

Today's Justice Department, however, tries its evidence in the public press, not a courtroom, so it can't be challenged or cross-examined. Those accused of high-profile wrongdoing nowadays are put through a grueling and costly ordeal where they are held upside-down by overpriced criminal defense lawyers, who drop them on their heads once all the money has been shaken out of their pockets.

While I'm heartbroken about Bob and angry as hell about the Justice Department's slimy tactics, I don't worry about him. I know my friend will look at incarceration not as the end of the road, but as a detour, a long-overdue chance to seek help for the alcoholism that has taken over more and more of his life these past few years.

He'll be strong, and when all this is over, he'll be a better man, a better husband and father — and he'll still be my friend.

Ellen Ratner is Washington bureau chief for the Talk Radio News Service, and is a commentator on the Fox News Channel. All proceeds of her book,"Ready, Set , Talk!" co-authored by Kathie Scarrah, go to Hurricane Katrina relief.

Poll: Senate Within Dems' Grasp, But Pitfalls Remain (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Washington — Democrats are within range of capturing a Senate majority, but face potentially decisive resistance from rural voters in three critical Republican-leaning states, a series of Times/Bloomberg polls have found.

If Democrats can't break through to win the Senate races in at least two of those three states — Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia — they are unlikely to control the chamber.

DOJ_NMG_0086202

The surveys show Democrats leading in bids to claim hotly contested Republican-held seats in Ohio and Virginia. Republicans lead in Missouri and Tennessee, both also held by the GOP.

In the fifth race surveyed, Democrats maintain a slim advantage in New Jersey, where Republicans are pressing their strongest bid in this year's campaign to gain a Democratic seat.

Underscoring the election's volatility, the candidate leads in all of these contests fall within the margin of error for the polling.

Democrats need a net gain of six seats for a Senate majority. Polls in the other key Senate races show Democratic challengers holding consistent — though in some cases narrow — leads against GOP incumbents in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Montana.

If Democrats captured those three seats, won Ohio and held New Jersey, Senate control would hinge on the outcomes in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia.

If Democrats win two of these three races, they would have a 51-49 Senate majority. If they win just one, the Senate would be split 50-50 between the parties and Vice President Dick Cheney would provide the tie-breaking vote to organize the chamber for Republicans.

The new surveys underscore the trends creating opportunities for Democrats, particularly anxiety about the Iraq war and erosion of support for the GOP among centrists. But the poll findings also highlight the obstacles the Democrats face in converting the national current of discontent into gains in conservative-leaning states.

Especially challenging for Democrats is breaking the GOP grip on socially conservative voters in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. In each state, the surveys found that despite extensive doubts about the country's direction, the Republicans are still amassing strong margins among rural voters and whites who regularly attend church.

The Times/Bloomberg polls found that among likely voters:

. In Ohio, the Democratic challenger, Rep. Sherrod Brown, led Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, 47% to 39%.

. In New Jersey, Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez held an edge, 45% to 41%, over his GOP challenger, Tom Kean Jr.

. In Virginia, Democrat James Webb led Republican Sen. George Allen, 47% to 44%.

. In Missouri, Republican Sen. James Talent was ahead of Democrat Claire McCaskill, 48% to 45%.

. In Tennessee, Republican Bob Corker, the former mayor of Chattanooga, led Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., 49% to 44%, for the seat being vacated by a Republican, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

The polls, supervised by Times polling director Susan Pinkus, were conducted Friday through Monday. The surveys have a margin of error of plus or minus four percentage points in Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee, five percentage points in Virginia and 5.5 points in New Jersey.

In most of the states, the results were generally in line with other recent surveys. But in Virginia, this is the first major poll to show Webb leading Allen.

Democrats enjoy many of the same advantages across the five battlegrounds. Top among them are consistent strains of dissatisfaction with the country's direction and the war in Iraq.

In each of the states, three-fifths of the voters or more said they believe the country is on the wrong track. In each state, more voters said they preferred that Democrats rather than Republicans control a majority in Congress after the election.

These attitudes have created several openings for the Democratic Senate candidates.

For instance, each Democrat led among women voters (although the one woman candidate in the group, Missouri's McCaskill, held only a statistically insignificant one percentage point advantage over Talent).

All of the Democrats except Menendez enjoyed comfortable leads among urban voters. Ford, Menendez and Brown also had big advantages among suburban voters, while McCaskill and Webb ran about even with this key voting bloc.

The Democrats also polled well among those in the center of the electorate. Except for Menendez, each of the Democrats attracted support from three-fifths of those categorizing themselves as moderates.

But the polls found that enduring Republican strengths remain a huge barrier for Democrats, especially in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. In these states, the Republican coalition is somewhat chipping around the edges: in each, the GOP nominee is capturing a smaller share of support among conservatives than the Democrat is among liberals.

Even so, the surveys point toward substantial stability in the socially conservative electoral coalition that allowed Bush to carry each state in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections.

Among white men in Missouri, Talent led by 11 percentage points. In Virginia, Allen was ahead by 22 percentage points among this slice of the electorate and in Tennessee, Corker led by 24 points.

Among whites in Missouri who attend church once a week or more, Talent led McCaskill, 65% to 30%. In Tennessee, Ford has stressed his religious faith, but Corker also easily led among whites who regularly attend church, 62% to 29%. Webb in Virginia made a stronger showing among this voting group, trailing Allen 55% to 40%.

DOJ_NMG_0086203

Among rural voters in Virginia, Talent led McCaskill, 56% to 37%. Allen topped Webb, 60% to 33%, and Corker dwarfed Ford, 62% to 27%.

The large suburban population in northern Virginia places Webb in a better position to overcome these disadvantages than his Democratic counterparts in Tennessee and Missouri. But all three face a tough climb to victory if they do not improve their performance among these voting blocs by election day.

One of the most consistent trends in the surveys was the link between attitudes toward Bush and preferences in the Senate contests.

In each state, at least 80% of those who approve of Bush's job performance said they would support the GOP Senate candidate. Meanwhile, those who disapprove of Bush's performance preferred the Democratic candidates at rates ranging from 67% for Menendez to 81% for Ford and Webb.

These findings suggest one imperative for Democrats: especially in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia, they need to run as well among voters who disapprove of Bush's job in office as their Republican opponents do with those who approve of it.

Other poll results illustrated the long shadow Bush casts over the election. Democratic candidates enjoy their largest Senate leads in the two states where Bush's approval ratings are the lowest — 34% in New Jersey and 39% in Ohio.

Bush is in relatively better shape in the three states looming as the likely pivot of Senate control: his approval rating stands at 44% in Virginia, 47% in Missouri and 49% in Tennessee.

These numbers are weaker than the ones for Bush in the states as election day neared in 2004. In this campaign's final two weeks, perhaps the critical question is whether the president retains enough strength on terrain he once dominated to help Republicans hold back a tide that could end their control of the Senate.

GOP Pumps Money Into Mo., Va. Races (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 25, 2006

Republicans pumped money into Missouri and Virginia Senate races this week, part of a GOP strategy to cling to their Senate majority by fending off strong Democratic challenges in Republican-leaning states.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee purchased $1.4 million of television time to air an ad that portrays Democratic candidate Jim Webb as insensitive to women. The ad is the first investment by the Republican Party in the state, reflecting concern among Republican officials that incumbent Sen. George Allen is in a closer contest than they expected.

In Missouri, the Republican National Committee spent $1.78 million on Monday on ads opposing Missouri Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill, who is running against Republican Sen. James Talent. Missouri has been a target for both parties. Democrats have poured $6.37 million into the Senate race and Republicans have spent $5.39 million.

Flush from record September contributions, the parties are entering the final two-week stretch of the campaign with an election map in one hand and a checkbook in the other. Each party is countering the other's moves, putting ads on television, running phone banks and conducting polls.

Last week, Republicans spent $500,000 to run an ad in New Jersey against Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee responded by purchasing $2 million worth of air time to attack Menendez' challenger, Republican Tom Kean Jr.

The Republican ad against Webb in Virginia comes after the DSCC had already spent $1.72 million in the state.

The anti-Webb ad selects quotes from a 1979 article that Webb wrote for Washingtonian magazine where he said women are not fit to lead male soldiers and that the Naval Academy was a "horny woman's dream." During the campaign, Webb has said he now believes women can lead in combat.

"It looks like Chuck Schumer and Howard Dean have directed a lot of resources to Virginia to attack Senator Allen," said National Republican Senatorial Committee spokesman Dan Ronayne, referring to the chairman of the DSCC and the head of the Democratic National Committee. "We aren't going to stand idly by."

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer responded: "It clearly underscores the degree to which they are playing defense going into the final stretch of the campaign."

The party spending reflects some robust fundraising despite 2002 changes in campaign finance law that banned the collection of unlimited amounts of so-called "soft money" from unions corporations and wealthy individuals.

Campaign finance experts say the ability of the parties to exceed their previous fund raising levels is largely due to increased contribution limits in the 2002 law, commonly named after its two Senate sponsors, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis.

"There is no question that the political parties are raising far more contributions than most analysts thought would be possible under the McCain-Feingold law," Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner said.

DOJ_NMG_0086204

Toner said the higher contribution limits have permitted the "ultrawealthy" to donate a total of $100,000 to candidates and parties. The Internet has also allowed the parties to reach first-time givers at a fraction of the cost of direct mail or phone calls.

"Both parties have seen a steady climb of small donors," said Trevor Potter, a former FEC chairman who has defended the McCain-Feingold law in court.

Senate Could Be Evenly Split Once Again (AP)

By Jim Abrams

The Associated Press, October 25, 2006

Expected Democratic gains in the election raise the possibility that the Senate, for the second time in six years, will end up in a 50-50 tie.

If that happens, Democrats would like to revive a power-sharing deal that was struck in 2001. But partisan passions on Capitol Hill are stronger now than when President Bush took office promising to be "a uniter, not a divider."

Republicans would officially still be the majority party in an evenly divided Senate because Vice President Dick Cheney, in his role as president of the Senate, would give the GOP a tie-breaking vote. But Democrats would surely demand a greater role in determining how the Senate treated Bush's legislative agenda in his final two years in the White House.

Currently Republicans hold 55 seats and the Democrats 44. Sen. James Jeffords, an independent from Vermont who usually votes with the Democrats, is retiring at the end of this session.

The 2000 election resulted in a Senate split down the middle. Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota became majority leader for just 17 days, between Jan. 3, 2001, when the new Senate was sworn in and Al Gore was still vice president, and the Jan. 20 inauguration of Bush and Cheney.

In returning to the majority leader position, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., negotiated with Daschle a power-sharing arrangement under which the two parties got equal numbers of seats and staff positions on committees. Republicans chose committee chairmen and controlled the agenda on the Senate floor.

Lott took some heat from his Republican colleagues at the time for being overly generous to Democrats, but it paid off four months later when Jeffords bolted from the GOP and became an independent allied with the Democrats. That put the Democrats back in control with Daschle as majority leader.

The Lott-Daschle deal stayed intact until November 2002, when Republican James Talent defeated Missouri's appointed senator, Jean Carnahan, in a special election and Republicans regained power. They've held majorities on Senate committees since then.

This time, Democrats may need the help of two independents to reach parity with the Republicans.

Rep. Bernie Sanders, another Vermont independent, is the front-runner in the race to succeed Jeffords. Sanders has always been a member of the Democratic caucus in the House and his office said he would continue to support the Democrats in the Senate.

Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut appears likely to return to Congress as an independent after his loss to a Democratic challenger in the primaries. Lieberman, in line to become chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee if Democrats capture the Senate, is also committed to staying with the Democratic caucus, his office said.

Jim Manley, press spokesman for Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, said that in the event of a 50-50 breakdown the 2001 Lott-Daschle deal "should serve as a useful guidepost for any negotiations" on power-sharing between Reid and Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

But McConnell, the favorite to succeed retiring Sen. Bill Frist, R-Tenn., as Republican leader, and Reid would be negotiating in a far more partisan atmosphere than in 2001, when the new president and the Democrats were talking of cooperation and the idea of senatorial harmony wasn't quite so unattainable.

Much longer ago, the Senate was also deadlocked at 38-38 in 1881 when Republicans, in control of the White House, won the allegiance of a wavering independent by promising him the Agriculture Committee chairmanship. Republicans took over control of the major committees, while Democrats took advantage of GOP disarray to hold onto staff positions such as sergeant at arms and secretary of the Senate.

State legislatures have at times found more congenial ways to deal with ties. The Indiana House in 1988 created co-speakers who presided on alternate days. The Wyoming Senate in 1974 resolved a tie by flipping a coin.

All Eyes On South's Big Race (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 25, 2006

LOUDON, TENN.

DOJ_NMG_0086205

In a normal election year, Bob Corker would be the favorite to win the Tennessee Senate seat being vacated by the retiring Republican leader, Bill Frist. Mr. Corker is successful in business, experienced in government - most recently as mayor of Chattanooga - and affable in demeanor.

But this is not a normal year. The GOP's national image is in the tank over Iraq, scandals, and economic insecurity. A majority of Americans want the Democrats to take the reins of Congress. And Corker's opponent is Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) - the poster boy for dynamic, young politicians who are taking the national stage by storm.

History could be in the making. If he wins, Mr. Ford would be the first African-American from the South to take a Senate seat since Reconstruction - a victory that could nudge another ambitious black politician, Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois, toward running for president by showing him how to win in the South. As a Democrat comfortable talking about his faith, Ford could show Democrats of all colors how it's done.

A Ford victory could also provide the final seat the Democrats need to win control of the Senate, in a quest that seemed nearly impossible just a few months ago.

It's no wonder "you've got ... press from all over the country, right here on the courthouse steps in Loudon County," Mr. Corker marveled before a crowd of supporters last Sunday afternoon in this small town south of Knoxville, the leaves overhead turning a brilliant shade of Volunteer orange.

Corker knows he can't compete with the 36-year-old Ford on looks or charisma. He says so. But after falling behind in the polls and replacing his campaign manager late in September, he has now settled on his final argument to the people of Tennessee: Vote for me because of my experience and my maturity and because I'm the "real Tennessean."

Corker, his campaign, and national Republicans have also worked hard to drive up Ford's negatives, highlighting some of his relatives' legal troubles, a life spent mostly away from Tennessee, a career in politics, and his bachelor, designer-suit lifestyle.

Ford was elected to represent Tennessee's Ninth Congressional District 10 years ago, following his father, Harold Ford Sr., who held the seat for 22 years.

Now both campaigns say the race is a statistical tie. The sprint to the finish has begun. Ford's message on the stump

Ford's stump speech follows many paths. He has been chiding Corker for saying the US should "stay the course" in Iraq, and on healthcare, and on education, even though Corker distanced himself from "stay the course" months ago, long before President Bush himself did. He calls for the partitioning of Iraq into three areas. He calls for energy independence. He promises, "I won't be 100 percent Democrat; I'm for what's right."

He praises Presidents Truman and Reagan for establishing an American moral authority that was "unquestioned, unassailed." And he makes the pitch for change. "I say it's time for a new direction, a new generation," he says.

Before and after each event, he dispenses hugs easily and poses for countless photographs, pushing his schedule hopelessly behind - like the Democrats' last great campaigner, Bill Clinton.

Ford speaks in the cadence of a Southern preacher, starting slow and building to a crescendo. The references to God and the Bible flow naturally. "When people ask me around this state and around the country, 'How are you guys doing so well?' I say there's a couple reasons - one, we got a big God that we serve...." he says. Voices in the crowd shout back, "All right!" before he can get to point No. 2.

On this Saturday of campaigning around the Nashville area, with popular Democratic Gov. Phil Bredesen at his side, the crowd at each stop is enthusiastic and diverse.

In Gallatin, Tenn., with his largest African-American crowd of the day, he gives the most expansive excursion that day into his religious life. "I learned to go to church the old-fashioned way - I was forced to," he quips, a line he uses in the campaign ad he filmed in his childhood Baptist church in Memphis.

He talks about driving by the Little Rebel Bar and Grill in Jackson, Tenn., one day and how "my God is telling me to stop by" - despite the Confederate flags on the trucks outside. He recalls the words of the pastor he had just met: "There are more answers than problems, and there are more Davids than Goliaths." Ford and his driver walk in and, he says, "a lady got off the stool and gave me a big hug and said, 'Baby, we've been waitin' on you to come by.' "

The racial dimension of the Ford-Corker contest looms large. Pollsters speak of a race effect on surveys- that is, shave off a few percentage points from the black candidate's total, since some white voters tell pollsters what they think they want to hear, that they're willing to vote for a black candidate when in reality they're not.

One Republican activist in Tennessee, who asked not to be identified, says he believes the racial aspect will be a wash in this race: Some whites won't vote for a black man, but turnout in the black community, 16 percent of the electorate, will be higher than usual.

Furthermore, says the activist, "this is a Southern state, but it's not a deep South state, so everything that applies to the South, you can cut a little bit."

DOJ_NMG_0086206

Linda Boyd, a computer assistant in the Clarksville, Tenn., schools who is African-American, says she's been out canvassing for Ford and had people tell her they would never vote for him. "I know what they mean," she says.

Ford's big, political family - some of whom have been prosecuted for corruption - may also hurt him. At the Corker event in Loudon, some of those attending said that even if Ford himself isn't corrupt, he benefits from his family's activities. But among Ford fans, his big, political family is a plus. "The Fords are fighters," says Mary Hoskins of Clarksville. And she's not concerned about some Fords' legal troubles. "Everyone's got someone in their family," she says.

And what about Ford's life outside Tennessee? After his father's first term in Congress, he moved the family to Washington, where Harold Jr. was enrolled at the same elite prep school, St. Albans, that another son of Tennessee, Al Gore, had attended. Ford then attended the University of Pennsylvania and University of Michigan Law School, and at age 26 was elected to Congress. Corker's profile

Corker, in contrast, was born in South Carolina, moved to Tennessee at age 11, and has lived here ever since. In an interview, Corker calls Ford "a nice young man," but adds that "I just know that I more fully represent the values of this state."

After Corker won the primary, against two more-conservative Republicans, he set out to portray Ford as a liberal, but it didn't work. Ford is one of the most conservative members of the Congressional Black Caucus. He opposes gay marriage, so-called partial birth abortion, and what he calls "amnesty for illegals."

Corker, a moderate Republican who at one time supported abortion rights, may have trouble inspiring Christian conservatives to turn out for him. Even though the National Right to Life Committee has endorsed Corker, Tennessee Right to Life has refused.

"That sends a signal to some people," says the Republican activist. "Tennessee Right to Life isn't huge, but in a close election, every vote counts." An expensive contest

And in a close election, with control of the Senate on the line, both parties are spending millions of dollars on ads, some of them suggestive and nasty, leading the candidates to call on their parties to take them down. In a preemptive move, Ford showed up at the Memphis airport last Friday and confronted Corker right before the Republican was due to give a press conference. The Corker campaign has been publicizing the dustup ever since, saying it shows Ford's lack of maturity.

The wealthy Corker also has the option of writing another large check to his campaign. If he does so in the final days, that would make it difficult for Ford to invoke the federal "millionaire's clause," which allows Ford to raise more money from his donors.

Still, the larger forces at play in the campaign haven't changed. "The combination of facing a strong Democrat who's moderate and a year that isn't particularly kind to Republicans - Corker may just lose this thing," says John Geer, a political scientist at Vanderbilt University in Nashville. "But I'm not prepared to make any predictions."

A Contentious Campaign In A Battleground State (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

COALMONT, Tenn. -- John Layne is a 57-year-old white Republican with a long gray beard, no job and advancing emphysema. He arrived an hour early to hear Harold Ford Jr. speak in this struggling mountain town.

"Oh, sure, there's some prejudice," Layne said as he contemplated casting a ballot for a black man. "I wouldn't want my daughter marrying one." But he's more concerned about rising medical costs: When it comes to voting, "you gotta look at the person, not the color."

Ford announced his Senate campaign 18 months ago with three strikes against him: He was a Democrat, he was black, and he carried family baggage. The five-term congressman was wildly popular in his Memphis House district and was viewed as a rising star in the Democratic Party. But statewide office seemed beyond reach in Tennessee, a state with a history of racially divided voting where Republicans had won recent Senate races.

Now this political curiosity has become one of the most intense and bitter contests of the season. With the Nov. 7 elections two weeks away, Ford is locked in a surprisingly close battle with Republican Bob Corker. The latest poll -- released yesterday by Mason-Dixon -- showed the charismatic Ford trailing 45 percent to 43 percent.A Senate Battleground

Tennessee is one of the four remaining Senate battlegrounds, along with Virginia, Missouri and Rhode Island, that operatives in both parties believe are most likely to determine whether Republicans maintain control of the Senate in January. But this race is in a different category because of Ford's profile.

Corker and Ford tangle over all the usual issues, including the war in Iraq, education and energy independence, with both candidates holding mainstream views on most topics. Yet every speech, slogan and campaign ad seems to echo with double meaning.

DOJ_NMG_0086207

"I'm a believer that this moment is a big one," Ford, 36, told the Coalmont crowd, as Layne nodded approvingly from his seat in front of the podium. "I'll make you a good senator. I just want to go up there and do right."

Corker depicts himself as more "senatorial" than Ford but is running an almost entirely negative campaign at this point. He depicts Ford as a smooth-talking city slicker who has deeper roots in Washington, D.C. -- where Ford lived for part of his childhood -- compared with Corker, the self-described "real Tennessean" in the race.

The hardest blows have come from the national GOP. The National Republican Senatorial Committee ridicules Ford's expensive tastes on a "Fancy Ford" Web site, and the Republican National Committee is airing a controversial new ad that features a scantily clad blonde who says she met Ford at a Playboy party. "Harold, call me!" the woman chirps.

The former Chattanooga mayor often appears to be tiptoeing through a rhetorical minefield, eager to discredit his Democratic opponent with the sharpest weapons he can find but wary about accusations of playing racial politics. "Our life experiences could not be more different," Corker said in an interview. "For him, politics is a way of life."

Does the race factor influence his campaign decisions? "I understand the point of your question," Corker responded carefully in a recent interview. Then he shook his head and looked away.A Symbolic Victory?

If Ford pulls it off, he will become the first black senator to represent the South since Reconstruction. Victory in Tennessee also would be particularly symbolic for the Democratic Party, a bookend of sorts to the 1994 "Republican Revolution." That historic election, which gave the GOP control of both chambers of Congress, was tilted by races in the same Upper South states where Democrats are seeking to wrest power from Republicans this year.

One 1994 milestone was the defeat of veteran Senate Democrat Jim Sasser by political newcomer Bill Frist, who rose to become Senate majority leader. In 2000, Vice President Al Gore lost his home state in the general election, costing him the presidency.

But two years later, Tennessee elected a Democratic governor, Phil Bredesen, a pragmatic, low-key former businessman and Nashville mayor. The House delegation flipped to five Democrats and four Republicans. Bredesen is also on the ballot in November, and recent polls show him far ahead of his Republican opponent.

The governor is starring in a Ford campaign ad, and the two are barnstorming around the state. Ford credits him with creating a new Democratic brand. "He's our closer," Ford said. "We're in a position to win, and he's going to push us over the edge."

On May 25, 2005, when the brash young Democrat announced his Senate candidacy, he raised a few eyebrows. A sports junkie known on Capitol Hill for robust socializing, he still seemed a bit young. His ambitions had been obvious from his first days in Congress, and in 2002 he lost a caucus battle to become House minority leader to Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who has the job now.

Despite that setback, Ford has fashioned a reputation as a new-generation Democrat, less defined by interest-group politics and with strong opinions of how national Democrats have failed to compete seriously in the South. He is both supremely confident and dead serious. "I will run a very issue-rich, substance-rich campaign," Ford promised in a video that streamed over his new campaign Web site when he announced his Senate run.

On May 26, 2005, his uncle John Ford, a state senator, was indicted on corruption charges. It was a reminder -- though few politically aware people in this state needed one -- that Ford hailed from an illustrious Memphis clan. Fords had served in state and local government for decades, and a few had scrapes with the law.

Ford's father was one of 12 children of a funeral-home entrepreneur; Harold Ford Sr. served 11 terms in the House before his son took over the seat. The elder Ford was acquitted of bank-fraud charges in 1990. Another uncle, Emmett Ford, had resigned from the state legislature in 1981 after being convicted of insurance fraud.

When Ford ran to succeed his father, he billed himself proudly as "Junior." But his role model, as he told the Democratic National Convention in his 2000 keynote address, was former Tennessee senator and vice president Al Gore. He recalled meeting Gore (a fellow graduate of St. Albans School in Washington) in his family kitchen in Memphis.

"It was a time when, on the heels of Vietnam and Watergate, young Americans were turning away from public service. But Al Gore didn't turn away. He jumped feet first into public life," the young congressman recalled.A Fierce Campaigner

Corker, who is 54, spent his early adult years creating a lucrative construction business. He was appointed state finance commissioner during the late 1990s and was elected Chattanooga mayor in 2001. He is credited with the impressive redevelopment of the city's riverfront.

White-haired and compact, with a rich twang, Corker has a friendly rapport with voters but has proven himself over the years to be a fierce competitor. When he ran against Frist in the 1994 GOP primary, Corker was called "pond scum" by Frist campaign manager Tom Perdue for airing an ad that suggested Frist had dodged the draft.

DOJ_NMG_0086208

This year, as Corker slogged through a rough-and-tumble GOP primary with two more conservative opponents, Ford campaign insiders braced for a barrage of attacks. It has been unrelenting. Most of Corker's ads, news releases and campaign speeches are attacks on Ford, addressing such things as his House voting record and his not passing the bar exam.

Ford's rhetorical skills and good looks are particular targets. A new Corker ad features a series of ordinary-looking voters raising questions about Ford, with one woman asking "Has Junior ever had a job outside of politics?" and another noting "He does look good on TV."

Corker's attacks appear to have thrown Ford somewhat off-stride in recent days. The congressman showed up at a recent Corker news conference to insist that he stop criticizing the Ford family, a move Republicans called undignified. But some Republicans are concerned Corker is not working hard enough to whip up support in his party, in particular among the socially conservative voters who preferred his primary opponents, former representatives Van Hilleary and Ed Bryant.

"The differences need to be spelled out aggressively in the next few weeks," Frist said as the Senate majority leader campaigned with Corker in Athens, Tenn. Frist said Corker must convince Tennessee voters that he is "a genuine person who has their values."

While visiting a diner in Oak Ridge, Corker stopped to shake hands with Linda Ramsey, who was having lunch with her husband, Dale, and daughter Kelcee. Ramsey responded with a big smile when Corker asked for her vote. But when he moved to the next table, she conceded she was leaning toward Ford.

Although she supported Corker in the primary, Ramsey explained, "all he wants to do is point fingers. Ford is stepping up above it."

Ford is difficult to typecast -- conservative on some issues and liberal on others. In Coalmont, one of Ford's biggest applause lines came when he called for "character education" in public schools to teach the difference between right and wrong. But he also drew cheers when he suggested that the federal government take a bigger role in education.

Ford filmed a television ad inside the Memphis church he attended as a child, and he fondly recalls the times his maternal grandmother chased after him with a switch.

The state Democratic Party is working particularly hard to rally black voters. State party officials believe African Americans could push Ford over the top if they turn out in large numbers. In addition to clutching Bredesen's coattails, Ford has tethered himself to Rep. Lincoln Davis, a popular two-term Democrat from a rural, white central Tennessee district and the chairman of Ford's campaign.

Davis said he polled his district in July and found Ford trailing 49 percent to 35 percent. "I didn't even tell his campaign," Davis acknowledged.

New numbers came back a few weeks ago showing Ford ahead 49 percent to 39 percent. "He's a rock star, a superstar," Davis said. "And if he wins my district, he's the next senator from Tennessee."

Rush Limbaugh On The Offensive Against Ad With Michael J. Fox (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Possibly worse than making fun of someone's disability is saying that it's imaginary. That is not to mock someone's body, but to challenge a person's guts, integrity, sanity.

To Rush Limbaugh on Monday, Michael J. Fox looked like a faker. The actor, who suffers from Parkinson's disease, has done a series of political ads supporting candidates who favor stem cell research, including Maryland Democrat Ben Cardin, who is running against Republican Michael Steele for the Senate seat being vacated by Paul Sarbanes.

"He is exaggerating the effects of the disease," Limbaugh told listeners. "He's moving all around and shaking and it's purely an act. . . . This is really shameless of Michael J. Fox. Either he didn't take his medication or he's acting."

Limbaugh, whose syndicated radio program has a weekly audience of about 10 million, was reacting to Fox's appearance in another one of the spots, for Missouri Democrat Claire McCaskill, running against Republican Sen. James M. Talent.

But the Cardin ad is similar. It is hard to watch, unless, for some reason, you don't believe it. As he speaks, Fox's restless torso weaves and writhes in a private dance. His head bobs from side to side, almost leaving the video frame.

"This is the only time I've ever seen Michael J. Fox portray any of the symptoms of the disease he has," Limbaugh said. "He can barely control himself."

Later Monday, still on the air, Limbaugh would apologize, but reaction to his statements from Parkinson's experts and Fox's supporters was swift and angry.

"It's a shameless statement," John Rogers said yesterday. Rogers, Fox's political adviser, who also serves on the board of the Parkinson's Action Network, added: "It's insulting. It's appallingly sad, at best."

DOJ_NMG_0086209

"Anyone who knows the disease well would regard his movement as classic severe Parkinson's disease," said Elaine Richman, a neuroscientist in Baltimore who co-wrote "Parkinson's Disease and the Family." "Any other interpretation is misinformed."

Fox was campaigning yesterday for Tammy Duckworth, a congressional candidate, outside Chicago, when he alluded to Limbaugh's remarks. "It's ironic, given some of the things that have been said in the last couple of days, that my pills are working really well right now," he said, according to a report on the CBS2 Web site.

After his apology, Limbaugh shifted his ground and renewed his attack on Fox.

"Now people are telling me they have seen Michael J. Fox in interviews and he does appear the same way in the interviews as he does in this commercial," Limbaugh said, according to a transcript on his Web site. "All right then, I stand corrected. . . . So I will bigly, hugely admit that I was wrong, and I will apologize to Michael J. Fox, if I am wrong in characterizing his behavior on this commercial as an act."

Then Limbaugh pivoted to a different critique: "Michael J. Fox is allowing his illness to be exploited and in the process is shilling for a Democratic politician."

Limbaugh's shock at Fox's appearance is a measure of the disease's devastation, advocates say. Contrary to the charge that Fox might not take his medicine to enhance his symptoms, the medicine produces some of the uncontrolled body movements.

"Stem cell research offers hope to millions of Americans with diseases like diabetes, Alzheimer's and Parkinson's," Fox says in the Cardin ad. "But George Bush and Michael Steele would put limits on the most promising stem cell research."

Fox has appeared in ABC's "Boston Legal" this season. In his scenes, taped over the summer, Fox does not shake or loll his head as he does in the Cardin commercial, but does appear to be restraining himself, appearing almost rigid at times.

A source with direct knowledge of Fox's illness who viewed the Cardin ad said Fox is not acting to exaggerate the effects of the disease. The source said Fox's scenes in "Boston Legal" had to be taped around his illness, as he worked to control the tremors associated with Parkinson's for limited periods of time.

Limbaugh Says Actor Fox Exaggerating His Disease As Stem Cell Issue Churns (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rush Limbaugh has accused actor Michael J. Fox of exaggerating the physical effects of his Parkinson's disease in political ads urging viewers to vote for Democrats in next month's election.

The conservative radio host told listeners Monday that Fox's lurching, palsied movements in a TV ad for Missouri Senate challenger Claire McCaskill were “an act.” Limbaugh noted that Fox, a longtime advocate for research on embryonic stem cells, has said he sometimes does not take his medication in order to illustrate Parkinson's severe physical effects. Uncontrolled shaking and stiffness are among the symptoms of the nerve disease.

“If this was not an act,” Limbaugh said later on the show, “then I apologize.”

John Rogers, Fox's spokesman, called Limbaugh's remarks “shameful.”

It's an appalling, sad statement,” Rogers said. “Anybody who understands Parkinson's disease knows it's because of the medicine that one experiences” body movements like those seen in the ad.

Fox, who has had Parkinson's for 15 years, is supporting candidates who would vote to expand research using stem cells from human embryos.

Embryonic stem cells are the precursor cells to almost every tissue in the body. Advocates of their use in research say they hold more potential to cure spinal cord injuries, diabetes and other diseases than adult stem cells. Opponents say that the research with embryonic cells, which destroys the embryos, amounts to abortion and that adult stem cells have been used successfully in therapies. This summer, President Bush used his first veto to kill a bill that would have funded research using leftover fertility-clinic embryos that would otherwise have been discarded.

Fox has also made ads for Senate candidate Ben Cardin in Maryland and Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle.

In the McCaskill spot (claireonline.com), which aired during Game 1 of baseball's World Series on Saturday, Fox says McCaskill, the state auditor, “shares my hope for cures” while her opponent, GOP Sen. Jim Talent, wants to “criminalize” expanded research. Talent spokesman Rich Chrismer called the ad “false” and says Talent supports “stem cell research that doesn't involve cloning or destroying a human embryo.”

The Fox ads are part of a larger effort by Democrats who are using the issue as another weapon against Republicans already hurting from an unpopular war in Iraq and Bush's low approval ratings.

Democrats and interest groups are using ads, campaign events and celebrities in at least 20 House, Senate and governor races to push for more federal funding for embryonic stem cell research.

DOJ_NMG_0086210

Fox's dramatic ads are "very effective" with suburban voters, seniors and parents, says Evan Tracey of the non-partisan Campaign Media Analysis Group, which tracks political advertising. "It puts the Republicans on the wrong side of hope."

Other TV spots:

·Singer Sheryl Crow, a Missouri native and breast cancer survivor, appears in an ad (www.missouricures.com) sponsored by the Missouri Coalition for Lifesaving Cures, which backs a state ballot initiative to permit research on embryonic stem cells.

·In Arizona, an ad (www .dccc.org/multimedia) sponsored by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee features the granddaughter of Morris Udall, a popular congressman who died of Parkinson's disease in 1998. Loren Udall, who has the autoimmune disease lupus, says that "by voting in Congress to restrict stem cell research, (Republican Rep.) J.D. Hayworth has played politics with people's lives."

Brian Nick of the National Republican Senatorial Committee says such "fear-mongering" ads distort the positions of candidates who favor research using adult stem cells. "It's unfortunate they're using a good man like Michael J. Fox as a political pawn to misrepresent people's view."

Sarah Chamberlain Resnick of the Republican Main Street Partnership, whose members back embryonic stem cell research, says of Missouri's senator, "Talent's entire race is going to come down to stem cells. (McCaskill has) been killing him on it."

Making Stem Cell Issue Personal, And Political (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

The plea is as disturbing — and arresting — as a hostage video from Iraq. In a navy blazer and preppy Oxford shirt, the actor Michael J. Fox calmly asks viewers to support stem cell research by voting for several Democratic candidates in Maryland, Missouri and Wisconsin, while his body sways back and forth uncontrollably like a sailor being tossed around in a full-force gale.

In short, Mr. Fox's display of the toll Parkinson's disease has taken on him turned into one of the most powerful and talked about political advertisements in years.

Republican strategists who saw how quickly the commercial was downloaded, e-mailed and reshown on news broadcasts certainly thought so. Rush Limbaugh rushed in to discredit Mr. Fox, though he mostly hurt himself. Mr. Limbaugh, the conservative radio talk show host, told his listeners that the actor either "didn't take his medication or was acting." Mr. Limbaugh later apologized for accusing Mr. Fox of exaggerating his symptoms, but said that "Michael J. Fox is allowing his illness to be exploited and in the process is shilling for a Democrat politician."

Republicans cobbled together a response ad that did not mention Mr. Fox but attacked the ethics of embryonic stem cell research. It included testimonials by the actress Patricia Heaton ("Everybody Loves Raymond") and James Caviezel, who played Jesus in Mel Gibson's "Passion of the Christ." At least in the advance version shown on YouTube last night, Mr. Caviezel's introduction seemed either garbled or to be in Aramaic.

The issue of embryonic stem cell research is divisive, but Mr. Fox is not. And that is one reason his advertisement had such resonance. He is a popular actor who played a young conservative Republican on the sitcom "Family Ties." His illness was diagnosed in 1991, but he kept it secret until 1998. In 2000, he told his fans that because of his illness, he had to quit the hit sitcom "Spin City." He founded the Michael J. Fox Foundation to advance stem cell research, lobbied Congress and made commercials to rally support for his cause.

But he has rarely looked quite as infirm. Mr. Fox was recently a guest star on several episodes of the ABC drama "Boston Legal," and, presumably thanks to medication, his symptoms there were less noticeable.

If Mr. Fox did forgo medication for the advertisement as Mr. Limbaugh suggested, it could hardly be considered fraudulent: if anything, masking the extent of the disease's ravages is the deception, not revealing them. (A spokesman for Mr. Fox said his tremors were caused by his medication.) It was certainly the most dramatic way Mr. Fox has to personalize the issue; he used his infirmity much the way the late Christopher Reeve did when he lobbied for stem cell research to seek a cure for spinal injuries.

Debate over stem cell research is especially intense in Missouri, where voters are considering a measure that would amend the state's Constitution to protect all federally allowed forms of the research, including embryonic stem cell research. Mr. Fox's words in support of the Democratic Senate candidate, Claire McCaskill, were not nearly as forceful as his condemnation of her Republican opponent.

"Unfortunately, Senator Jim Talent opposes expanding stem cell research," Mr. Fox says in the 30-second spot. "Senator Talent even wanted to criminalize the science that gives us a chance for hope."

The Talent campaign protested Mr. Fox's wording as misleading. "Senator Talent supports medical research including stem cell research that doesn't involve cloning or destroying a human embryo," said the candidate's spokesman, Rich Chrismer.

DOJ_NMG_0086211

But one reason candidates rely so heavily on 30-second spots is that they appeal to visceral emotion, not reason. In the recent past, it has been the Republican advertisements that have tended to be more bold and more memorable: the Willie Horton advertisements that George Bush used against Michael S. Dukakis in 1988 or the specter of stalking wolves that his son, George W. Bush, used to make Senator John Kerry seem weak on terrorism. Democrats usually have to go back to 1964 and Lyndon B. Johnson's "Daisy" attack on Barry Goldwater to find comparably vivid ads. Until now, that is.

These are times in which most actors seem prepared to do anything, and pay any price, to disguise flaws that could harm their careers. So when a famous one exposes the full, frightening extent of his infirmity in the name of saving lives, it tends to get noticed.

With 2 Weeks To Go, Allen, Webb Ad Blitz Hits A Higher Gear (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

RICHMOND, Oct. 24 -- Virginia's Senate candidates and their national party backers will begin a final, multimillion-dollar advertising blitz Wednesday, flooding the state's airwaves with campaign commercials during the two weeks before Election Day.

The close battle between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democratic challenger James Webb has become a nationally watched race in which the GOP may have to make an unexpected stand to retain control of the Senate.

As a result, neither side is letting up. During the next week, television watchers in Northern Virginia will see an average of five Virginia Senate ads a day. Together, the campaigns and the Senate party committees in Washington are spending $3.45 million over the next week in Northern Virginia.

"Voters are going to see so much stuff," said Stuart Rothenberg, editor of a nonpartisan political newsletter in the District. "If they are not numb already, they ought to shoot their brains full of Novocain."

Voters in other parts of the state will also be deluged with the commercials about Allen and Webb. But most of the money will be flowing to Northern Virginia and its expensive media market, where a week's worth of ads for one candidate costs about $1 million. By contrast, running the same number of ads in the Roanoke media market costs about $89,000.

By Nov. 7, the Virginia Senate candidates will probably spend more than $25 million. And the race, which has become closer than anyone predicted several months ago, has drawn financial resources for both parties away from other competitive states.

"There is a lot of national Democratic money flying into Virginia, and we are not going to stand idly by while it does," said Dan Ronayne, a spokesman for the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, which has invested about $1.4 million in Virginia ads.

The Republican committee's first ad attacks Webb for his reaction to the Navy's Tailhook Association scandal, in which women were assaulted at a Las Vegas convention in 1991.

"Jim Webb, he called this scandal a witch hunt and a feminist plot," the female announcer says. "Jim Webb. Right for '06. 1806."

The ad cites a 1992 New York Times article in which Webb said, "A botched internal investigation and the ongoing revelations of inexcusable harassment of women . . . have also left in their wake a witch hunt that threatens to swamp the entire naval service."

Webb campaign officials said the GOP ad is unfair and takes Webb's past statements about Tailhook out of context.

"Like everything that comes out of Republicans these days, it is complete lies and distortions about Jim's record and what Jim has said and done in the past," said Kristian Denny Todd, a Webb spokeswoman. "The bottom line is they are desperate. For a guy who has been in office in this state for 26 years, [Allen] has nothing to offer but this kind of garbage."

Phil Singer, a Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee spokesman, predicted that the GOP ad would backfire.

"At a time when people are desperate for a change in policy in Iraq and the middle class is feeling squeezed, they want to hear solutions that are going to work and not political potshots and ads like the ones Allen and his allies are putting up that are purely negative," Singer said.

Webb has launched two TV commercials, including one that features former governor Mark R. Warner (D). In that ad, the popular ex-governor describes Webb's background and concludes by urging voters to choose Webb.

"I know Jim Webb," Warner says, looking into the camera. "I know his independence. And I know he'll make us proud."

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, said voters "are going to see lots of ads" between now and Nov. 7. "This is a race for the United States Senate. That is what races for the United States Senate have, lots of ads," Wadhams said. "But it is also important to note Senator Allen is traveling across the commonwealth on a very ambitious schedule, which he has done many times in the past."

DOJ_NMG_0086212

Webb has also started running an ad that criticizes Allen's record of opposing increases to the minimum wage and allowing increases in college tuition, charges that Allen's campaign officials have denied.

Meanwhile, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee has begun airing a commercial playing up Allen's loyalty to President Bush. It features Allen saying the phrase "stay the course" as an announcer says that "George Allen supports President Bush 96 percent of the time."

The ad continues: "Staying the course is not a strategy for victory in Iraq. And voting 96 percent with Bush won't move our country forward."

GOP's Kennedy Sticks To Iraq Stance In Unique Ad (MINNST)

By Patrick Condon

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 25, 2006

As his fellow Republicans around the country try to distance themselves from the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq, Minnesota Senate candidate Mark Kennedy is trying to turn the issue on its head with a new TV ad where he squarely states his support — "even though I know it may not be what you want to hear," he tells voters.

The 30-second ad, running statewide for at least a week, is the latest attempt by the Republican to catch Democratic frontrunner Amy Klobuchar, and may be the only ad of its kind in the country. Staring into the camera, Kennedy acknowledges that "we've made some mistakes in Iraq" but says that "leaving Iraq now will create a breeding ground for new attacks on America."

Political observers said Tuesday they've not seen an ad like it anywhere this election cycle, with the Bush administration and Republicans on the defensive over Iraq. Just a day earlier, the White House acknowledged President Bush had dropped his familiar "stay the course" phrase in talking about the war.

Vin Weber, a former Minnesota congressman with close ties to national GOP leadership, said he believed Kennedy's ad was unique.

"I'd say the desire of most Republicans is to talk about something else," he said.

As a House member the last six years, Kennedy has been a vocal supporter of the Bush administration's foreign policy. He's visited Iraq each of the last three years, and used his support for U.S. policy toward Iraq and terrorism as a signature issue of his successful reelection campaigns in 2002 and 2004.

In resurrecting the issue now, Kennedy is trying to draw a distinction between himself and Klobuchar, whom he criticizes as offering no alternatives to current policy other than an undefined "change of course," as she put it in a new TV ad of her own that mentions Iraq among a litany of campaign issues.

"And this election is about all the sons and daughters of Minnesota serving in Iraq who deserve a change in course," Klobuchar says in her ad. Klobuchar has said invading Iraq was the wrong decision and that the U.S. should begin reducing troop levels. She doesn't support a timed, rapid withdrawal like some Democrats.

Weber, who has advised Kennedy but has no formal role in his campaign, said he hoped voters would respond to Kennedy's forthrightness. "We tend to think you can't tell voters what you really think and you have to treat them like spoiled children who demand to be told what they want to hear," he said.

Kennedy, on a campaign swing Tuesday through southwestern Minnesota, said the U.S. erred in not earlier cracking down on armed militias now causing havoc throughout Iraq. He also said more should be done to block shipments of money and weapons from across the border in Iran.

"Getting rid of the militias is going to be a difficult task," Kennedy said. "I don't want to set some sort of arbitrary deadline that is going to do nothing but give the enemy reason to hope."

Kennedy said the administration has at times faltered in how it characterizes the war on terrorism. He said it should be viewed as more long-term, similar to the Cold War, "not a short war." Still, he does not call for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, as some prominent Republicans have. "That's the president's decision, not mine," he said.

Ben Goldfarb, Klobuchar's campaign manager, said that support for Kennedy is still a vote to "stay the course in Iraq. Amy Klobuchar will do what Kennedy won't: ask tough questions, demand accountability and push for change."

Joel Rivlin, the deputy director of the University of Wisconsin Advertising Project, which tracks political advertising, said Kennedy's approach is an unusual one — but worth a try.

"It's increasingly clear that the Iraq war is going to be at the top of most voters' minds," Rivlin said. "What he seems to be trying to do is reframe the issue in a way that helps voters realize maybe there is another way to think about this — even if they don't see it that way themselves."

A Sense Of Service Sustained By Family, Faith (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0086213

By Katherine Shaver

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Almost every Friday, Benjamin L. Cardin gathers with his family -- his wife, daughter, granddaughters, cousins and brother's family -- for dinner celebrating the Jewish Sabbath.

As many as 30 people come. Cardin often bakes the challah or grills the chicken. The group sings, prays and collects money for charity. Then everyone takes turns sharing what made each happiest that week. At one recent Shabbat, the Democrat took a break from campaigning for Maryland's open U.S. Senate seat to join in. He was happy, he told everyone, that Election Day was less than a month away.

During 40 years in public office -- 20 in the General Assembly followed by two decades in Congress -- Cardin has woven his political life into the faith and family that he says sustain him.

He followed his father and uncle into the state legislature. One of his closest political advisers is Myrna, his wife of 40 years, whom he met in elementary school. At one of the lowest points in his life -- when his son committed suicide eight years ago -- Cardin carried out a Jewish custom of mourning for 30 days by gathering Jewish staffers and fellow Congress members in his Capitol Hill office for daily prayers.

His faith informs his actions in the House of Representatives, particularly a six-year membership on the ethics committee, he said.

His office displays none of the usual photographs of a congressman shaking hands with famous people. Instead, the most prominent photo shows his curly-haired granddaughter, Madeline, then 4, sitting beside him during a swearing-in ceremony at the Capitol.

He and his brother, Howard, shared a bedroom for 16 years while growing up. They remained so close after both married that they moved their families several times so they could live near each other -- at one point, across the street from each other for 25 years. He considered his father, Meyer M. Cardin, who died last year two days shy of his 98th birthday, one of his closest friends.

Ben Cardin, 63, said he remains grounded in what his father told him after his election to the General Assembly at 23. "He said I had something people worked a lifetime for," Cardin said, "that I had the opportunity to make a difference and that I should think about that. . . . I think about that frequently, and it affects everything I do in life."

Although Cardin hails from one of Baltimore's most prominent political families, his canvassers say his name draws blank looks from many voters. His Republican rival, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, is a telegenic, polished speaker who has captured attention with catchy TV ads highlighting his love of puppies. Steele hugs his way through a crowd and shares humorous personal stories. Cardin launches straight into serious policy discussions. At rallies, it is hard to tell that he is the star.

"My father-in-law would come to a restaurant and work every table," Myrna Cardin said of Meyer Cardin, who also became a Circuit Court judge. "Ben would sit down and eat and not even think people would want to be bothered during dinner."

Registered Democrats outnumber Republicans 2 to 1 in Maryland, but Cardin isn't taking any chances. After all, many of those Democrats chose a GOP governor four years ago. Nor can he ignore Steele's appeal for some as the first African American elected to statewide office in Maryland. Cardin skipped Shabbat last week, which he is loath to do, to attend an NAACP dinner in Prince George's County.

Cardin -- whose congressional district includes a piece of Baltimore and parts of Howard, Baltimore and Anne Arundel counties -- comes across as a mix of a professor and the nice guy next door, with a finely honed political edge. Political supporters and rivals alike describe him as steady, smart, decent and honest.

As Myrna Cardin said, using a Yiddish term for an upright person, "He runs his life to be a mensch."

Profiles of him never fail to mention that he is short, stout and, but for a few curly wisps of white hair, bald on top. His specialties in Congress -- pension law and Social Security -- gained him a reputation as a serious legislator but often draw yawns beyond the C-SPAN crowd. In stump speeches, Cardin calls for universal health care, a higher minimum wage and federal support for embryonic stem-cell research. He criticizes the Bush administration for trying to privatize Social Security and highlights his vote against sending troops to Iraq.

He is clearly most at ease -- and at his best -- in small groups, where he is warm and, for a man often labeled as dull, surprisingly witty. During lunch with a dozen Washington Post reporters and editors, Cardin mentioned his father's death. "His brother is 96 and just bought a car," Cardin said. He added dryly: "He took the five-year extended warranty. We have good genes in my family."

Supporters play up Cardin's seriousness as his strength.

"He's always thinking about something," said Frank M. Conaway Sr., a Democratic former Assembly colleague of Cardin's and now clerk of Baltimore's Circuit Court. "He's just not a jump-up-and-down kind of politician."

DOJ_NMG_0086214

By contrast, Myrna Cardin is gregarious and bubbly. Crowds warm to her beaming smile. She refers to her husband by his childhood nickname, "Benji."

They grew up in Baltimore, a mile apart in a middle-class neighborhood of first-generation Americans. Cardin's grandparents came from Lithuania and Russia. (Cardin said it's likely that an immigration officer shortened their last name from Kardonsky.) The extended family, including 17 first cousins, lived within a couple blocks.

"The family was always together," said Howard Cardin, a Baltimore defense lawyer. Many went into public service, he said, because "there was a strong feeling of serving public needs."

The men's parents were active in volunteer work, especially among the needy. Myrna Cardin said in an interview that her husband soaked up their example.

"Ben grew up in a very traditional Jewish home, where you gave back," she said. "That's his persona. . . . It's like he inhaled it as a good way to live."

In addition to teaching an ethics course at Johns Hopkins University, Cardin served on the House ethics committee, an often unpopular job because members must pass judgment on colleagues. He helped investigate the House Bank scandal, in which members regularly bounced checks. He was the lead Democrat in crafting a bipartisan punishment for then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who used tax-deductible money for political purposes and provided inaccurate information to House investigators.

"Ethics is the driving equalizer in my life -- to make sure everything I do can be judged as right or wrong," Cardin said in an interview.

It is a quality his wife said she has always admired. When they began dating at 15, she also saw him as happy, fun and full of adventure.

"And he drove a Chevy Impala -- a convertible -- and that didn't hurt," she said with a laugh over a glass of iced tea recently at a Baltimore coffeehouse.

She knew politics came with the package. The Cardin name loomed large in Baltimore's Democratic politics. In addition to his father, Ben's uncle, Maurice Cardin, served in the House of Delegates. Like his uncle and father, Ben would become a lawyer. He graduated first in his class from the University of Maryland's law school.

When his uncle left the General Assembly, local Democrats approached Cardin's father about filling the seat. Ben Cardin said he would run.

"They said: 'We've always had a Cardin on the ticket. We need a Cardin on the ticket,' " Myrna Cardin recalled. Cardin was in law school when he won. He quickly became chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee before being chosen one of the youngest House speakers in state history.

"I worked hard in that [first] election," he said, "but I think it's fair to say that without the name, I wouldn't have won."

Family ties haven't always helped. At least one challenger in the late 1980s tried to link Cardin to an older cousin, Jerome Cardin, who was jailed as part of the Maryland savings and loan collapse. Cardin was never implicated.

But Republicans couldn't compete with Cardin's ability to raise money and win votes in heavily Democratic districts. Before Steele, most of his challengers were little-known or first-time candidates running on pennies compared with Cardin's campaign coffers.

Scott Conwell, a Republican lawyer from Crofton who opposed Cardin in 2002, said Cardin spent much more money than he did. Cardin's congressional seat has been so safe for so long that he has never had to run a hard-hitting campaign, which fits his cautious nature, Conwell said. Cardin, he noted, bowed out after initially challenging then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening (D) in 1997.

"His issues are not risk-taking issues," Conwell said. "He's very safe. Even when he spent $1 million against me, no one would ever remember how he spent it because they were nice-guy commercials -- Ben doing this or Ben near the [Chesapeake] Bay -- but they weren't risk-taking commercials. They raised his favorability ratings, but they didn't spark any passion for him."

Cardin seems most passionate about discussing policy. On those issues, he said, he turns to his staff for advice. When it comes to any other difficult decision, political or personal, he asks Myrna.

"She's not the person pulling the strings and shaping policy," said their daughter, Deborah Cardin, 37, who works at the Jewish Museum of Maryland. "But she's fiercely protective of my father. . . . She'll call the person who's driving him and say: 'Has Ben had lunch? Is he getting dinner?' "

If anything could have tested the Cardins' marriage, friends said, it was the death of their son, Michael. Family members said he was a sensitive young man who knew the names of homeless people on his street and loved discussing politics with his father. Myrna Cardin said they thought he might run for Baltimore City Council some day. One night in March 1998, Michael, 30, killed himself in his apartment. He had recently passed the state bar exam and was volunteering with lower-income residents.

DOJ_NMG_0086215

Friends said Michael's death devastated his parents, but Ben didn't display his grief publicly. "They're not the kind of people who need to go to grief counseling," said Rabbi Mitchell Wohlberg of Beth Tfiloh Congregation in Baltimore, who officiated at Michael's funeral. "They had each other for that."

As for possible feelings of guilt, Wohlberg said: "Theirs wasn't the kind of situation where they had to ask themselves: Where did we go wrong? They knew in their heart of hearts [they] hadn't. Something went wrong with Michael."

Cardin said he was "extremely close" to his son -- they met regularly for lunch or dinner -- but neither he nor anyone else saw warning signs of depression or suicide. In learning more about his son's life after his death, Cardin said, he has come to believe that Michael "made a judgment, a wrong judgment, about a circumstance." He declined to elaborate, saying only that the "circumstance" is "not really relevant because it wasn't really major."

Though Myrna teared up on mention of Michael, Cardin broke into a wide, somewhat forced-looking smile.

"It's not a sad thing," Ben Cardin said. "Michael is a happy part of my life. He was an incredible person. . . . He was totally convinced he could change the world one person at a time. He'd go out of his way to find problems so he could help people."

Cardin said later: "You don't lose someone without changing. It's hard to describe how, but it changes your perspective. It's like my father said: You don't lose any opportunities in life."

Whether Cardin can seize the next opportunity -- a lesson born of faith, passed between fathers and sons -- is up to voters.

Michael Steele For U.S. Senate (WT)

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

The major-party nominees for U.S. Senate from Maryland are a study in contrasts: Rep. Ben Cardin, a veteran of 10 terms in the U.S. House and nearly 40 years in Maryland politics, from a wealthy, powerful Baltimore family. He is very much a quiet, cerebral liberal in the mold of retiring Sen. Paul Sarbanes, who held the seat for 30 years. By contrast, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, who we enthusiastically endorse for the Senate today, is anything but a conventional politician. As Mr. Steele himself told editors and reporters the other day, "I don't look at this race through conventional glasses."

Indeed, Mr. Steele's openness to new ideas offers a refreshing contrast from the sort of orthodox liberalism represented by Mr. Cardin. And Mr. Steele, the first black candidate elected statewide in Maryland in modern times, offers a compelling personal success story that is in many ways the embodiment of the American Dream.

His mother is a sharecropper's daughter who worked in South Carolina tobacco fields before coming to Washington and working at minimum-wage jobs for nearly half a century. His stepfather was a limousine driver. Mr. Steele, a Roman Catholic born in Prince George's County and reared in Washington, prepared for the priesthood but ultimately chose a career in law. He's even worked with such well-known Washington politicians as Democrats Joe Yeldell and John Ray (a Democrat we once endorsed for mayor).

Cutting your conservative teeth in a blue city and then moving to a blue state and rising to prominence is no small task. Seeing where Mr. Steele stands on key issues explains why he draws support from Republicans and Democrats. In fact, such a briefing proves why his opponent's campaign ads mistakenly try to pass Mr. Steele off as a Republican ideologue, which he isn't, who sees everything through Bush-colored lenses, which he doesn't.

Mr. Steele is staunchly pro-life (parting with many Republicans who support abortion in cases of rape and incest), and he is a free trader. He supports welfare reform and wants to come to Washington to push for policies so low-income Americans can get a pathway to wealth, primarily through homeownership. And while he stands for law and order, his compassionate conservatism calls for rehabilitating some drug offenders and he doesn't stand firmly on the death penalty, either. Mr. Steele also supports tax cuts and welfare reform.

One of the issues Mr. Steele talks breathlessly and compassionately about is education. He has reservations about President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act, and can sound as frustrated as any schoolteacher who feels his hands are tied by the bureaucracy.

Involved in Maryland politics since the late 1980s, Mr. Steele became a political David battling big-government Goliaths. For example, as chairman of the Prince George's County Republican Party (Democrats outnumber Republicans in the county by nearly 5-1), he successfully mobilized opposition to a 1996 initiative pushed by county Democrats that would have raised property taxes. The result was a crushing defeat for then-County Executive Wayne Curry, whose effort to lift the cap was defeated by a landslide.

After the 2000 election, Mr. Steele became chairman of the state Republican Party, where he put together a 10-year plan to expand the party and elect more Republicans. His plan helped the state GOP score a major success four years ago, when voters elected Robert Ehrlich as governor and Mr. Steele as lieutenant governor. (No doubt Mr. Steele's statewide success encouraged Kweisi Mfume to run statewide, too.)

DOJ_NMG_0086216

As lieutenant governor, Mr. Steele's responsibilities included chairing commissions responsible for enhancing opportunities for minority-owned businesses and improving education in the state. The education panel's recommendations, released last year, include plans for strengthening the state's charter school law and encouraging greater parental responsibility in education -- two things which Mr. Steele believes deeply in and will fight for in the Senate. Judging from Mr. Cardin's record, we fully expect that if elected the Baltimore Democrat would join Sens. Ted Kennedy and Barbara Mikulski in trying to water down any efforts to expand educational choice.

Obviously, the Cardin camp has Michael Steele on its mind: While still airing the Steele-is-a-Bush-man ads, Mr. Cardin is cynically attempting to exploit patients of Parkinson's disease by airing television commercials featuring actor Michael J. Fox, his body clearly ravaged by the disease. The ad urges a vote for Mr. Cardin because he supports open-ended public funding of embryonic stem-cell research. Mr. Steele supports adult stem-cell research. The commercial is a cheap shot on Mr. Cardin's part because it omits the inconvenient fact that it is hardly clear from the medical evidence that embryonic stem-cell research offers a cure.

Mr. Steele is a nontraditional candidate who has brought a different style of campaigning to an old-school blue state, and there are no gray areas when he stands on issues. The Washington Times is pleased to endorse Michael Steele for the U.S. Senate.

Report Warns Of Potential Voting Problems In 10 States (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Two weeks before the midterm elections, at least 10 states, including Maryland, remain ripe for voting problems, according to a study released yesterday by a nonpartisan clearinghouse that tracks electoral reforms across the United States.

The report by Electionline.org says those states, and possibly others, could encounter trouble on Election Day because they have a combustible mix of fledgling voting-machine technology, confusion over voting procedures or recent litigation over election rules -- and close races.

The report cautions that the Nov. 7 elections, which will determine which political party controls the House and Senate, promise "to bring more of what voters have come to expect since the 2000 elections -- a divided body politic, an election system in flux and the possibility -- if not certainty -- of problems at polls nationwide."

In a state-by-state canvass, the 75-page report singles out places, such as Indiana and Arizona, where courts have upheld stringent new laws requiring voters to show poll workers specific forms of identification. It cites states such as Ohio and Pennsylvania, which have switched to electronic voting machines whose accuracy has been challenged. And it points to states such as Colorado and Washington, which have departed from the tradition of polling sites in neighborhood precincts.

The report of the clearinghouse, sponsored by the Pew Charitable Trusts, is the latest of several warnings in recent weeks and months by organizations and scholars who say that electoral problems persist in spite of six years of efforts by the federal government and states to correct voting flaws. The flaws gripped the public's attention after the close 2000 presidential election, which led to recounts in Florida and the intervention of the Supreme Court.

The election shambles of 2000 prompted Congress to pass in 2002 legislation intended to help states make significant election changes, such as by replacing outdated voting equipment. Some of the changes, including making sure that databases of registered voters are accurate, were required to be in effect by this year.

Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, said "things are getting better over time." But he said many of the changes in recent years have led to new problems and disputes. For instance, the decisions by many states to convert to electronic voting machines have yielded new concerns about whether they are secure and accurate, about paper records as backup proof and -- this year -- about whether the electronic or paper record should be considered the official tally if a candidate demands a recount.

The report cites Maryland for what it calls a "dismal primary" in September that "included human and machine failures galore," in part because Montgomery County election officials forgot to distribute to polling places the access cards needed for its electronic machines to work. The study raises questions about whether Montgomery officials are prepared for the bigger crowds in the general election and whether large numbers of mistrustful voters will resort to absentee ballots.

Some GOP Lobby Shops Hold Fast As Nov. 7 Looms (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron And Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 25, 2006

Seasoned Democrats may be in high demand as lobbying outfits and businesses prepare for a possible Democratic takeover of at least one chamber in November, but some top all-Republican firms are not clamoring to hire them.

DOJ_NMG_0086217

Despite a growing sense of urgency in recent months to bring well-positioned Democrats to lobby shops, company government-relations offices and trade associations, several all-GOP and GOP-leaning lobby firms said that they are doing nothing to prepare for a change of congressional power.

"We are a Republican firm and our business model is to provide excellent service for our clients on the Republican side, without engaging in any hypothetical about the elections," said Mark Isakowitz, president of Fierce, Isakowitz & Blalock. "Being a Republican firm is part of who we are."

Isakowitz said clients rely on the firm's ability to provide GOP strategy and expertise. Clients use Democratic lobbyists to work the other side. "That basic dynamic is working," he said.

Remaining Republican during a tight election demonstrates loyalty, said several GOP lobbyists. "We have an election in a couple of weeks and we are part of the [GOP] team," said Isakowitz.

Jim Pitts, one of the founding principals of DC Navigators, is on the same page. Pitts acknowledged that his pitch would be a lot easier from a business perspective if Republicans stay in power.

He does not anticipate losing clients, but says the company will have to be more deliberate in how it grows its business in 2007 and 2008. Pitts expressed concern that a change in leadership could affect the firm's growth potential.

"So far, none of our clients have expressed a need for us to go out and hire a Democrat," Pitts said. "Most of our clients are very happy with the work that we have done for them. We have already had some re-sign for the new fiscal year."

While DC Navigators is not hiring any Democrats, the firm has forged and plans to strengthen strategic relationships with Democratic lobbyists and consultants.

According to Pitts, DC Navigators has been working with Jonathan Sallet at the Glover Park Group, Michael Lewan at Brown Rudnick and Vin Roberti of Roberti Associates and VAR II, LLC, a strategist active in the Democratic Party.

DC Navigators is busy on the campaign trail working with prospective GOP presidential candidates, such as Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), as well as Joe Negron, the GOP hopeful running for the seat left vacant by Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

"We do not want to make [Democratic employees] uncomfortable when we talk about lobbying and then do something to help so-and-so Republican get elected," Pitts said. "We have had some talks with Democrats about joining the firm but the fit for them was not right, or for us, partly because of the electoral issues."

A flip to Democratic control next year could even provide at least one staunchly Republican firm with a competitive advantage.

While former Attorney General John Ashcroft has been campaigning for Republican candidates and is "certainly not ready to concede that we're going to lose either house," the Ashcroft Group has contemplated what next year might bring, said Juleanna Glover Weiss, a senior advisor at the firm.

"We do anticipate that Capitol Hill will be subpoena central" under Democratic control, she said. Ashcroft's experience as a senator and as the highest-ranking prosecutor in the country would make his firm valuable to any client being hauled before a congressional committee, Glover Weiss said.

Republican-leaning lobbying shops, or clients that have favored GOP representation, would have been smart to begin strategizing for a Democratic Congress months ago, one Republican lobbyist said. "If you wanted to do something, you should have started before now," the lobbyist remarked.

For example, the once all-GOP Federalist Group hired several prominent Democrats this year, including former Rep. Chris John (La.).

But even some firms that have few or no ties to Democratic lawmakers can expect to continue to flourish, particularly if they have close relationships to Republican committee leaders, as opposed to the leaders of the chambers, the Republican lobbyist said.

Mike Dyer, a Republican and a senior principal at Blank Rome Government Relations, said that firm has not made any preparations or plans for a Democratic Congress, but it is looking to recruit new lobbyists as the winners and losers on the Hill shake out in the coming months.

Dyer emphasized that Blank Rome has striven to be a bipartisan firm, "even if we may be perceived from the outside" as Republican. Dyer noted that the firm has brought in veteran Democratic lobbyists such as Peter Peyser and Heather Podesta.

But Blank Rome is expecting its clients' needs to change under a Democratic Congress, Dyer said. The firm's work would shift from offense to defense, or vice versa, depending on the client, he said.

"The workload might shift from one client to another," Dyer said. Still, he predicted, "End of the day, we're still as busy as we were [this] year."

Smart corporations and other interests maintain a steady engagement with both sides, Dyer said.

DOJ_NMG_0086218

The lobbying firms that are the most vulnerable to a change in party control are those that have made their links to the House GOP leadership and the Bush administration their chief selling point, several Republican lobbyists commented.

Republican lobbyists repeatedly cited the now-defunct Alexander Strategy Group, which boasted close ties to ex-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) as an example of the type of firm that would have reasons to be nervous about a Democratic majority.

Compared to the first years of the Bush administration, recently there has been a "very clear trend" to ensure that law firms, lobby shops and government-relations offices have a much more bipartisan representation, said Peter Metzger, the vice chairman of Christian & Timber, an executive-search firm.

Since this spring there has been a great sense of urgency to hire Democrats, said Beth Solomon, director of Christian & Timber's Washington, D.C. office. Many firms are trying to poach experienced Democrats from other firms, she said.

"There is an advantage in bringing in someone who already has the clients and understands the business," she said. "Their price tag has gone up significantly."

But lobby shops may have a harder time, at least in the first year of a Democratic Congress, plucking high-profile staffers. After so many years in the minority, many staffers would want to stay to see Democratic policies put into place.

Several GOP lobbyists pointed out that another election is just two years away.

A winning presidential candidate from either party could sweep congressional candidates along with them, Blank Rome's Dyer said. A strong GOP presidential candidate also could help his or her party reclaim House seats that might be lost this year in historically Republican districts.

For Governor In Maryland (WP)

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

WHEN HE RAN for governor of Maryland four years ago, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s claim to the job seemed to rest on little more than a sense of entitlement and a telegenic, genial personality. In fits and starts, though, he has grown in the role to become a generally proficient, pragmatic governor, if not always a disciplined or mature one. He has chalked up successes on transportation, the environment and education, among other things. For Mr. Ehrlich, the state's first Republican governor in a generation, those are real achievements -- particularly when weighed against the monolith of Democratic dominance in the state legislature. His opponent in the gubernatorial race, Democrat Martin O'Malley, is a smart, adroit politician who has compiled a creditable record as mayor of Baltimore for the past seven years, but he has not made a compelling case for toppling the incumbent. Our choice is Mr. Ehrlich.

No doubt Mr. Ehrlich has had the good fortune to govern during good times. Having inherited a crushing deficit upon taking office in 2003, he benefited over the next three years from a muscular national economy that lifted Maryland, as it did most states, and pumped up the public coffers in Annapolis. Still, Mr. Ehrlich helped his own cause by raising funds through higher taxes and fees, breaking with his party's knee-jerk anti-tax orthodoxy and using the proceeds constructively. Despite having squandered time, energy and political capital in pushing fruitlessly to expand state-sanctioned gambling in Maryland, the governor did manage a number of victories.

Mr. Ehrlich was able to revive, accelerate and push through approval of a highway to connect interstates 270 and 95 north of the District, which would be the first major road to be built in the Maryland suburbs in years and one that is badly needed. Though it had been on the state's drawing board for decades, the intercounty connector was a dead letter when Mr. Ehrlich took office. On the environment, Mr. Ehrlich rightly claims authorship of the "flush tax" bill, under which households pay a $30 annual fee to finance upgrades in sewage plants that pollute the Chesapeake Bay; it represents an important step toward cleaning the state's waterways.

On education, Mr. Ehrlich pushed through a law to allow charter schools in Maryland, providing more options for parents and students despite the opposition of some local school boards. We have also noted Mr. Ehrlich's courage in issuing more pardons and commutations for convicted criminals than his two predecessors together managed in 16 years in office. In an era when most governors are more preoccupied with punishment and establishing their bona fides as tough guys, Mr. Ehrlich's practice of dispensing mercy is exemplary.

There have been disappointments and dithering during Mr. Ehrlich's term as well, mostly of his own making. Relishing battle and cherishing his status as a besieged underdog, he picked fights needlessly, as in the childish blacklisting of two journalists from the Baltimore Sun. Likewise, his tiresome quarrels with the leaders of the General Assembly look more like clashes of puffed-up egos than hard legislative bargaining. Mr. Ehrlich could be a more effective governor if he applied himself more to the mechanics of governing and less to the skewering of his enemies on talk radio.

Mr. O'Malley, who has run a carefully scripted campaign for governor, has put his plentiful ambition to good use in one of the toughest big-city mayor's jobs in the nation. He made progress in stanching Baltimore's outflow of population, reviving some of its more blighted neighborhoods, reducing its level of violent crime, and adapting corporate methods of efficiency and accountability to the functions of government. Mr. O'Malley did not solve the problems of rampant crime and rough schools in Baltimore, but he put a dent in them.

DOJ_NMG_0086219

As a candidate, however, Mr. O'Malley, nursing a lead, has been cautious, at times excessively so. He has balked at grappling with the tough budgetary choices he would be likely to face as state spending soars for education and health care. He favors slot-machine gambling, though only at racetracks, and so presents little advantage on that score. He has remained Baltimore-centric, offering little of substance about the Washington area's problems, especially its choked roads and transit systems. While it is easy to admire Mr. O'Malley's fluency as a public speaker and his winning ways on the stump, his campaign is seen by some of his own allies as insular -- a worrisome trait in a governor.

More worrisome yet is the fact that an O'Malley victory would herald a return to the brand of one-party Democratic rule that has served the state poorly in the past. Mr. Ehrlich, for all his faults, has shaken up the old guard in Maryland politics -- while appointing plenty of Democrats to his cabinet and judgeships. If he were wise, he would use a second term to start anew with the legislature and build on his record of achievement.

U.S. Muslims Mostly Democrats (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

America's Muslim voters are a young, highly educated and prosperous voting bloc that will overwhelmingly back Democrats in November, according to a survey released yesterday by the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

They are also coming of age in terms of political representation. Next month, Democratic nominee Keith Ellison of Minneapolis is poised to become the first Muslim member of the House of Representatives. He says, if elected, he will take his oath of office with his hand on the Koran instead of the Bible.

"After September 11, neither political party wanted anything to do with Muslims," said Mohamed Nimer, research director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR). "Now they're receptive to Muslim candidates."

With their large families and socially conservative leanings, Muslims mirror the GOP's demographic profile. Seventy-eight percent of those interviewed were married. Of those respondents, 83 percent had at least one child and 54 percent reported two or three children. Muslims had an average of 4.5 members per family, contrasted with a 2005 Census Bureau figure estimating the number of family members in an average American household at 3.14.

But ideologically, their differences with Republicans are vast. Sixty-six percent favor normalization of relations with Iran, 55 percent are afraid the "war on terror" has morphed into a war on Islam, just 12 percent think the war in Iraq is worthwhile and only 10 percent support the use of the military to spread democracy.

The survey, conducted in August by Genesis Research Associates of Descanso, Calif., polled 1,000 American Muslims; 687 men and 313 women in 42 states. It has a margin of error of 3 percentage points. CAIR said the sex disparity is the result of men being more willing to participate.

The survey showed a voter bloc concentrated in 12 states with the most (20 percent) living in California. Seventy percent of the respondents were born overseas. Of those, 40 percent are from the Middle East; 33 percent from Pakistan, India or Bangladesh; 6 percent from Africa; 5 percent from Iran; and 3 percent from Europe. The rest either refused to name a country or named another part of the globe.

Forty-two percent of those polled said they were Democrats, 17 percent were Republicans and the rest either belonged to another party, no party or refused to answer.

The Democratic National Committee is aware of Muslim interest, a spokeswoman said yesterday, and has hired a part-time Muslim staffer, Hiam Nawas, to focus on soliciting their votes.

Birthplace was a factor on whether the "war on terror" is perceived as a war on Islam. Sixty percent of the foreign-born voters agreed with that statement, compared with 47 percent of those born in this country. Thirty-five percent of American-born Muslims disagreed with that statement.

"If you are born overseas, you'd tend to feel the impact of American policies more strongly because of your overseas experience," Mr. Nimer said. "Your sense of grievance is stronger."

When asked their denominational affiliation, 40 percent said they were "just a Muslim," 36 percent said they were Sunni and 12 percent were Shi'ites. The rest belonged to other branches of Islam.

Muslim voters are younger than the average American. Nearly 80 percent of Muslims are younger than 55, compared with 65 percent of the general public. The survey found 62 percent of the respondents possessing at least a college degree; 16 percent own their own business; 9 percent are engineers; 6 percent are professors or teachers; and 4 percent are doctors or dentists.

Cheney Says Clinton Could Win Presidency (AP)

The Associated Press, October 25, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney said Tuesday he thinks Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton could win the presidency. He said Sen. Barack Obama might be viewed by voters as too inexperienced.

Cheney handicapped the Democratic field of potential candidates in an interview with conservative talk show host Sean Hannity.

"I think Hillary Clinton is a formidable candidate," Cheney said. "I think she could win. I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

Cheney said Obama, an Illinois Democrat, was an "attractive guy. Don't know him well, met him a few times. I think at this stage, my initial take on him was he's been two years as a senator. I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in. But certainly, he's an attractive candidate. If he decides to run, he'll be a player on the Democratic side."

Obama said Sunday he was considering a run for president in 2008, backing off previous statements that he would not do so.

As for himself, Cheney said he would not budge from his oft-stated decision that he will not run for president. "It's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable," the vice president said. "I don't know how else I can say it. If nominated, I will not run; if elected, I will not serve."

Cheney also said he was optimistic about Republican hopes in the Nov. 7 elections.

"I think we'll hold both the House and the Senate." Last week, Cheney raised eyebrows when he sounded less sure about GOP prospects. "I think we'll hold the Senate and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House," he told Rush Limbaugh.

Karl Rove, President Bush's chief political strategist, dismissed national polls and argued that based on individual polls Republicans will hold onto the House and Senate. He made the comments in an interview with NPR's "All Things Considered."

"I think Iraq and the economy play a role in virtually every race. But there are also local considerations in the local contest between two individuals that at the end of the day matters for great deal of the contest," Rove said.

Cheney: Sen. Clinton Is 'formidable Candidate' (USAT)

USA Today, October 25, 2006

Vice President Cheney said he believes Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., could win the presidency but that Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., might be viewed by voters as too inexperienced. Cheney assessed potential Democratic candidates in an interview with conservative talk show host Sean Hannity.

"I think Hillary Clinton is a formidable candidate," Cheney told Hannity.

"I think she could win. I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

Obama said Sunday that he is considering a presidential run in 2008; Clinton also has said she might run.

Cheney said he would not budge from his oft-stated decision that he will not run for president. "It's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable," Cheney said. "I don't know how else I can say it. If nominated, I will not run; if elected, I will not serve."

Senate candidate's name a tight squeeze

Senate candidate Jim Webb's last name has been cut off on part of the electronic ballot in three Virginia cities because of a computer glitch that also affects other candidates with long names, election officials said. The Democrat's full name, James H. "Jim" Webb, appears where voters choose a candidate. The error shows up on the summary page in Alexandria, Falls Church and Charlottesville, where voters are asked to review their selections before hitting the button to record their votes. Webb's opponent, Sen. George Allen, didn't emerge unscathed — his party affiliation is cut off. Jean Jensen, secretary of the Virginia State Board of Elections, pledged to have the issue fixed — in time for the 2007 state elections.

Newt Gingrich plugs Blackwell in Ohio

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich, campaigning for Ohio Republican Ken Blackwell, said Tuesday that the gubernatorial candidate's commitment to lower taxes will create jobs to help the state's struggling economy. Gingrich said Blackwell has a "passion for lower taxes" and that Democrat Ted Strickland has a "record of consistently voting for tax increases."

Strickland campaign spokesman Keith Dailey said Strickland voted to cut taxes 81 times as a member of Congress. "The only thing consistent about that rhetoric is its inconsistency with the truth," Dailey said.

Gingrich was an architect of the Contract with America and led a resounding GOP victory in 1994.

Cubin apologizes to disabled opponent

DOJ_NMG_0086221

Rep. Barbara Cubin, R-Wyo., issued a public apology for a comment she made to a disabled candidate following a testy debate. “In retrospect, I was wrong in what I said, and I apologize,” Cubin said. Libertarian Thomas Rankin, who has multiple sclerosis and uses an electric wheelchair, said that after the debate Sunday night Cubin “walked over to me and said, ‘If you weren't sitting in that chair, I'd slap you across the face.' ” Cubin said she went over to Rankin, challenged his debate assertions and remarked that “if you had said that to anyone else, they probably would have smacked you.” Cubin is in a tight race for a seventh term against Democrat Gary Trauner.

Swann challenges ‘gray lives' comment

Pennsylvania gubernatorial candidate Lynn Swann's campaign demanded an apology from Gov. Ed Rendell for saying that slot-machine gambling brings “brightness and cheer” into the “gray lives” of senior citizens.

“Diminishing the value and the lives of our senior citizens is offensive,” said Leonardo Alcivar, spokesman for Swann, the GOP nominee. Rendell, a Democrat, was defending the legalization of slot machines in Pennsylvania. “These are people who lead very gray lives. … There's not a whole lot of good things that happen in their month,” Rendell said of seniors who bus from Philadelphia to casinos in Atlantic City. “But if you put them on the bus, they're excited. They're happy. They have fun. They see bright lights. They hear music. They pull that slot machine and with each pull they think they have a chance to win.”

Rendell campaign spokesman Dan Fee said Rendell meant that some seniors will play slot machines for entertainment and does not intend to apologize.

Seniors are focus of Rhode Island debate

Democratic challenger Charles Fogarty blamed Republican Rhode Island Gov. Don Carcieri's administration for inadequately inspecting nursing homes, while Carcieri accused Democrats of failing to curb local property taxes for people on fixed incomes. The debate took place during a forum on elderly issues.

Nursing home care became a statewide political issue in 2004 when 87-year-old Germaine Morsilli died after being moved from a nursing home bed where she sometimes lay in her own waste, state inspectors reported. A manager and owner who ran that nursing home were convicted of stealing from the facility and two others. After her death, Fogarty, who is the state's lieutenant governor, and Carcieri pushed legislation tightening nursing home regulations.

Federal judge OKs exit polling in Florida

A federal judge in Miami threw out a Florida law that prohibits exit polling within 100 feet of a voting place, finding there was no evidence the surveys were disruptive or threatened access to voting. Judge Paul Huck said Florida's law was unconstitutional and ordered state officials not to enforce it Nov. 7.

Cheney Says Clinton Could Win Presidency (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney took a look Tuesday at the field of potential Democratic presidential candidates and said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton could be the next president. He also suggested a preference for Sen. Joe Lieberman in the race for the U.S. Senate in Connecticut.

And the vice president, famous for having declared in 2005 that the insurgency in Iraq was in its "last throes," acknowledged that the violence had not ended. Speaking with Juan Williams in a National Public Radio interview, Cheney said that with the political process in motion in Iraq, he would have expected "a lower level of violence than we're seeing today."

Cheney made the comments on the Democratic political scene in an interview with Fox News Channel's Sean Hannity. Cheney said that the former first lady "is a formidable candidate."

"I think she could win," the vice president said, adding: "I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for president."

He said that Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who on Sunday opened the door to running for the Democratic nomination, is an "attractive guy."

"Don't know him well, met him a few times," Cheney said, in his characteristic staccato speech. Obama was elected in 2004, and the vice president said "people might want a little more experience than that," but if he runs, "he'll be a player on the Democratic side."

Lieberman, who ran for the vice presidency in 2000, has built up a lead as an independent candidate after losing the Democratic primary election in August to Ned Lamont, who made the senator's support for the Iraq war the central issue in the campaign.

Asked whether he was backing Lieberman, whom Cheney presented as "a big supporter of the global war on terror," the vice president said he was reluctant to answer, but tipped his hand nonetheless.

"I don't want to harm Joe's chances or prospects," he said, "so I haven't said anything about his election."

DOJ_NMG_0086222

As for his own position, he acknowledged the dark view critics take of him as, in his words, "the Darth Vader of the administration," and he also said, for the hundredth — or was it the thousandth? — time that he would not run for president.

"It's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable," he said.

Casting For West Wing (LAT)

By Tina Daunt

The Los Angeles Times, October 25, 2006

Just the hint of a possible presidential run by U.S. Sen. Barack Obama — who is in town Friday to promote his book "The Audacity of Hope" — has Hollywood Democrats talking.

The e-mail from actor George Clooney arrived at 1:46 a.m. Pacific time (he's in Europe at the moment).

The subject: Illinois Democrat Obama.

"If SENATOR Obama became PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE Obama it would be the most electrifying thing to happen to the Democratic party since Kennedy," Clooney wrote.

Media mogul Haim Saban, however, was less impressed by Obama's disclosure this week that he's thinking about running for president in 2008. Saban is already electrified by another possible Democratic candidate: Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

"Only Hillary," Saban said, via BlackBerry message. "I hope she does announce soon so we can all go to work all out to make sure she wins ... and BIG!!!!!"

The 2006 midterm elections are only two weeks away, but Hollywood is already looking toward 2008 — even though no one has formally joined the race.

"It would be hard for me to pretend that I've not heard some of the talk," Obama said in an interview with The Times. "There's an old joke that every senator is thinking about running for president — all 100 of them."

Obama said that at the moment he's focused on getting Democrats elected on Nov. 7. After that, he'll consider his presidential prospects.

But while he's pondering his options, you can bet that some people in Hollywood are already envisioning his inaugural bash.

Director Rob Reiner compared a possible run by Obama to Abraham Lincoln's victory.

"How poetic would it be that a one-term congressman from the state of Illinois could be elected president and free the slaves," said Reiner, reached on his car phone Monday, "and now a one-term African American senator from that same state could become the next president?"

"Everyone admires him," producer Norman Lear said of the freshman senator. "They are very excited about the possibility that he's in the race. I think the people who are very much with Hillary will remain with Hillary. But the discussion is a good thing for the party."

Almost anyone who has met Obama will tell you that he's charismatic and warm, but not giddy.

"My wife and I have tried not to get caught up in the hype," Obama said. "We still live in Chicago and I go to the same barbershop.... "

But there's no denying that since he rocked the Democratic National Convention in 2004 with an impassioned speech about America, his life has changed. For one, he became an instant political star.

His first book, "Dreams From My Father," released shortly after the 2004 convention, shot to the top of bestseller lists. His new missive promises to be equally as successful. Last week, he was in 15 cities promoting his book and raising money for the Democrats.

On Friday, he will be in Los Angeles to discuss the book at the Urban Issues Breakfast Forum of Greater L.A. and the California African American Museum.

Later that evening, he will attend a fundraiser for the state Democratic Party with gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides.

"This is an important election," Obama said. "The Democrats will win the House and we could win the Senate."

As he travels, Obama said, he finds that people — regardless of their party affiliations — have similar anxieties. "They're worried about whether they have enough healthcare for their kids, what's happening with the global economy. People have the same hopes and dreams. There's a stubborn self-reliance and optimism in the American people.... And I think people are in a serious mood."

Obama says he appreciates the supports he's been shown by Hollywood Democrats. (Obama, who was born in Hawaii to an American mother and a Kenyan father, counts Clooney and Bono as friends.)

DOJ_NMG_0086223

"There are some celebrities who have really done their homework and know what they are talking about and are terrific advocates for justice and peace and opportunity around the world," he said. "I want all citizens to get involved. Whether they are the secretary in an office building or a movie star, I think the more engaged and interested people are, the better off we all are."

The column explores the intersection of celebrity and politics. Tips and comments can be e-mailed to tina.daunt@latimes.com.

When It Comes To Politics, Charlie Cook Has The Prophecy Market Cornered (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

The pharaoh had Joseph. The Greeks had the Oracle at Delphi. Washington has Charlie Cook.

Please tell us, Seer of Future Congresses, how many seats the Democrats will pick up in the House on Election Day.

"Twenty to 35," Cook answers.

And how about in the Senate, OProphet on the Potomac?

"At least four," the man with the crystal ball says. "Most likely five or six."

What fate does the seer see for Sen. George Allen (R-Va.)?

"He wins ugly, but he wins," Cook divines.

And, pray tell, how are the planets aligning for Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.)?

"Gone," he decrees.

The midterm elections are two weeks away, but the powerful cannot wait that long to learn of the outcome. And so they call in Cook, who, for a fee of $5,000 to $20,000, gives his audiences the (very) early returns.

Last week he spoke to pharmaceutical and insurance groups. On Monday, he flew to Las Vegas and back to talk to the American Beverage Association. Later this week it's American Express and a hedge fund in New York and the paper industry in Georgia. Yesterday found Cook at a breakfast with the DLA Piper law firm, lunch with automobile manufacturers and dinner in Boston with a corporate housing group.

All are looking for the same thing: next month's election returns. And Cook has them. "Senators Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio are pretty much done," he told the Piper audience at the Willard hotel. And the lifelines of Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) aren't looking any longer. "I'd be surprised if any of those four can survive," Cook informed the crowd of lobbyists, diplomats and journalists.

The firm's representatives treated their visiting sage with great deference. James Blanchard, a former Michigan governor, introduced him as "a renowned expert." Former defense secretary Bill Cohen read Cook's credentials to the audience: "one of the best political handicappers . . . the Picasso of election analysis."

"He's hot," observed Rosemary Freeman, one of the event coordinators.

That's not the first description that comes to mind for Cook, who entered the ballroom lugging an overstuffed canvas bag, a torn, padded envelope and an overflowing blue file folder. Chubby and partial to big eyeglasses, he had the tail of his tie tucked into his shirt. He planted his Starbucks venti caffe latte on the head table, where he was joined by the Canadian ambassador and a former NATO secretary general.

Cook's well-rehearsed speech includes a reference to his posterior, an allusion to the movie "Young Frankenstein," and a tortured metaphor involving storms and levees to compare the 2006 election to the one in 1994. "The wave is bigger, but there are fewer structures on the beach," he forecast.

Cook is not the boldest of election prognosticators (that honor goes to Stuart Rothenberg), nor the most telegenic (washingtonpost.com's Chris Cillizza gets the nod there), but he is surely the most prominent. On contract with NBC, he was on "Meet the Press" on Sunday and taped segments for the "Today Show" and "NBC Nightly News." He commissions his own poll, and his column appears once a week in the National Journal. A Nexis search finds 873 mentions in the past 60 days for him and his company, the Cook Political Report.

And while he's not always on the mark (he admits to having "tread marks on my forehead" after understating the Republican gains in '94) he's close enough that nobody challenges his forecasts. "I'm not as much of an expert as he is, so I have to defer to him," said Dick Gephardt, a former House Democratic leader, after Cook's talk to the Piper firm.

Fortified by another venti caffe latte and a double espresso shot with cream, Cook took a cab to NBC's studio for a hit with anchor Joe Scarborough. While he was in the makeup room, a reporter from the Columbus Dispatch begged him to talk about Ohio's Senate candidates. After his on-air comments, he slipped into "Hardball" producer Tammy Haddad's office to give the staff an update on Senate races in Tennessee (trending Republican) and New Jersey (trending Democratic). "Hardball" host Chris Matthews stopped Cook on the way out to inquire about three Pennsylvania House races.

DOJ_NMG_0086224

A quick cab ride got Cook to the Cannon office building just in time for his luncheon speech to the automobile group. Posters showing a plate and fork advertised "Lunch with Cook." The group's chief, Fred Webber, gave the intro: "To give us a sneak peek of what's going to happen on Election Day, no one -- no one -- is better than Charlie Cook."

Cook gave the same speech about Frankenstein and hurricanes, then offered some presidential prognostication for dessert. "I would give McCain a 60, 65 percent chance of winning the Republican nomination," he disclosed. By contrast, he added, "I'll win the Tour de France before Rudy Giuliani wins the Republican nomination."

The oracle hopped into a waiting sedan to catch his flight to Boston. The car ride gave him the first chance in hours to check his BlackBerry -- and to make some last-minute revisions to his prophecies. "Montana closing more than thought," he typed in an e-mail to a reporter. "Burns might not be dead yet."

Tuition Outpaces Inflation (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24 — Tuition and other costs at public and private universities rose faster than inflation this year, the College Board said in a report released Tuesday. But the increases were more measured than in recent years.

In the report, the board also found that in the past five years, tuition and fees at public institutions rose more than at any other time in the past 30, increasing by 35 percent to $5,836 this academic year. Tuition and fees at private four-year colleges increased by 11 percent over the same period, though the average price of attending a private institution is $22,218.

“Neither student aid funds nor family incomes are keeping pace with college prices,” Gaston Caperton, president of the board, said at a news conference. “This is a serious problem that must be addressed.”

The tuition and fees figures in the report are the so-called sticker prices, which do not reflect discounts students receive in the form of grant aid and tax benefits. Such aid reached about $9,000 at private four-year institutions, $3,100 at public ones and $2,200 at two-year institutions, the report said.

Although many students do not pay the sticker price, the cost of attending public and private universities has consistently outstripped the rate of inflation. Last year, the Consumer Price Index, a standard measure of changes in the cost of goods and services, rose by 3.4 percent. Tuition, fees, room and board have increased this year by more than 5.5 percent at both public and private four-year institutions.

The price increases at public universities are largely the result of declining federal and state support, the report said.

Margaret Spellings, secretary of education, said in a statement that the report “underscores the need to make colleges and universities more accountable for results and at the same time increase need-based aid.”

Because of cost increases, students and their families are increasingly turning to loans. Private loans, which are not guaranteed by the federal government, generally have less favorable terms than federal loans, but are the fastest-growing option for financing higher education. Last year they totaled more than $17 billion.

At the same time, the average Pell grant, the federal government’s grant to the neediest students, declined last year for the first time in 10 years, falling to $2,354 a year. Sandy Baum, senior policy analyst at the College Board and a professor of economics at Skidmore College in New York, said the decline resulted from a change in the formula for calculating Pell grant awards.

“Grant aid has failed to keep pace with the posted tuition charges,” Robert Shireman, executive director of the Project on Student Debt, which is financed primarily by the Pew Charitable Trusts, said in a statement in response to the College Board report. “Income for most American families has stagnated, leaving students and their parents with little choice but to turn to loans.”

The College Board report, which is compiled annually, drew on a survey of 2,677 public and private nonprofit institutions, as well as data from government agencies and other organizations, like the National Association of State Student Grant and Aid Programs. The survey was sent out in October 2005, and collected by August this year.

In the current academic year, the average cost of tuition, fees, and room and board at public four-year universities, attended by about 35 percent of undergraduates, was $12,796, up 5.6 percent from $12,115 last year, according to the report. At private four-year colleges and universities, attended by 16 percent of undergraduates, those costs were far greater: $30,367, up 5.7 percent from last year.

There are not enough data to measure room and board costs at two-year public institutions, attended by 41 percent of undergraduates, but tuition and fees rose 4.2 percent to $2,272, up from $2,182 last year.

Asked to predict future changes in tuition, Ms. Baum told reporters, “We predict that it will go up, not down.”

Spikes In College Price Tags Not So Sharp (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0086225

By Jay Mathews
The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

Amid partisan finger-pointing over soaring college costs, a national report offered some good news yesterday: Average tuition and fees are not rising as fast as they did a few years ago.

The College Board said the increase in tuition and fees at public four-year colleges, although still higher than the national inflation rate, slowed for the third year in a row. Increases at private four-year colleges have also cooled off in recent years, although the average yearly price of attending a private college is $22,218, far more than the state school average of $5,836.

At least two Washington area institutions are emblematic of the trend. At the University of Maryland, in-state tuition and fees for undergraduates were unchanged this year. At George Washington University, the increase was only 3.9 percent, about equal to national inflation. GW spokeswoman Tracy Schario said it was "our lowest increase in more than two decades."

But the smaller increases this year at many colleges were made possible by major price increases earlier in the decade. Middle-class parents have discovered, to the pain of their wallets, that the general inflation rate and the college inflation rate are out of sync. Overall, the College Board reported, state school prices are up 35 percent from five years ago, even after adjusting for inflation.

This year, average tuition and fees increased 6.3 percent at four-year public colleges and 5.9 percent at four-year private colleges. The annual price for two-year public colleges went up 4.1 percent, to $2,272. The College Board said the national inflation rate for the same period was 3.82 percent.

At the University of Virginia, in-state tuition and fees rose 9.1 percent, to $8,035, and at George Mason University, those costs went up 9 percent, to $6,408. American University's tuition and fees rose 5.7 percent, to $29,673, and Georgetown University's tuition and fees increased about 6 percent.

Kalman A. Chany, author of the Princeton Review book "Paying for College Without Going Broke," said the data show that it remains difficult for families to pay for college, even if this year's increases were not so bad. He said parents and students should consider seeking scholarships and subsidized loans to make sure they do everything possible "to minimize the sticker price."

Leaders of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce gave dueling interpretations of the College Board data. Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon (R-Calif.), the committee chairman, blamed colleges for raising prices whenever Congress increases student aid. Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the committee's ranking member, said Congress should cut college loan interest rates and increase the value of federal Pell Grants for low-income students.

In some states this year, political candidates have accused state officials of letting tuition get too high -- a charge that Democratic gubernatorial challenger and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley has hurled at Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R). The College Board report says that federal grant aid did not keep up with inflation but that total student aid increased 3.7 percent last year even after inflation. Even without factoring in inflation, the report says, the average federal Pell Grant for low-income students fell by $120 per participant.

James A. Boyle, president of the College Parents of America, said: "Unfortunately, schools continue to raise their sticker prices because they can. The demand of college-bound students currently exceeds the supply, as the bulge of the baby boom echo makes its way through American high schools and competes to claim the relatively fixed number of available college seats."

Boyle said that in the next decade, demand will slacken and colleges will have to compete on price. "That is of little comfort to families today, however, whose budgets and levels of patience are being stretched to the breaking point," he said.

The College Board report indicates that few students pay full price for college. On average, full-time students at private four-year institutions receive about $9,000 in aid each year in the form of grants and tax benefits. The aid is about $3,100 a year at public four-year schools and $2,200 at public two-year colleges.

Chany said the College Board data show that families should look out for the possibility that some well-regarded private colleges would cost no more than similarly prestigious out-of-state public universities when all the costs are figured in.

"Average out-of-state tuition and fees at public four-year colleges are 71 percent of average private four-year tuition and fees," the report says. "But adding room and board, the cost of a year for an out-of-state student at a public four-year college is 77 percent of the average tuition, fees, room and board at a private four-year college." Chany said students with good but not great grades in high school might also find more aid available at private than at public schools.

As Tuition Soars, Federal Aid To College Students Falls (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho
The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0086226

At a time when employers say that almost every new job in the U.S. will require workers to have more than a high-school education, the chance that students at the bottom of the economic ladder can afford to finish college has taken a turn for the worse.

The College Board's latest annual reports on student aid and college pricing find that over the past five years tuition at public four-year universities has soared by a record-breaking 35% when adjusted for inflation. Meanwhile, spending on Pell Grants -- the biggest source of federal aid for low-income students -- fell for the first time in six years.

"There is no question that the bulk of the impact of that is falling on lower- and lower-middle-income students," says Donald Heller, a Pennsylvania State University professor who has studied access to higher education. "They are getting killed on the aid side, and they are getting killed on the tuition side."

The number of students from all income levels pursuing post-secondary education continues to grow. But to stay in school, educators say, low-income students are taking loans, using high-interest credit cards to pay tuition, working more hours, and opting for two-year schools.

Low-income students are choosing two-year colleges for financial reasons even though studies show more of them are academically qualified for four-year schools due to efforts by school districts to push them into tougher, college-prep courses. But only 23% of community college students earn a bachelor's degree -- a vital credential in today's workplace -- within six years, as compared with 63% of students at four-year institutions, according to the College Board, a New York-based nonprofit that administers the SAT college admissions test and analyzes higher-education data.

The shrinking Pell Grant funding "doesn't give us the chance to attend college and get the degree we need to get the earnings that we should," says Kennel Etienne, a former Pell recipient from Revere, Mass. Mr. Etienne, 23, has been struggling to earn money to return to college since he dropped out of Mount Ida College, in Newton., Mass., for financial reasons two years ago.

Pell Grants are often used as an index of how accessible higher education is to lower-income students. About $12.7 billion in Pell Grants were awarded for the 2005-2006 academic year, down 3% from $13.1 billion the previous academic year. The average grant per recipient slipped to $2,354 from $2,474. The decline came after the Bush administration rejiggered the eligibility formula: It reduced how much money families in many states were assumed to be paying in state and local taxes, which increased their after-tax incomes and made many ineligible for the grants.

The vast majority of the 5.4 million students receiving Pell Grants come from families earning less than $40,000 a year. Despite much debate in Congress, the value of the maximum Pell Grant, $4,050, hasn't budged in three years even as the price tag for attending a four-year public university has soared. The maximum Pell grant met 33% of the average price of tuition, fees, room and board at a public four-year school in 2005-06, down from 42% in 2001-02.

The increase in tuition and fees at the four-year publics was a relatively moderate 6.3% last year, or 2.4% after adjusting for inflation. But College Board data shows that the overall 35% inflation-adjusted increase since 2001-2002 is the biggest five-year jump since it began gathering such data in the 1970s. It's also more than triple the 11% inflation-adjusted increase at private colleges. Private colleges face many of the same cost increases as their public-sector brethren. Over the past five years, utilities costs for colleges and universities have risen by 72%, according to the College Board, while costs for employee benefits are up 31%.

Neither "student-aid funds nor family incomes are keeping pace with college prices," Gaston Caperton, the College Board president, said yesterday. "This is a serious problem that must be addressed."

About 35% of the nation's 15.2 million undergraduates attend four-year public universities and about 16% go to four-year private schools, according to the College Board. About 41% attend two-year public schools, with most of the rest going to for-profit colleges, such as the University of Phoenix.

The steep tuition increases for public colleges come as many state legislatures, facing growing pressure to fund other priorities such as Medicaid, prisons and primary and secondary education, have reduced in recent years appropriations for higher education on a per-student basis. State and local government appropriations were $5,825 per full-time student in 2004-2005, down from $6,846 per student in 2000-2001 after adjusting for inflation, the College Board said.

To compensate for the pressure on appropriations, four-year publics have raised tuition, making bargains harder to find. At the University of Texas at Austin, once considered one of the sector's best buys, tuition has increased by 47% over the past three years. Meanwhile, at California public universities, where the cost of attending was minimal until the 1990s, tuition and fees have soared by 40% in the past five years, to as much as $7,000 a year at the University of California campuses, the state's most selective schools.

The College Board reports come amid increasing debate over higher education policies that appear to favor affluent students. Many universities, seeking to boost their standing in the college rankings, have increasingly used their own resources to award merit aid to top-ranking students who have no financial need.

DOJ_NMG_0086227

According to one recent study, only 10.8% of undergraduates at 19 leading public and private universities come from families in the bottom 25% of annual income. In recent months, both Harvard and Princeton said they planned to drop early admissions, saying that such programs, which are commonplace among selective colleges, favor the already-advantaged.

At the same time, corporate leaders concerned about the nation's future competitiveness are calling for students from a broader range of backgrounds to attend college. "We think it's critically important," says Arthur Rothkopf, senior vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "We think 90% of the newly created jobs in this country are going to require some post-secondary education."

College Aid Is Up, But Tuitions Are, Too (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, October 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — College tuition prices are up, no surprise. And to a lesser extent, so is total student aid.

But federal Pell Grant funding for low-income students declined for the first time in six years, and students borrowed more from private lenders last year than ever before.

Those are just a few of a wide range of findings related to the cost of attending college that were released Tuesday by the College Board, a non-profit whose members include more than 5,000 schools, colleges and education groups.

Published tuition and fee increases continued to slow, the report says:

·Public four-year university prices for in-state students rose 6.3%, to $5,836, vs. 7.1% last year, after two years of double-digit increases.

·Private four-year university prices were up 5.9%, the same rate of increase as last year, to $22,218.

·Public two-year college prices rose 4.1%, to $2,272, down from the 5.4% increase last year.

The report cautions that pricing patterns vary by region and have grown “increasingly complex,” in part because some colleges charge different amounts depending on what year a student enrolled or what they're majoring in.

Also, the average net prices — that is, the amount students pay after financial aid is factored in — are “significantly lower” than published prices, though they are increasing, too. But the report notes that financial aid averages conceal the wide range of aid awards; some students get a full ride, others pay the full amount. And federal tax benefits and a trend toward non-need-based state and institutional aid benefit middle- and upper-income students more than lower-income students, it says.

While private-university prices are on average higher, public four-year universities have struggled most with controlling the amount students end up paying. Their inflation-adjusted tuition increased 35% over the past five years, compared with 11% for private four-year universities. And net price increased even more dramatically at publics — 69% in inflation-adjusted dollars over that period vs. 9% for privates.

Also, students at public universities on average take longer to graduate (6.2 years vs. 5.3 at private universities). That adds to the cost of attending college, both because of additional tuition charges and loss of potential income.

The report also notes that when related expenses are considered, the differences in the costs of attending two-year and four-year public institutions narrow. Published tuition charges at two-year schools represent 39% of the average four-year school, for example. But when room and board, books and supplies, and transportation are included, the cost of attending two-year college ($12,300) is 75% of the cost of attending a four-year public college ($16,400).

Student aid, including state, institutional and federal grants, increased 3.7% to $134.8 billion in 2005-06, compared with 3% the previous year, the report says. But funding for the Pell Grants, the federal government's main need-based aid program, was down from $13.1 billion in 2004-05 to $12.7 billion last year, and the average amount per recipient dropped $120, from $2,474 to $2,354. Last year, the maximum Pell Grant, $4,050, covered 33% of tuition at public four-year institutions; four years ago, it covered 42%.

The decline was no surprise; the report attributes it mostly to a technical change in the formula for eligibility.

Nevertheless, in light of intensifying concerns about access to college, the drop is “greatly disturbing,” says David Ward, president of the American Council on Education, an umbrella group for colleges and universities.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, though, took colleges to task. “Parents and students must understand why costs are so high and what they are getting for their money,” she said. She also said institutions and states must do more to increase need-based aid.

Rep. Howard McKeon, R-Calif., head of the House education committee, also took a swipe. Noting that federal student aid has nearly doubled in the past decade, he said, “No matter how much student aid rises from one year to the next, an equally dramatic spike in college costs follows.”

Median debt levels of graduating students are “almost certain” to have increased in recent years, the report says, because neither grant aid nor family incomes have kept pace with cost hikes. The median student debt for bachelor's degree recipients in 2003-04, the latest year for which statistics are available, was $19,300. Median debt levels for graduates increased sharply between 1995-96 and 1999-2000, but 2003-04 graduates "were no more deeply in debt than those who had graduated four years earlier," the report says.

DOJ_NMG_0086228

Federal loans remain the largest source of student loans. But the report says private loans are growing more common. Last year, they accounted for 20% of all such borrowing; a decade ago, it was about 4%.

That's "worrisome," says Robert Shireman of the non-profit Project on Student Debt, because private loans are riskier. "It's more important than ever to ensure that student loans help, rather than hurt, responsible borrowers."

Spitzer Is Good For Business (WSJ)

By Donald G. Kempf Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Eliot Spitzer looks like a shoo-in to be New York's next governor. Given his reputation, those who operate businesses (or do business) in the state may be fearful that there are dark days ahead. They shouldn't be. Based on my experiences with him, I expect Mr. Spitzer to be a strong -- and successful -- advocate for sound and sensible economic growth. I see good times ahead for business interests, not bad.

Mr. Spitzer has been accused of overreaching as New York's attorney general, operating outside of his areas of expertise when dealing with federal securities laws and such. That's not what I saw as the general counsel of a large New York financial institution. Mr. Spitzer often had a better grasp of the underlying facts, legal implications and policy considerations than many from the federal regulatory agencies. Discussions (sometimes debates) with him on the substance of matters were both focused and fruitful. He was especially constructive when it came to searching for sensible solutions that would facilitate firms resolving problems and getting back to running their businesses for the benefit of customers, employees and shareholders.

Moreover, because he is both smart and self-assured, Mr. Spitzer is willing to engage where others at times seek to hide behind their regulatory status. Ask him, "How can you justify that?" and he will answer you. (Sometimes quite aggressively, to be sure, but he will answer you.) Ask the same of someone from a federal agency involved in the same matter and the reply you're apt to get is often something like, "We don't have to justify (or even explain) our actions to you. We are the ones officially charged with this area of responsibility. We have made our determination and that is the end of it."

Mr. Spitzer does not welsh on deals either -- as some public servants seem wont to do. Their excuse/rationale runs something like this: "We don't represent a 'regular' client -- we represent a 'special' client, the public. Therefore, if we enter into a deal but later think of something else we want to do instead, it's fine for us to renege." Not Mr. Spitzer: When he gives his word, he keeps it. As one senior financial institution executive once put it, "In his dealings with us, Eliot has never done something he said he wouldn't do or failed to do something he said he would do."

Still, the story line runs something like this: Why is this guy Spitzer "meddling" in stuff over which the feds already exercise jurisdiction? The answer, of course, goes all the way back to the founding of the country and the federalist system we adopted back then. At the end of the day, far from being an officious intermeddler, Mr. Spitzer has proven to be a catalyst for constructive change.

When it comes to fashioning sound public policy in areas where legitimate business interests are at stake, Mr. Spitzer has demonstrated on many occasions that he is neither anti-business nor a knee-jerk reactor. He placed New York among the states that supported the Bush administration's consent decree ending the Microsoft case, rather than among those states that opposed it. He has long been a supporter of and also an advocate for sound reforms in the area of tort law. He has also been actively involved in groups seeking to strike a sensible balance between individual rights and community safety.

The comprehensive strategy Mr. Spitzer outlined last month "to make New York the best place in America to do business" sets forth a number of decidedly business-friendly initiatives. Included are the prospect of lower worker compensation premiums; reform of the archaic Wicks Law, which drives up construction costs in public projects; and a streamlining of the regulatory system to help break the logjam, providing clearer permitting standards and shortening and simplifying the regulations. There's more, of course, and, if he can pull much of it off -- and based on Mr. Spitzer's past performance it seems like a good bet he can -- it spells a healthy and positive business climate for the state.

My political heroes are Ronald Reagan, Newt Gingrich and George Bush -- W., not H.W. So it came as something of a surprise to me that, the more I dealt with Eliot Spitzer, the higher I came to regard him and the more respect I had for him as a public servant. I guess, as they say, the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Mr. Kempf was executive vice president, chief legal officer and secretary of Morgan Stanley until his retirement in 2005.

Rice Says 'Axis Of Evil' Proven Right (AP)

By Anne Gearan

DOJ_NMG_0086229

AP, October 25, 2006

Recent events in Iran and North Korea support President Bush's 2002 claim that those nations were part of an "axis of evil," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday.

After discussions of the North Korean nuclear test and the anti-Semitic remarks of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, radio host Sean Hannity asked Rice about the axis remark.

"You think of some of the world reaction to the president's use of the word 'axis of evil,' and then you see how events have been unfolding," Hannity remarked.

"It was a pretty good analysis, wasn't it?" Rice replied. "It really was."

Bush used the term to describe Iraq, Iran and North Korea, states he said sponsor terrorism and seek weapons of mass destruction. Iraq's dictator, Saddam Hussein, was toppled the next year in a U.S.-led coup, but autocratic governments remain in place in the other two countries, and both have nuclear programs that alarm the West.

The remark in Bush's State of the Union address drew immediate criticism as too shrill and potentially damaging to U.S. foreign policy. In the case of North Korea, it has been blamed for souring what might have been an opportunity for the U.S. to engage the reclusive Pyongyang leadership and negotiate an end to its nuclear weapons program. The Bush administration says North Korea was determined to cheat and that it pursued a more effective strategy of international diplomacy.

"The president three years ago realized that in order to manage the North Korean nuclear problem, a problem that's been going for decades, we have to have a regional coalition," Rice said in the interview. "This isn't something the United States was going to be able to do alone."

Proof of the strategy's success came when China voted this month to impose sanctions on its neighbor and ally North Korea, she said.

On Iran, Rice said that nation's people deserve a better leader. She predicted the U.N. Security Council will approve sanctions against Iran over its disputed nuclear program "in the next few weeks."

Hannity asked Rice about her career plans, including what Rice has called her dream job of running the NFL. She did not seek the NFL commissioner's job when it came open earlier this year, saying she still had work to do at the State Department.

"Yeah, I lost that, " Rice said. "It came up a little early."

Hannity tried a political question Rice has shot down for months: "You have no intention of running for president?"

"No," Rice said.

"Never?"

"No."

Bolton: Sanctions 'help Regime Change' (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

Imposing economic and political sanctions against Iran and North Korea will help democratic forces in those countries as Washington pursues its "ultimate objective" of regime change, John Bolton, the US ambassador to the United Nations, said on Tuesday.

Mr Bolton's comments, to Fox News, reflect the views of hardliners in the Bush administration who doubt that the threat of nuclear proliferation can be dealt with through negotiations.

Although the US denies it is pursuing a "regime change" policy towards what it calls the "axis of evil", Mr Bolton's linking of sanctions with "democratic forces" are likely to complicate delicate coalition-building efforts by Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state.

Last week Ms Rice went to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia to co-ordinate the implementation of UN sanctions imposed against North Korea in response to its underground nuclear weapon test. This week the focus shifts to New York where the US and Europe are working on a sanctions resolution for Iran.

European diplomats said they had clashed with Mr Bolton, rejecting his attempt to include a provision that would stop Russia supplying nuclear fuel to the Iranian reactor under construction at Bushehr.

Some European officials suggested Mr Bolton was "freelancing" and did not have the backing of Washington for a position that was sure to antagonise Russia. Diplomats said France, Germany and the UK would put forward a narrowly focused draft resolution soon. US officials declined to comment.

Asked by Fox News why the UN did not try to encourage political change in Iran and North Korea, Mr Bolton said talk of changing authoritarian regimes into democracies would "make a lot of countries unhappy".

DOJ_NMG_0086230

He went on: “But I think that’s something the United States and its friends should be pursuing on their own, because that is our ultimate objective. If you had countries that were responsive to the public will – unlike, say, North Korea or Iran – I think the odds are considerably reduced that they’d want to spend their scarce resources on nuclear weapons.”

The US, he said, wanted to mobilise international support to isolate those regimes economically and politically. “That puts pressure on them internally. I think that helps democratic forces in those countries or in their diasporas.”

But he also suggested that change would not happen soon.

Analysts in Tehran say his remarks will not encourage Iran to resume talks under the US-imposed precondition that it first suspend its uranium enrichment programme.

The US expressed concern that Iran will start up a second set of enrichment centrifuges at its Natanz plant in defiance of a UN demand for suspension. Iran insists it will only enrich the fuel, under international inspection, to the low level needed for a civilian reactor.

West Wants Iran Technology Sales Banned (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, October 25, 2006

The U.S. and its allies want the U.N. Security Council to ban the sale of missile and atomic technology to Iran and end most U.N. help for its nuclear programs — moves diplomats said Tuesday are narrowly focused in hopes of winning Russian and Chinese backing for sanctions.

The diplomats, who spoke with The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the draft resolution was not yet public, said the proposal also would commit U.N. member nations to denying entry to Iranian officials involved in developing missiles or nuclear systems.

A Security Council resolution passed last week imposed similar sanctions on the sale or transfer of technology that could contribute to North Korea's nuclear and ballistic missile programs after that nation's test explosion of a nuclear bomb.

One of the diplomats described all three measures aimed at Iran as moderate in impact, saying that was an attempt to win Russian and Chinese support. Moscow and Beijing could be formally presented with the draft later this week, the diplomat said.

Both Russia and China have agreed in principle to imposing sanctions over Iran's defiance of a council ultimatum to freeze uranium enrichment and sharply improve cooperation with the U.N. probe of suspect Iranian atomic activities.

But both continue to publicly push for dialogue instead of U.N. punishment, despite the collapse last month of a European Union attempt to entice Iran into talks. The EU proposed Iran at least temporarily freeze enrichment as a condition for multilateral talks meant to erase suspicions it may be trying to build nuclear arms in violation of its treaty commitments.

As permanent members of the council, Russia and China hold the power to veto its actions, as do the United States, France and Britain, which drew up the sanctions resolution.

Iran insists it won't halt uranium enrichment, which it says is intended solely to produce fuel for nuclear reactors that will generate electricity. But enrichment also can produce material for nuclear warheads, and the U.S. and others are suspicious of Iran's intentions.

Canceling technical assistance to Iran from the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, would do little to ease such fears. But as the first such withdrawal of IAEA help, it would send a strong signal of international displeasure with Tehran.

IAEA technical programs, which are freely available to all member countries, are restricted to medical or agricultural help, nuclear safety expertise and other peaceful applications that cannot be diverted for weapons purposes.

Typical projects, as listed in a confidential IAEA document seen by AP, involve the disposal of radioactive waste produced by nuclear reactors and the use of narrowly targeted radiotherapy for tumors.

In a bow to Russia, the draft resolution exempts IAEA technical cooperation on operational safety and legal advice at Iran's Bushehr nuclear facility being built by the Russians.

The facility would be Iran's first atomic power plant and the Tehran government recently allocated about $245 million to finish it. The facility is now projected to go on line in late 2007, nearly a year later than originally envisaged.

It was unclear how any eventual sanctions might impact Russia's planned sale of 29 Tor-M1 air defense missile systems to Iran. Analysts in Russia have said Moscow might scuttle the deal as part of a give-and-take with Washington over sanctions.

One of the diplomats who spoke with AP said Washington had wanted to include Bushehr and ban all IAEA technical cooperation but reluctantly agreed with Britain and France that Russia would not go along.

A U.N. official said Tehran would probably depict any sanctions as a U.S.-inspired blow against Iranian programs that aid the poor by using nuclear technology to treat the sick and to increase agricultural yields by reducing crop pests.

DOJ_NMG_0086231

Additionally, he said, Iran will argue that no evidence has been found proving it seeks to make nuclear weapons despite more than three years of IAEA probes. As such, Tehran will say it has a continued right to IAEA technical aid as an agency member in good standing, he said.

Iran has shrugged off the threat of sanctions. Diplomats told AP on Monday that experts had begun testing a second enrichment facility at Natanz, in central Iraq, over the past few weeks in defiance of the council's ban on such activities.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable for reactor fuel but not weapons — in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz.

Iran has said it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz by the end of this year, but experts have said industrial-scale production of enriched uranium would require 54,000 centrifuges.

N Korea 'has No Plan Yet' For Second Test (FT)

By Richard McGregor And Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 25, 2006

China said on Tuesday North Korea had no immediate plans to conduct a second nuclear test, damping speculation of another blast following the imposition of United Nations' sanctions on the reclusive state.

However, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesman suggested that Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, had warned in a meeting with a senior Chinese politician last week that Pyongyang could test another bomb if the pressure on it was not eased.

"He [Kim] indicated that [North Korea] has no plans for a second nuclear test but if other countries impose more pressure, then [North Korea] may take further steps," the spokesman, Liu Jianbao, said.

The South Korean and Japanese governments both said last week that they had detected activity suggesting North Korea might be preparing to conduct a second nuclear test.

This followed reports that US spy satellites had detected "suspicious vehicle movements" that could signal preparations for another test, and a defiant statement from North Korea warning the US "not to miscalculate".

However, such fears have failed to materialise and many analysts think Pyongyang will try to drag out the crisis for as long as possible.

Kim Tae-woo, a nuclear specialist at the Korea Institute of Defence Analyses, said he did not expect a second test in the near future.

"Even though they need more nuclear tests, they will use this as a card to play when they feel really threatened. Then they will conduct a second test," Mr Kim said.

But because the first test was considered a technical failure – the small size of the blast suggested the weapon had not fully detonated – it was likely that North Korea would want to try to iron out the problems then eventually test again, analysts said.

The same applied to the intercontinental ballistic missile that failed shortly after it was launched in July.

In a regular news briefing in Beijing, Mr Liu warned the international community not to do anything that could further escalate tensions on the Korean peninsula.

"All parties should not wilfully interpret or expand the sanctions," he said. "Sanctions are not the end. They should serve the goal of peacefully settling the crisis through dialogue and consultation."

Mr Liu also said he was unaware of any moves by China to reduce its food or energy aid to North Korea, something the US has long encouraged it to do as a lever to bring Pyongyang to heel on the nuclear issue.

Beijing has been critical of Washington's imposition of financial sanctions but otherwise the two sides have been working unusually closely on the nuclear issue.

North Korea has expressed a willingness to return to the six-party talks, which also involve Russia, South Korea and Japan, on its nuclear programme, but only if the US lifts financial sanctions.

China Says N. Korea Not Planning Test (AP)

By Alexa Olesen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

China gave its first full public account Tuesday of its mission to North Korea, saying it got no apology from top leader Kim Jong Il for the atomic explosion but did receive assurances there were no plans for a second nuclear test.

The North's reclusive leader also expressed a willingness to return to six-nation talks over its nuclear program if financial restrictions levied by the U.S. are first resolved, said Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao.

Chinese State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan met with Kim last week during a trip to Pyongyang with Beijing's top nuclear envoy and vice foreign minister that analysts and diplomats had called a critical opportunity to assess the North's intentions.

The meeting resulted in no breakthroughs, but China cast the discussions in a positive light.

DOJ_NMG_0086232

Tang was told during meetings with Kim and other North Korean officials that the regime has no plans currently to carry out a second nuclear test, Liu said. "But if it faces pressure, North Korea reserves the right to take further actions," he added, citing Tang.

A second nuclear test has been widely believed to be a possibility. Earlier this month, U.S. media reported that Pyongyang may be preparing for another blast, citing suspicious activity at a suspected test site in the country's northeast.

But on Tuesday, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported the U.S. military had not detected signs of preparations for a second atomic test.

Despite the apparently conciliatory tone of the Pyongyang meeting, Liu said Kim did not apologize for his regime's nuclear test, as some South Korean media had reported.

"These reports are certainly not accurate," Liu said. "We haven't heard any information that Kim Jong Il apologized for the test."

North Korean officials told the Chinese envoy Pyongyang was willing to return to international negotiations on its nuclear program but wants "certain questions, including the matter of U.S. financial sanctions against it, resolved first," Liu said at a regular press briefing.

The U.S. has sought to cut off the North's access to international banking as punishment for alleged counterfeiting of U.S. dollars and other illicit activity. Pyongyang has denied the charges and boycotted six-nation talks on its nuclear program until the U.S. ends the crackdown.

"All countries involved in the six-party talks believe the talks should be resumed but of course the parties do not all agree on how," Liu said, referring to the talks Beijing has hosted since 2003. They include China, the two Koreas, the United States, Russia and Japan.

"Consultations are required to find a way acceptable to all," he said.

The North Koreans also said countries should not "willfully interpret or expand the sanctions" imposed by the United Nations because of the test, according to Liu.

The United States and Japan are among countries that have imposed additional sanctions on the North. Liu said he had no information to indicate that China had already, or was considering, cutting its food and energy assistance to North Korea.

Beijing, as the North's main ally and source of aid, has the greatest leverage over the regime. However, China has been reluctant to pressure the North, in part out of fear that a collapse of social order there would result in a flood of refugees over their shared border.

Instead, it has been involved in a flurry of diplomatic activity aimed at lessening tensions and preventing the crisis from escalating since Pyongyang announced its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited Beijing last week and Ban Ki-moon, the next U.N. secretary-general and South Korea's foreign minister, was scheduled to arrive in Beijing on Friday to discuss the standoff with top Chinese leaders.

Ban said he plans to use his new position as U.N. chief, which he'll assume at the beginning of next year, to seek a peaceful resolution of the nuclear issue. He also said Seoul fully backs the U.N. sanctions imposed on the North as punishment for the nuclear test.

South Korea has yet to outline any specific action it plans to take to enforce the sanctions. The U.S. has urged the South to join an anti-proliferation initiative, and to take steps for more accountability in joint economic projects with the North.

Ban said Seoul was still reviewing its policies "to bring them closer in line" with the U.N. measures.

South Korea's unification minister Lee Jong-seok, who is in charge of relations with North Korea, offered to resign on Tuesday to take responsibility for the North's nuclear test, the presidential office said Wednesday. Lee has been a strong supporter of engagement with North Korea, and his critics accuse him of being pro-Pyongyang.

Associated Press writers Jae-soon Chang and Burt Herman in Seoul, South Korea, and Kozo Mizoguchi in Tokyo contributed to this report.

China And US Closing Ranks Over North Korea Issue: US (AFP)

AFP, October 25, 2006

NADI, Fiji - The US and China "have never been closer" in the wake of North Korea's nuclear test earlier this month, US Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said.

Hill, who has responsibility for East Asia and the Pacific, has been travelling recently with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in East Asia to try to ensure a united front on the application of UN sanctions against North Korea after its nuclear test on October 9.

"In China we felt we were speaking with one voice on this issue," Hill told journalists on the sidelines of a meeting of Pacific Island Forum leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0086233

"At no time have we felt closer together than we have felt in the wake of these North Korean provocations."

"I think the Chinese understand that the North Korean provocations, the decision to proceed with a nuclear weapons programme is really something quite beyond the pale and something we need to all speak with one voice about," Hill said.

"It always used to be that the Chinese would ask for more patience and we'd ask the Chinese for less patience but I think today we are really working better together."

"Ultimately the proof of the pudding will be if we can get North Korea back to the negotiating table and out of these programmes."

China is Pyongyang's closest ally and Beijing's foreign ministry said Tuesday that North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il had told Chinese envoy Tang Jiaxuan last week that a second nuclear test was not currently planned.

However, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesman added that increased international pressure could trigger more action.

Rice Proposes Asia Form Security Alliance (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

BEIJING -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is urging Asian nations to form a regional security organization to address common threats, suggesting that the six-nation forum dealing with North Korea -- which includes China and Russia -- could be a useful starting point.

Such an organization would not come even close to NATO's integrated political and military structures, but it would assure more effective responses to crises such as Pyongyang's recent nuclear test, Miss Rice told reporters in Beijing during a regional tour last week.

A senior State Department official said the secretary will elaborate on the concept during a speech at the Heritage Foundation in Washington today.

"That you've had no way to even have conversations about common security threats is a problem for the region, and it gets exposed when you have something like this," Miss Rice said of the North Korean nuclear issue.

"There are highly developed security arrangements all throughout Europe -- as a matter of fact, some people think too many," Miss Rice said. "I don't think this region is probably going to develop an organizational structure anything like what you have in Europe."

But a more informal group, perhaps growing out of the six-party process that includes the United States, Japan and South Korea, is not only possible, but also necessary, she said. U.S. officials said Australia, Indonesia, the Philippines and other countries also would be good candidates for a security organization.

"Those mechanisms, I think, are going to need to come into being and begin to give the region a way to have this conversation," Miss Rice said, adding that the six-party framework "is a first chance to do some of that."

The Bush administration, which has refused to negotiate with North Korea bilaterally, proposed the six-party talks in 2003 on the grounds that it would be more difficult for Pyongyang to break an agreement that involved several countries, including its benefactor China.

"The fact that we can all talk about proliferation issues with one another, defense issues with one another -- eventually, I think, more articulated versions of all of those -- is something that this region has really lacked," Miss Rice said.

Miss Rice did not say whether North Korea, the other participant in the six-party talks, would be invited. But another official familiar with interagency talks on the issue said membership could be held out as a reward to Pyongyang if it dismantles its nuclear program.

The official said the proposal was first developed four years ago under Secretary of State Colin L. Powell but sidelined by opposition from Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Some officials remain wary of anything that smacks of rewarding North Korea after its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

Analysts generally agree that a regional security organization in Asia is necessary, and point to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation as a model. APEC heads of state meet each November for a high-profile summit on economic issues. This year's meeting will be held in Vietnam.

But several diplomats and analysts expressed doubts that China in particular would sign on to a security arrangement that institutionalizes the dominance of the United States in the Asia-Pacific region.

Critics of the plan note that China has refused to invite the United States to join the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, which deals with Central Asian security issues, and has excluded the United States from joining the East Asia Economic Summit.

Many APEC members complained at the 2003 summit in Bangkok that President Bush wanted security to dominate the agenda while they preferred to talk about economics and business.

DOJ_NMG_0086234

But U.S. officials said that, had there been a forum at which Asian security could be discussed, Mr. Bush would not have been accused of trying to "hijack" the APEC agenda with issues such as terrorism and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Jamie Metzl, executive vice president of the Asia Society in New York, noted that Asian security also is a topic at the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' Regional Forum, which takes place every summer. But, he said, ASEAN "doesn't have the robustness required to address the region's needs as a whole."

Michael Pillsbury, a specialist on China, said the secretary's proposal will challenge China's government.

"This will fuel the debate in China between hard-liners and the moderates about whether to accept this constructive offer," he said. "This will revive the debate over China's refusal to join the U.S. as a responsible stakeholder."

Michael E. O'Hanlon, senior fellow in foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said a security organization is a good idea, "but it will have an inauspicious start if we fail utterly to deal with the North Korean nuclear threat using the same putative grouping."

Miss Rice credited the six-party process, and China's participation in particular, with the relative ease with which the United States negotiated a unanimous U.N. Security Council resolution punishing North Korea for its nuclear test.

"Thirty years you haven't been able to get a Security Council resolution on North Korea, and when you get one, it's Chapter 7, it's 15-0, and China is at the center of it," Miss Rice said.

Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter is invoked only when the 15-member council determines that international peace and security are being threatened. The North Korea resolution imposed trade and financial sanctions related to Pyongyang's weapons of mass destruction programs and banned imports and exports of illicit materials and equipment.

Test Sparks N. Korea Backlash In Japan (AP)

By Hans Greimel

AP, October 25, 2006

When a bamboo grove mysteriously erupted in flames and nearly engulfed an office compound of Japan's biggest pro-North Korean organization, So Chung-on was hardly surprised.

Harassment of Japan's insular North Korean community, the biggest outside the homeland or China, dates back decades. But animosity has flared to new levels since North Korea stunned the world with its nuclear test.

"The atmosphere in Japan is now the worst," said So, director of international affairs at Chongryon, an umbrella group acting as de facto embassy for tens of thousands of ethnic Koreans who live in Asia's richest capitalist society yet see North Korea as home.

No one was hurt in the Oct. 17 arson attack, and the blaze was put out before it could torch local Chongryon offices. But it was one of several outbursts putting people on edge — including angry protests outside Chongryon facilities, threatening phone calls to North Korea-backed private schools and a severed pinkie finger mailed to the group's headquarters with a note promising "punishment from heaven."

North Koreans in Japan have long been vilified as a communist fifth column, but with Tokyo leading a worldwide campaign to sanction Pyongyang for its nuclear test, they now stand in an unwanted spotlight.

Japan, lying within easy range of North Korean missiles, is especially jittery about its neighbor's atomic arsenal. After the Oct. 9 test, Tokyo banned North Korean imports, barred port entry of North Korean ships and prohibited most North Korean nationals from entering the country.

Chongryon has not commented on the nuclear test, but was quick to condemn the backlash.

The measures will likely strangle North Korean businesses in Japan and divide families with roots in both countries. It could also finally kill off reconciliation between rival camps of North and South Koreans in Japan.

"Koreans who have nothing to do with the nuclear test have become the victim," Chongryon said in a statement. "The ratcheting up of sanctions severely threatens the rights and lifestyle of Koreans in Japan."

There are some 600,000 ethnic Koreans among 127 million Japanese, most of them descendants of people who moved here voluntarily or by force during Japan's 1910-1945 colonial rule of the Korean peninsula. About 200,000 are affiliated with Pyongyang.

All Koreans in Japan face discrimination in Japan. All Koreans were stripped of their Japanese citizenship after World War II and those in Japan found themselves in a society that often looked down on them as former colonial subjects.

Yet given the long-standing animosity between Tokyo and Pyongyang, North Koreans face especially limited economic opportunities, confined to tight-knit community-run businesses. Students who attend North Korean schools find it all but impossible to enter public universities.

DOJ_NMG_0086235

Chongryon functions like an embassy because Japan and North Korea have no diplomatic ties. Its walled headquarters in Tokyo is guarded by police. Inside, visitors are greeted by a giant mural of North Korea's founding father Kim Il Sung and his son, current leader Kim Jong Il.

The current backlash began in July, after North Korea conducted internationally condemned missile tests.

Since then, there have been 130 cases of harassment and intimidation against North Korean students, Chongryon said. The pace quickened after the nuclear test, with two arson attacks against Chongryon facilities, including the bamboo incident in the city of Mito.

Tokyo's sanctions are meant to squeeze North Korea's economy and pressure Pyongyang into giving up its nuclear ambitions. But in reality, North Korean trade with Japan tumbled 85 percent from 2001, to a paltry $195 million last year. Analysts say any additional crackdown will have limited impact overseas.

But in Japan, it will dig deep into North Korean businesses that rely on importing manufactured goods like cheap men's suits, marine and agriculture products, like clams and mushrooms, and raw materials such as coal.

Meanwhile, banning North Korean ships will shut the doors on the most popular way for North Koreans to visit relatives back home, and the new immigration restrictions will further limit travel.

Chongryon's future is anything but bright, said David C. Kang, a North Korea expert at Dartmouth University.

Loyalty toward Chongryon started fading in the 1990s when North Korea's economy flat-lined and famines killed an estimated 2 million people. Then, in 2002, Kim Jong Il shocked the world by admitting North Korean agents had been kidnapping Japanese citizens to train communist spies.

Today, many North Koreans simply opt for South Korean or Japanese citizenship to escape the stigma.

Chongryon tried to bolster its support by striking a landmark reconciliation accord with the South Korean association in Japan earlier this year. But the nuclear crisis scuttled that too.

"The North Korean community is dwindling, for both assimilation in Japan and also because it's such a sinking ship," Kang said.

General Says U.S. Could Beat N. Korea (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, October 25, 2006

The U.S. military would prevail in a war against North Korea but at a greater cost in lives than if the United States were not already fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said Tuesday.

"It would not be as clean as we would like it to be, but it would certainly be sure, and the outcome would not be in doubt," said Gen. Peter Pace.

He told a Pentagon news conference that the U.S. military has plenty of people available to fight wars beyond Iraq and Afghanistan, but he acknowledged that U.S.-based ground combat units are not fully equipped.

"We have 2 million folks who can start protecting this nation anywhere else we need them to tomorrow, if we need them to," Pace said when a reporter asked what sort of threat North Korea's military poses.

The fight, however, would be messier than if the U.S. military did not have 147,000 troops tied up in Iraq and about 20,000 in Afghanistan.

"It would be more brute force, wherever we might have to go next, than it would be if we weren't already involved in the war we have going on in Iraq and Afghanistan," Pace said. "Why? Because you need precision intelligence to drop precision munitions. And a lot of our precision intelligence assets are currently being used in the Gulf region. So some of those would not be available if you had to go someplace else."

As a result there would be more unintended damage inflicted, he added.

"You end up more like a World War II, Korean War campaign," he said, adding that he was not making any predictions. "I'm just saying that, on a scale, you're going to have to use more brute force to get the job done" in North Korea.

Pace said U.S. intelligence can determine the size of the North Korean military but it cannot provide an equally important piece of information in assessing the threat of war: the intent of North Korea's leaders.

"What is not knowable is the intent of the leadership in North Korea to use or not use that power at any given time," he said. "And applying Western logic to the leadership in Korea is not something that I would personally want to get my future on."

Concerns about North Korea's intentions have grown in recent months following its July missile tests and its underground nuclear test, which prompted the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on North Korea.

Pace said he had seen no indication that North Korean forces have been placed on a higher state of alert.

"To my knowledge, the North Koreans' status of their armed forces is stable," he said. "I mean, they haven't raised or lowered any particular parts of their readiness to cause any kind of alarm."

DOJ_NMG_0086236

Across South Korea, Softer Feelings Toward The North (NYT)

By Martin Fackler

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

BUNDANG, South Korea, Oct. 22 — With news about the North Korean nuclear crisis flashing on the living room television, Kim Yoon-sup unleashed a verbal barrage of his own at the heavily armed Communist nation, some 60 miles north of this wealthy Seoul suburb.

From a sofa in his son's high-rise condominium, the 79-year-old Korean War veteran blasted the North for murdering its domestic opponents, starving its population, and amassing legions of tanks and cannons. Mr. Kim, a retired air force colonel, also criticized his own country's policy of engagement, which had failed to stop the North's nuclear test earlier this month.

But asked if South Korea should sever its growing trade and investment ties with the North, as many in the United States advocate, his answer was a firm no. His country must continue engagement, he said, to avoid either backing the government into a corner or causing further economic hardship for its people.

"We can't be too harsh," he said. "North and South, we share the same blood, after all. Of course, it's good to help them." His son, daughter-in-law and three grandchildren all agreed.

Once fervently anti-Communist, South Korea has slowly parted ways with the United States, its largest ally and wartime protector, on how to deal with the North. Across age groups and political persuasions, most South Koreans now appear to believe that their nation has no choice but to keep building ties with the North, despite the widespread shock and anger here over its nuclear test.

This bedrock of public sentiment underlies the different responses to the crisis by South Korea and the United States. Many in Washington have called for tougher sanctions or even a naval blockade to further isolate the North's impoverished government and force it to relinquish its nuclear ambitions. But Seoul has been reluctant to tighten the economic screws on the North, hoping instead to entice it to the bargaining table with increased links with the outside world.

This softer approach is a result of a deeper evolution in public perception here since the end of the cold war and South Korea's subsequent emergence as an Asian economic powerhouse. The changes were reflected in the personal political odyssey of the Kim family, three generations of whom gathered on a Sunday evening to discuss their perceptions of the North.

The elder Mr. Kim, the family patriarch, was born in what is now North Korea and fled the brutality of the fledgling Communist government in a grueling winter boat ride. But his grandchildren, who have lived most of their lives in this high-rise community on the outskirts of the bustling South Korean capital, said they saw the North as too distant and poor to be a real threat.

"The nuclear test is scary, but not enough to feel like it has violated everyday life," said a granddaughter, Kim Ta-yon, a 21-year-old university junior in French literature. "None of my friends think North Korea will actually attack."

Her mother, Song Yon-ju, 49, said she remembered the panic caused by military crises in previous decades, when she joined mad rushes to grocery stores to stock up on boxes of dried noodles. There have been no such panics this time, she said, which she attributed to South Koreans having grown weary of living in fear.

She also said the continued desire to engage the North reflected a streak of pragmatism in a country where much of the population lived within range of North Korean artillery. A tougher policy would only push the North into deeper desperation, she said.

"Even a little mouse will bite if it's cornered," she warned quietly.

Similar attitudes appear in recent public opinion polls, which show that while the claimed nuclear detonation hardened attitudes toward the North, a majority of South Koreans still oppose outright confrontation. According to a telephone survey of 800 people last week by the Naeil Shinmun-Hangil Research Center, only 15 percent of respondents called for ending economic ties, compared with 83 percent who supported their continuation. But most supporters agreed the current policy needed revisions, such as making it harder for North Korean leaders to profit from such ties.

Political analysts say a big factor behind the desire to maintain economic ties is a deep ambivalence in South Korean views of the North. While the two Koreas still face each other across the minefields and barbed wire of the demilitarized zone, many South Koreans have come to see the North as nothing more than a destitute, misguided relative.

"South Korean people are caught in a dilemma between perceiving the North as a threat and as a brother," said Lee Nae-young, a political science professor at Korea University in Seoul. "They felt betrayed by the nuclear test, but don't want aggressive sanctions, either."

These conflicting feelings toward the North were apparent in the conversation with the Kims. The elder Mr. Kim, who watched Communist troops gun down critics in his village and spent 20 years in the South Korean Air Force, warned that the North was still armed to the teeth. But he also said South Korea could not just close the door on North Korea and its famine-ravaged population.

DOJ_NMG_0086237

"We have no choice," he said. "We can't ignore the more than 20 million Koreans still living up there. They don't have enough rice."

His son, Kim Seok-kyeon, 49, a general manager at an insurance company who was born after the Korean War ended in 1953, agreed that his country could not go back to the confrontation of the cold war. He said there was no need because the North wasn't as fearsome as it used to be.

"They have more airplanes and tanks than we have," he said, "but they have no fuel to put in them."

Another generation down, his son, 11-year-old Kim Dong-hyun, said he didn't worry about North Korea at all. When pressed, he described the country as "crazy and harmless."

His two sisters, both in college, said their textbooks blandly described the North as a starving land where fellow Koreans spoke an antiquated dialect. This was a big change from the era of their father, the insurance executive, who grew up during the military dictatorships of the 1960's and 1970's. He said anti-Communist education ran through his schooling, with monthly homework assignments to make posters demonizing the North.

The three generations of Kims also showed subtle differences in their views of America's role in the nuclear standoff. All agreed that the United States was a friend, and that the crisis had made them appreciate the protection offered by the American nuclear umbrella.

But while the elder Mr. Kim expressed confidence that Washington was working to resolve the crisis, his granddaughters suggested that America bore some blame for the standoff — a common sentiment here.

"If the U.S. isolates North Korea, it's just silencing someone who has something to say," said Kim Ta-yon, the university junior. "I don't think North Korea did the test to provoke war, but because it wants a voice in international society."

Pre-emptive Attack On Hamas Eyed (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Applying a lesson from the recent war against Hezbollah, Israeli leaders are increasingly talking about staging a pre-emptive military offensive in the Gaza Strip in order to avert a Hamas buildup of improved missiles.

Israeli forces already operating in the Gaza Strip Monday killed at least nine Palestinians and wounded 20. But officials and politicians say a broader operation against Hamas is necessary if Israel wants to deny it the ability to stockpile weapons like the Shi'ite militia Hezbollah, which was able to build up its arsenal during six years of relative calm.

"We should not allow Hamas to build in Gaza what Hezbollah built in Lebanon," said Ephraim Sneh, Labor parliamentarian. "[A broad offensive] seems to me almost unavoidable because the accumulation of arms in Gaza in the hands of Hamas and other terror organization is intolerable."

The talk of an escalation in Gaza comes as Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert agreed in principle to bring a far-right party, Yisrael Beitenu, into his coalition.

The move stabilized a coalition whose foundations emerged from the Lebanon war severely shaken. But it also reorients the political constellation of Mr. Olmert's government toward the right.

Israeli army units, which retook the corridor in Gaza along the Egyptian border this week, have uncovered more than a dozen smuggling tunnels used to sneak weapons, money and contraband into Gaza from Egypt.

At the same time, Israeli intelligence officials say they think that Syria and Iran are supplying Hamas with the advanced anti-tank missiles that turned armored vehicles like the Merkava tank into a sitting ducks, according to local press reports.

Hamas is also thought to be receiving longer-range rockets like the Katyusha missiles fired by the hundreds into northern Israeli this past summer.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz has said that Israel cannot allow Gaza to become another Lebanon. At the same time Mr. Peretz, the chairman of coalition partner Labor party, said that Israel has no desire to reconquer the Gaza Strip permanently.

In the Gaza violence Monday, Palestinians reported three civilian deaths while Israel's army said soldiers fired because they felt threatened by gunmen from the northeastern Gaza village of Beit Hanoun.

For now, politicians such as Mr. Peretz want to promote diplomatic attempts to release kidnapped soldier Gilad Shalit, in the hope that a deal would create momentum behind an accord that would avert contributions to Hamas' arms buildup in Gaza.

"What we are hearing from military officers is that they see the obvious need for an operation," said a senior Israeli security source. "The politicians are not thrilled by a military operation, but if it becomes necessary, a military operation will be taken."

Officials say privately they are skeptical whether diplomatic efforts will yield any substantial results in taming the arms buildup and avert a military invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0086238

During the monthlong war with Hezbollah, many Israelis questioned why military and government officials allowed the Shi'ite militia to stockpile rockets and build fortifications for so many years.

Barring a deadly militant attack on Israel that gives the government a justification for a Gaza push, Mr. Olmert's government is likely to wait until he returns from meetings in the United States with President Bush.

Kidnapped AP Photographer Freed In Gaza (AP)

By Karin Laub, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 25, 2006

An Associated Press photographer was freed unharmed Tuesday after a harrowing day in the hands of Palestinians who abducted him at gunpoint and dressed him in women's clothes to spirit him from one secret location to another.

Emilio Morenatti was brought before midnight to the office of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas by Fatah officials. It was not clear who kidnapped him, though officials said he was taken by criminals. The government and main Palestinian groups denounced the abduction.

Morenatti, a 37-year-old Spaniard, looked fatigued after his daylong ordeal but said he was unharmed.

"I'm tired but happy to have come back because there were very anguished moments," said Morenatti.

He said the kidnappers held him in a small room, where he was kept for about four hours during which he was visited by masked men. Later he was put in a car dressed as a woman and taken to another location.

"They put a bag on my head and they dressed me up as a woman, as a woman in a long veil," the photographer added.

Morenatti said he was blindfolded for much of the time, and that his captors spoke only Arabic, which he doesn't speak.

"I didn't know at any moment what they were doing," he said. "They moved me but nobody explained anything to me. It was very confusing."

The photographer said he was held in complete darkness for hours. In the second house where he was held, Morenatti said he heard the sounds of a family. He said he was given one meal of cheese and lunch meat early in the day and a portion of fruit later.

Morenatti did not know his captors. Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's office said in a statement that the identity of the kidnappers was known and they "would be pursued."

Tom Curley, AP's president and chief executive officer, said, "The Associated Press is relieved that Emilio has been released, apparently unharmed. The security of our journalists is always our top concern. We appreciate the assistance offered by so many people in obtaining his release, especially Palestinian and Spanish officials.

"It is crucial, however, that journalists such as Emilio be able to freely report the news in areas of conflict. We will be investigating what happened to assure that he and others can continue their important work," Curley said.

Morenatti's family in Spain rejoiced at news of his release.

"We were all sitting around together and when we heard the news we yelled with joy and then we opened a bottle of rioja (wine) to celebrate," Miguel Angel Morenatti, a brother of the photographer, told the AP.

"I managed to talk with Emilio for about 15 seconds and he told me that he was well both physically and mentally. The most important thing is that he is safe and free,"

Morenatti was seized as he headed out of his Gaza City apartment for an AP car, where Majed Hamdan, an AP driver and translator, was waiting. Hamdan said four gunmen grabbed his keys and cell phone and told him to turn away, pressing a gun to his head and threatening to harm him if he moved.

They took Morenatti, shoving him into a white Volkswagen Golf and driving off, Hamdan said.

Hours later, Morenatti was turned over to Fatah forces.

Abbas is not in Gaza, but his office is a safe Fatah stronghold in the territory, which is in the throes of a sometimes violent power struggle between Abbas' Fatah and the militant Islamic Hamas, which is in charge of the Palestinian government.

In the past two years, militants have frequently kidnapped foreigners as bargaining chips to get relatives released from Palestinian prisons, secure government jobs or settle personal scores. In most cases, the kidnappings were brief and the hostages released unharmed.

But recently, the kidnappers have changed tactics. Two Fox News journalists kidnapped in August were held for two weeks, much longer than previous cases. The men also suffered physical and mental abuse in captivity.

An unknown group calling itself the Holy Jihad Brigades claimed responsibility for the August abduction, and its demand for the release of Muslim prisoners held by the U.S. raised fears that foreign extremists, perhaps al-Qaida, had infiltrated Gaza. But Palestinian security officials said the name was a front for local militants.

The media advocacy groups Reporters Without Borders and the Committee to Protect Journalists condemned Morenatti's kidnapping.

DOJ_NMG_0086239

"We're dismayed that journalists have become pawns of Palestinian groups seeking to exploit them for political purposes," said CPJ Executive Director Joel Simon. "These blatant attacks on journalists will have a chilling effect on their ability to do their work and will ultimately deprive the world of information about this critically important story."

Morenatti, from Jerez, Spain, has been based in Jerusalem since April 2005, handling periodic assignments in Gaza and the West Bank. He has been in Gaza since Sunday.

Morenatti began working for the AP in April 2004, and spent a year in Afghanistan covering the conflict there. He also covered the war in Lebanon and the World Cup soccer tournament in Germany.

In 1992, Morenatti began work as a photographer with EFE, the Spanish news agency, Spain.

The Wrong Partner In Israel (NYT)

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Badly weakened by criticism of his conduct of this summer's inconclusive war in Lebanon, Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has chosen to make an unwise and damaging trade-off. Bringing the pro-settler Israel Beiteinu party into his governing coalition reinforces his vulnerable parliamentary majority. But it makes it virtually impossible for Mr. Olmert to carry out the partial West Bank withdrawal program he ran on just seven months ago.

Israel Beiteinu is the political vehicle of Avigdor Lieberman, who advocates annexing West Bank settlements and reassigning Arab Israeli citizens to a rump Palestinian state. Mr. Lieberman, who is set to become a deputy prime minister, has criticized other right-wing leaders, like Ariel Sharon, for evicting settlers from occupied regions.

American and European diplomats have been arguing that the one positive result of the Lebanon war could be new momentum toward a wider Middle East peace. The idea was that a new awareness of the limits of Israeli military power and growing Arab fears of Shiite radicalism would push both sides toward the necessary compromises.

That now seems less likely than ever. The chief Palestinian party, Hamas, refuses to take the most minimal steps required for diplomatic credibility — a clear rejection of terrorism, acceptance of prior agreements and acknowledgment of Israel's legitimacy. Efforts by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to bring Hamas around have not gotten as much support as they should from Israel. With Israel Beiteinu joining Mr. Olmert's coalition, they are likely to get even less.

Creating new obstacles to peace with the Palestinians is the last thing Israel needs after the Lebanon fiasco.

Iran, Syria Rebuild Hezbollah (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 25, 2006

Iran and Syria are rapidly rearming Hezbollah guerrillas in southern Lebanon as an international peacekeeping force has failed to carry out a U.N. mandate to disarm the Shi'ite militia group, Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shaul Mofaz said yesterday.

Mr. Mofaz, a former defense minister and chief of general staff in the Israeli Defense Force, also warned that time was growing short for the international community to implement effective sanctions to halt Iran's drive for nuclear weapons.

"We know the policy of the Iranian regime is to buy time by talking" while it pursues a nuclear bomb, Mr. Mofaz said in an interview in his suite at the Renaissance Mayflower Hotel in Washington. "So far they have been very successful."

The hawkish Mr. Mofaz is the transportation minister under the unity government headed by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, but he remains a major voice on defense and security issues in Israel.

He met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, among others, on a visit to Washington this week in advance of U.S.-Israel security talks set for December.

Mr. Mofaz said Israel's 34-day war with Hezbollah fighters this summer had dealt the Shi'ite militia a major setback in its southern Lebanese base. But he expressed frustration that the Lebanese army and an enhanced U.N. peacekeeping force had not disarmed Hezbollah or sealed the border to prevent Syria and Iran from rearming their "proxy."

"Arms smuggling across the border from Syria has continued after the war," he said. "We know of the activity but we don't know what types of weapons are involved."

He acknowledged that Israel's armed forces "did not achieve all our goals" in the Lebanon campaign, failing to crush Hezbollah as a fighting force and to win the release of Israeli soldiers held by the Shi'ite group.

But he said the "main issue of discussion" with U.S. officials was Iran.

"Iran poses the biggest threat not only to the state of Israel but to the countries of the West as well," he said. "Under the umbrella provided by a nuclear capability, Iran might be more involved in harboring, supporting and financing terror."

Mr. Olmert told reporters last week that Iran would have a "price to pay" if it rejected international offers to stop its suspect nuclear programs. But Mr. Mofaz yesterday put greater stress on multilateral efforts to pressure Iran, calling for strong sanctions against Tehran if it refuses to cooperate.

DOJ_NMG_0086240

"The time has come for effective sanctions after three years of dialogue without any achievements," he said.

The North Korea nuclear test earlier this month has heightened the need for a tough stand against Iran, Mr. Mofaz said. North Korea has sold Iran missiles that can deliver nuclear warheads, and Mr. Mofaz said Pyongyang's test of a nuclear device means it could now transfer "nuclear assets" to Iran as well.

On Syria, Mr. Mofaz dismissed as a "ploy" recent offers by President Bashar Assad for direct peace talks with Israel, saying Damascus continues to support Hezbollah and militant Palestinian groups battling Israeli forces in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

"We believe it is not [Syria's] intention to have a real negotiation," he said. "When we see real intentions for peace in Syria, then we can have a different approach."

Mr. Olmert is expected to travel to Washington next month for talks, and the Bush administration is pressing for new movement on peace talks with the Palestinians.

But Mr. Mofaz said the bloody internal standoff in the Palestinian territories between the Hamas government, which refuses to recognize Israel, and the Fatah party of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas leaves Israel with no effective negotiating partner.

Pentagon Official Sentenced In Arms Sale (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, October 25, 2006

A former Defense Department official was sentenced to 18 months in prison and another pleaded guilty Tuesday to selling military equipment in the Middle East and pocketing hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Most of the equipment was unneeded and scheduled for auction, but prosecutors said the illegal deals also included the sale of Humvees that were still weaponized and were not supposed to have been sold.

Ronald W. Wiseman of New Boston, Texas, was sentenced for violating federal weapons laws. Wiseman worked for the Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service, the Pentagon agency that sells excess military equipment.

The agency contracts with overseas auctioneers to sell the equipment and return the money to the government. Prosecutors said Wiseman and a Saudi Arabian auctioneer agreed to sell some equipment off the books and share in the profits.

Wiseman pleaded guilty in May and agreed to cooperate in a federal investigation. A second U.S. official, Gayden C. Woodson of North Ogden, Utah, pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiracy to steal government property.

Woodson said that in January 2001, he joined Wiseman's conspiracy and continued it after Wiseman left the Middle East the following year. Woodson admitted in federal court that he made at least 19 illegal transactions and received about $350,000.

U.S. authorities have recovered some of the Humvees and traced others to Spain, the Czech Republic and other countries, according to court documents.

"By putting militarized vehicles into an unregulated stream of foreign commerce, in a part of the world in which United States military personnel are engaged in deadly conflict with insurgency forces, the defendant put those vehicles within reach of adversaries who could use them against our own," prosecutor Laura A. Ingersoll wrote.

Woodson is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 31.

Chavez Could Support Bolivia As Alternative U.N. Candidate (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Bolivia's president said Tuesday that Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez would throw his support behind the Andean country if Venezuela is unable to win enough votes to defeat U.S.-backed Guatemala for a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Bolivian President Evo Morales, a close ally of Mr. Chavez, raised the possibility during a speech in El Alto, Bolivia, while in Caracas Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro said Venezuela would continue its drive for the rotating Security Council seat.

A 36th round of voting is scheduled to be held Wednesday, and some countries in the region -- from Brazil to Guyana -- expressed hope of seeking an alternate candidate. Other possibilities mentioned by diplomats included Chile and Uruguay.

Venezuela trailed Guatemala in 34 of the 35 votes so far, and tied the Central American country in one round last week.

Venezuela has denounced what it calls coercive measures by the U.S. government aimed at keeping a critical government off the Security Council.

Mr. Morales said he had spoken by phone with Mr. Chavez on Monday, who told him that if Venezuela does not get the two-thirds majority it needs to win, he will "propose Bolivia as a candidate."

"We're candidates for the Security Council," Mr. Morales said. "I hope we can win a consensus. Our ambassadors should be mobilized in the United Nations."

DOJ_NMG_0086241

Mr. Maduro, meanwhile, said Venezuela has a "sovereign and legitimate right" to maintain its candidacy. He said Venezuela would only consider talks on a consensus candidate if Guatemala drops out of the race and the U.S. doesn't try to interfere.

The foreign minister said Venezuela has the support of a large majority of countries across Latin America and the Caribbean.

"Venezuela has always been willing to have a dialogue," Mr. Maduro said. "Bilateral meetings have been held today. We've received a ratification of the vote by a group of countries that have stood by us strongly."

Mr. Maduro said he would travel to New York to lead Venezuela's delegation as the voting resumes.

As for seeking consensus on another country to fill the rotating seat, Mr. Maduro said "we could only consider that option if Guatemala quits, if the United States ceases its crude blackmail to other governments of the world."

Meanwhile, Guyana's foreign minister, Rudy Insanally, said Latin American and Caribbean nations are likely to seek an alternate candidate if neither Guatemala or Venezuela wins enough votes in fresh balloting this week.

He said countries would be meeting to discuss alternatives. "We are hearing Chile or Uruguay. These two are the likely ones," Mr. Insanally said.

Brazilian Foreign Minister Celso Amorin also said Brazil favors a consensus candidate, despite the fact that his nation has expressed support for Venezuela.

Other compromise candidates that have been suggested for the two-year seat include Costa Rica, Panama, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, and Brazil.

Venezuela Denies Ending U.N. Bid (WP)

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Oct. 24 -- Venezuelan officials on Tuesday denied Bolivian President Evo Morales's claim that Venezuela had decided to withdraw from the competition for a seat on the U.N. Security Council and would instead nominate his country as a candidate.

Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro demanded that Guatemala, its rival for the position, and the United States meet three conditions before Venezuela would drop its bid.

Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal said a Bolivian compromise candidacy "was apparently a unilateral decision by Venezuela, because they have not notified me." He rejected the idea that Guatemala would step aside in favor of Bolivia.

"We have not pulled out, and we have no intention of doing so," he said in Guatemala City.

Latin American U.N. representatives reconvene in New York at noon Wednesday to consider a consensus candidate. Venezuela and Guatemala jockeyed over 35 rounds of voting last week -- the second-longest bid in U.N. history -- to land one of Latin America's two-year rotating seats on the council, but neither got the required two-thirds majority among U.N. members.

"Comandante Chavez called me this morning and said he could not get the two-thirds he needed for the Security Council," Morales said from El Alto, Bolivia, referring to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. "Chavez said he will leave the candidacy to Bolivia."

Like Chavez, Morales has strained relations with the Bush administration, which has backed Guatemala for the Security Council seat.

Maduro said Venezuela required that Guatemala resign its candidacy, that the United States stop "its gross blackmail of the governments of the world, and . . . that we have a transparent process to find some kind of third option to represent the region with dignity."

Venezuela Diatribe Backfires (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 24 — Venezuela's populist leader, Hugo Chávez, earned giggles and guffaws at the United Nations last month with his mass appeal diatribe ridiculing President Bush as the devil. Mr. Chávez said he could still smell the telltale scent of sulfur on the General Assembly rostrum where Mr. Bush had spoken the day before.

Now it appears that Mr. Chávez's histrionic performance — styled to win him support from the United States' many detractors at the United Nations — may have cost his country the seat on the Security Council that he has conducted a global campaign to win.

Developing nations make up a vast majority of the 192 countries in the General Assembly and generally warm to rants against Washington. But they also value the United Nations as a place where their voices can be heard in a dignified setting, and both supporters and detractors here say Mr. Chávez may have miscalculated in turning it into his bully pulpit.

DOJ_NMG_0086242

Delegates said they also feared that the performance demonstrated the kind of behavior Venezuela might bring to the orderly confines of the Council chamber.

As the General Assembly resumes voting on Wednesday on who should occupy the seat being vacated by Argentina, Venezuela's candidacy is already considered finished. In 35 rounds over three days last week, the ambassadors kept Venezuela's competitor, Guatemala, far in front, though not in ready reach of the two-thirds majority needed to win the seat.

In a twist to Venezuela's quest for the seat, President Evo Morales of Bolivia, Mr. Chávez's closest political ally in South America, said Tuesday that Mr. Chávez had asked him to put Bolivia forward as an alternate candidate to Venezuela. But a spokeswoman for the Venezuelan Foreign Ministry later said the nomination of Bolivia was just one option under consideration. In any case, the decision to select a new candidate would be up to the Latin American and Caribbean group at the United Nations.

Venezuela's poor results came as a surprise, and many people, including those favoring Caracas in the voting, point to Mr. Chávez's performance as the cause.

"The speech played the most important role in what happened," said Riordan Roett, the director of the Latin American Studies Program at Johns Hopkins University. "You can talk like that in Latin America, and people will have a chuckle, but there is traditional respect for protocol, and it was not amusing to a lot of people who see the U.N. as the forum for expressing third world views."

"The speech really hurt his case," said Enrique Berruga, the ambassador of Mexico. "Most members don't want this place to be turned into a mockery. In the General Assembly, there are limits, and he went way beyond them."

Another Latin ambassador, who said he knew of many countries that voted against Venezuela because of the speech, agreed that Mr. Chávez had stepped over a line.

"U.S.-bashing is acceptable, but not the U.N.-bashing that they thought Chávez's speech amounted to because in the end this is everyone's house, and a speech like that goes down the same dirty drain as the bitter criticisms of the U.S.," the envoy said. He asked not to be identified because he was commenting on the leader of another South American country.

Asked if Mr. Chávez's popularity might be flagging closer to home, Mr. Roett pointed out that presidential candidates who have been identified with Mr. Chávez in recent elections in Ecuador, Peru and Mexico all did badly. "For sure he's not gone as a force, but people are less impressed with him than they were four or five years ago," he said.

The expectation at the United Nations has been that the inconclusive balloting will drag on for many days as Venezuela and Guatemala refuse to step down and the Latin American group is consequently unable to turn to a compromise candidate.

The calculus could change if Venezuela does decide to drop out.

The unseemly process is embarrassing to Latin diplomats who acknowledge that the 33-nation Latin American and Caribbean group at the United Nations has often shown disunity, while the 53-nation African group and the 54-country Asian group yearly produce candidates without dispute.

"We probably have the least amount of time difference between our countries of any group, but we have the greatest difficulties getting together," said Eduardo J. Sevilla Somoza, the ambassador of Nicaragua. His country lost its bid for a Security Council seat last year to Peru.

The disarray that the Venezuela-Guatemala standoff has produced at the United Nations reflects divisions within the region itself.

First, there is the role of the United States, which has lobbied vigorously for Guatemala in an effort to keep Venezuela off the Security Council and whose attempts to influence Latin America have long divided the region.

"Both countries feel victimized, Guatemala because of Venezuela and Venezuela because of the United States," said Ronaldo Sardenberg, the ambassador of Brazil. "It's a very complicated moment."

Another part of the divide is a regional tug-of-war pitting the small countries of Central America and the Caribbean against the large nations of South America.

Guatemala has never been on the Security Council. Venezuela has been a member four times, and the powers of the continent, Brazil and Argentina, have held a seat nine and eight times respectively.

But the division most on the minds of Latin Americans today is the one provoked by Mr. Chávez and his adoption of an authoritarian, state-centered leadership model that he is trying to spread through the region, which has in recent years adopted market economics and democracy.

Kenneth R. Maxwell, a senior fellow at the David Rockefeller Center for Latin American Studies at Harvard, said he believed there was a "tectonic shift" that was dividing Latin America three ways — a northern sphere encompassing Mexico, Central America and the Caribbean; a southern part based in the large countries of South America; and an Andean stretch where indigenous leaders were coming to power.

DOJ_NMG_0086243

He said that shift had created an instability that had given Mr. Chávez an opportunity to win over other countries to his thinking, particularly as long as he can tap Venezuela's oil proceeds for his political goals.

Arturo Valenzuela, the director of Georgetown's Center for Latin American Studies, said he thought the divisions were serious, but not as deep as the ideological schism that befell the region during the cold war when many countries were ruled by military dictatorships.

Many Auto Makers Miss Targets For Emissions Cuts In Europe (WSJ)

By William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

BRUSSELS -- About three-quarters of auto makers are failing to improve fuel efficiency to meet Europe's voluntary targets to cut carbon-dioxide emissions, according to an environmental group's study.

The European Federation for Transport and Environment produced the study to heat up a debate over whether the European Commission should impose mandatory emissions cuts for automobiles. The federation backs mandatory controls, while the commission has set only voluntary targets.

"As long as 75% of car makers go unpunished for their failure, we will never make the necessary progress," said Aat Peterse, director of the Clean Cars Program for the transport federation, a nongovernmental group based in Brussels with member organizations in 20 countries.

Any effort to impose new rules on the auto industry is likely to meet resistance from individual governments. The European Parliament's environment committee voted last month to delay compliance with CO2 standards to 2011 from 2008, saying auto makers needed the time to develop technologies.

The spokeswoman for the European Automobile Manufacturers Association, Sigrid de Vries, said she hadn't yet seen the report, but that it was wrong to single out individual companies, explaining that some car makers emphasize large fuel-consuming vehicles, while others concentrate on small, fuel-efficient ones.

In August, the European Commission, the executive arm of the European Union, told car makers they must do more to cut CO2 emissions in new vehicles and threatened to impose regulations after revealing that 2004 average emissions -- at 12.4% below 1995 levels -- were well below industry commitments to cut emissions 25% by 2008.

"The situation is not satisfactory," said Günter Verheugen, commission vice president and commissioner for enterprise and industry. "We expect that industry sticks to its commitments."

Japanese and German car makers led the new study's list of worst performers. Nissan Motor Co., Suzuki Motor Corp. and Mazda Motor Corp. registered well above the rate of European standard. Volkswagen AG, Europe's biggest car maker by sales, has improved fuel efficiency at less than half the rate needed, the study says.

In contrast, other European and U.S. manufacturers made progress. Fiat SpA, Renault SA, Peugeot SA are on track to meet or exceed targets by 2008. Ford Motor Co. and General Motors Corp.'s Opel division also come out well. In Europe, both companies concentrate on small and midsize cars.

Vietnam's Roaring Economy Is Set For World Stage (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam — Nearly four decades ago, South Vietnamese leaders mapped out their battle plans inside the presidential palace here. When they lost the war, the palace became the base for the Ho Chi Minh City People's Committee, which worked to impose tight Communist control.

But in September it was the scene of a very different gathering: a board meeting of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

In the three decades since Vietnam has gone from communism to a form of capitalism, it has begun surpassing many neighbors. It has Asia's second-fastest-growing economy, with 8.4 percent growth last year, trailing only China's, and the pace of exports to the United States is rising faster than even China's.

American companies like Intel and Nike, and investors across the region, are pouring billions of dollars into the country; overseas Vietnamese are returning to run the ventures.

In the latest sign of Vietnam's economic vitality, trade negotiators from around the world are preparing, after more than a decade of talks, to put the finishing touches on an agreement, possibly by Oct. 26, for Vietnam to join the World Trade Organization. President Bush, President Hu Jintao of China, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia and other heads of state plan to come to Hanoi in mid-November for an Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit meeting.

For Vietnam, the meeting will be a coming-out party, critical to its pride in much the way the 2008 Olympics in Beijing are for China.

DOJ_NMG_0086244

"I think they are the next China," said Michael R. P. Smith, chief executive of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. "It's not the scale of China, but it's a significant economy."

Through the end of last year; Vietnam's growth rate exceeded that of Thailand, Malaysia, Taiwan, South Korea and even India, its closest rival.

The latest Asian economic tiger, Vietnam now produces and uses more cement than France, its former colonial ruler. The main index for the Ho Chi Minh City stock market and a smaller exchange in Hanoi have nearly doubled in value this year. Vietnam has become the talk of investment bankers and investors across Asia.

But with such growth has come controversy, here and in the United States. Republicans in Congress are divided over a coming vote soon after the midterm elections: Should the United States grant permanent, full trade relations to Vietnam, given the two countries' history and Vietnam's current position, where it sells almost nine times as much to Americans as it buys?

Corporate America is divided, too, over a Bush administration initiative to win votes for full trade status by throwing a bone late in September to Southern senators representing states where textiles are made. Vietnamese officials are furious with Washington over what they see as a last-minute protectionist attempt to limit the exports of their country's booming garment industry.

In Vietnam, nearly double-digit growth is starting to produce the same shortages of skilled labor as in India and China. Executives at multinationals like Groupe Lafarge of France and Prudential of Britain say that local accountants, human relations managers and other professionals are so scarce that salaries are soaring 30 percent to 50 percent a year.

Many educated Vietnamese now are like Ha Nguyen, 34, a chemical engineer who is working at his third job in three years, having received big raises each time he changed companies. "Right now, it's easy in Vietnam to find a job," he said, pausing while doing a chemical analysis of cement quality at a corporate laboratory here.

Roads and ports in this country are increasingly choked with cars and ships, the congestion worse than China's but not yet as bad as India's. Yet deep-seated corruption has slowed construction; the government has put the brakes on highway building across northern Vietnam this year after uncovering a graft scandal that led to resignations and detentions all the way to the top of the Transport Ministry.

Balanced against these problems is a government that, like China's, has embraced capitalism after becoming disillusioned with the widespread poverty and sometimes hunger that accompanied tight state control of the economy.

Economic liberalization policies have been pursued in earnest since the early 90's, after poor harvests and economic mismanagement left millions facing malnutrition in 1990.

Among the architects of this change are a handful of bright economists like Le Dang Doanh, a top adviser to the government and the Communist Party who studied in the old Soviet Union and East Germany but became deeply disillusioned with the corruption and inefficiency of state-owned industries.

"The reform is definitely irreversible," Mr. Doanh said. "Any attempt to come back to a centrally planned economy, to overplay the state sector, is economically irrational, inefficient and psychologically is counterproductive."

If anything, Vietnam has leaned in the other direction. The Finance Ministry has just produced a draft personal-taxation law, expected to be approved by January, that offers more tax breaks for the wealthy than the United States does. Inheritances among immediate family members will be entirely exempt from taxation. So will interest on all but the largest bank accounts, and a fierce debate is under way over whether capital gains should be taxed.

And in some ways, Vietnam is more pro-business than China. Reluctant to anger city dwellers, state-owned power companies in China minimize blackouts in residential areas but cut off power to factories as much as three days a week, forcing them to run on costly diesel generators.

Vietnam takes the opposite course. Takashima Masayuki, general director of a Japanese-owned factory that makes shirts and jackets in Bien Hoa city, said the factory did not even have a generator because the authorities never allowed power to be cut off in the industrial zone where it is situated. By contrast, Ho Chi Minh City residents say they have brief power interruptions as often as twice a day.

Like China and India, Vietnam has benefited enormously from the return of a diaspora — people who had fled the country. Thousands of overseas Vietnamese have come home after learning English, gaining entrepreneurial experience and acquiring technical skills.

Phu Than, Intel's country manager for Vietnam and Indochina, was 14 when he was evacuated in the last days before the fall of Saigon, leaving by helicopter with his mother, an employee of the old American Consulate in Danang.

He earned an electrical engineering degree from the University of California, Davis, then joined Intel and now oversees the largest foreign investment in Vietnam, the construction of a semiconductor assembly and test factory that will cost $300 million for the first phase and another $300 million for a likely expansion later.

DOJ_NMG_0086245

American businesses are catching on to Vietnam's attractions, but they still lag behind Taiwan companies, which are the biggest foreign investors in Vietnam, followed by Singapore.

Vietnam's appeal to foreign companies rests on its young labor pool. Three-fifths of its 84 million people are under 27. And with a policy of limiting families to two children, as distinct from China's one, Vietnam will continue for many years to have a large proportion of hard-working low-skill employees.

Typical is Nguyen Thi Hong, 30, who rides each morning on her rusty bicycle to stand outside factories and look for work in Bien Hoa, 15 miles northeast of Ho Chi Minh City; in China, factories advertise far and wide even for unskilled workers.

A brightly patterned kerchief protecting her from air pollution, Mrs. Hong said she and her husband, a mechanic who has found work here, have left their year-old son with his parents in their hometown in the central part of the country.

Vietnam has reduced the percentage of its people living in abject poverty — less than $1 a day — to 8 percent from 51 percent in 1990, a greater advance than either China or India.

But incomes are still far short of Western levels. Few of these Vietnamese can afford to eat American beef or fly in Boeing jets. The country's trade surplus with the United States has soared — it exported $5.56 billion worth of goods to the American market in the first eight months of this year while importing $625.9 million.

That imbalance, much of it in the garment industry, has complicated the Bush administration's effort to persuade lawmakers to approve normal trade relations with Vietnam. The administration tried to shore up support by sending a letter on Sept. 28 to two Republican senators, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, saying that the Commerce Department may file its own antidumping cases against low-price shipments of Vietnamese clothing without waiting for American companies to do so.

But the letter has upset retailers and other importers, who worry that they may end up paying any punitive duties that are imposed.

"The retail industry is really split on this," said Brad Figel, the government affairs director at Nike, which remains in favor of the bill and is seeking clarification of administration policy.

Antidumping duties are an emotional issue in Vietnam, after the United States imposed them on catfish exports three years ago and the European Union recently imposed them on Vietnamese and Chinese shoe exports. Vietnamese officials warn that dumping cases could hurt the regulatory environment for American businesses and cause layoffs at garment factories, where most workers are low-income women.

"These people suffered from the war a lot already, and we would not want them to suffer again," said Nguyen Anh Tuan, vice director of Vietnam's Foreign Investment Agency. "American investors should not lose their foothold in Vietnam."

Talk to garment-factory workers in Vietnam these days, though, and they are looking forward to a future where their children live far better than they do. "My parents were very poor," said Nguyen Thu Hoai, 28, said as she folded green Nike jackets in a state-owned factory in Ho Chi Minh City.

"But I will be able to give my son a good education," she said, describing a modest Prudential life insurance policy she bought for her 2-year-old son that includes a savings fund for educational expenses. "He will have more opportunities."

A Mercenary Force For Darfur (WSJ)

By Max Boot

The Wall Street Journal, October 25, 2006

Mercenaries used to dominate warfare. The "Hessians" who served Britain in our War for Independence (many were actually from other German states) became notorious among the colonists, but foreigners formed a major part of every army in the world until the French Revolution. Their outlook was pithily expressed by a 17th-century soldier who said: "We serve our master honestly, it is no matter what master we serve."

And they did provide good service. It was thanks largely to "free lances" (the origin of that now common term) that absolute monarchs managed to consolidate their power in Europe and carve out vast overseas empires. Private entities like the Dutch and English East India Companies even marshaled their own armies and navies to defend their domains.

But with the rise of nationalism in the 19th century, soldiers of fortune fell into disfavor. The assumption became prevalent that it was honorable to fight for one's country, even if compelled to do so via a draft, but dishonorable to fight for a paycheck.

Yet mercenaries remain abundant. Some serve nation states -- for instance the Nepalese Gurkhas in the British and Indian armies. Many more are employed by companies such as DynCorp, Vinnell and Blackwater, all of whom vociferously resist the "mercenary" label; they prefer to be called security companies or private military firms.

Call them what you will, such outfits have grown in importance as the armed forces of the U.S. and other countries downsized after the end of the Cold War. Today, from Afghanistan to Iraq, much of the logistical support for American troops is provided by Halliburton subsidiary KBR.

DOJ_NMG_0086246

Hired hands aren't just serving chow or cleaning latrines. They're also carrying guns to safeguard supply convoys, buildings and VIPs. Even many U.S. ambassadors are protected by private bodyguards. Our man in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, never leaves home without his heavily armed Blackwater detail.

Peter Singer, a fellow at the Brookings Institution and author of "Corporate Warriors," estimates that at least 20,000 private gunslingers have been employed in Iraq alone. Among foreign troop contingents, they are second in number -- and in casualties -- only to the U.S. military. Mr. Singer quips: "President George W. Bush's 'coalition of the willing' might thus be more aptly described as the 'coalition of the billing.'"

Many of these contractors, largely veterans of Western and Soviet bloc militaries, have performed bravely in trying circumstances. But they have also caused their share of problems. There have been numerous scandals over firms charging too much or not delivering what they promised. Even more pervasive have been complaints about guards running wild. In their black body armor and armored Chevy Suburbans, contractors are notorious for careening through traffic and firing wildly, not caring who gets hurt as long as they reach their destination.

Yet, for all their shortcomings, there is no way to end our reliance on privateers -- at least not without a big increase in military end-strength, which is needed but not likely. And they can actually perform valuable work that we won't send our own troops to do.

Case in point: Darfur. A force of 7,000 lightly armed African Union peacekeepers has been helpless to stop the genocide being carried out in this region of the Sudan. Odds are that a contingent of U.N. blue helmets, if and when they finally arrive, won't do much better. Why not turn to the private sector?

Mercenaries have committed their share of abuses in Africa. (See "The Wild Geese" and "The Dogs of War," both based on real events in the 1950s and 1960s, the heyday of "Mad" Mike Hoare, "Black" Jacques Schramme and other notorious swashbucklers). But they have also been effective in stopping human-rights abuses.

In 1995-96, Executive Outcomes, a South African firm working for the government of Sierra Leone, made short work of a savage rebel movement known as the Revolutionary United Front that was notorious for chopping off the limbs of its victims. As a result, Sierra Leone was able to hold its first free election in decades. The now-defunct Executive Outcomes also helped the Angolan government quell a long-running insurgency by Jonas Savimbi's Unita, leading to the signing of a peace accord in 1994. Another private firm, MPRI, helped to bring peace to the former Yugoslavia in 1995 by organizing the Croatian military offensive that stopped Serbian aggression.

Hired guns could be equally effective in stopping the campaign of rape, murder and ethnic cleansing carried out by the Sudanese government and the janjaweed militia in Darfur. In fact, several firms have already offered their services. They could be employed by an international organization like the U.N. or NATO, by an ad hoc group of concerned nations, or even by philanthropists like Bill Gates or George Soros.

Critics complain that mercenaries didn't provide long-term fixes. Sierra Leone, for instance, fell back into brutal warfare after Executive Outcomes left. But that's because the mercenaries were on short-term contracts; they might have created more lasting stability if they had been given longer-term employment.

Many also worry about abuses committed by mercenaries, who in some cases have tried to plunder or even take over small states. But the record of privateers compares favorably with that of U.N. peacekeeping forces, which have been distinguished more by their propensity for committing sex crimes than by any success in keeping the peace. To deal with potential abuses, private fighters could be hired under a contract that would hold them liable for war crimes in the International Criminal Court or some other jurisdiction. That would make them more accountable than U.N. forces, which operate with almost complete impunity.

Sending mercenaries to Africa isn't politically correct. But it would be a lot more useful than sending more aid money that will be wasted or passing ineffectual resolutions that will be ignored.

Mr. Boot, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, is the author of "War Made New: Technology, Warfare, and the Course of History, 1500 to Today," published last week by Gotham Books.

The Really Cold War (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, October 25, 2006

Berlin

The Berlin Wall fell almost 17 years ago. At the time, the future seemed clear: The fall of the wall would unleash an unstoppable tide of free markets and free people — and for about 15 years it did just that. Today, though, when you stand where the Berlin Wall once stood and look east, you see a countertide coming your way. It is a black tide of petro-authoritarianism emanating from Russia, and it is blunting the Berlin Wall tide of free markets and free people.

DOJ_NMG_0086247

Why? Russia is a classic example of what I like to call "the First Law of Petropolitics," which posits that the price of oil and the pace of freedom operate in an inverse relationship in petrolist states — states with weak institutions and a high dependence on oil for their G.D.P. As the price of oil goes down, the pace of freedom goes up. The day the Soviet Union collapsed the price of oil was near $16 a barrel. And as the price of oil goes up the pace of freedom goes down. Today, Russia's president, Vladimir Putin, flush with surging oil and gas profits, is crushing domestic opponents, renationalizing major energy companies, throwing out Western human rights groups and generally making himself the big man on campus in Europe.

When Europeans tell you that they fear a new "cold war," this time they really are talking about the temperature — and the fear that Russia, if it wanted to turn off the gas, could make Europeans very cold. About 40 percent of Europe's natural gas imports come from Russia, and that is expected to grow to 70 percent by 2030.

With prices high, Russia has gone from the sick man of Europe to the boss man. Russia is a having a much bigger impact on Western Europe "with gas pipelines than it ever had with SS-20" long-range nuclear missiles, remarked the German foreign-policy expert Josef Joffe, author of the smart book "Überpower: The Imperial Temptation of America."

"Ten years ago we thought Russia was out of it," Mr. Joffe said. "We knew it was going to come back. But suddenly, out of the blue, with the rise in oil prices, it is back on stage, and this time it's much more skillful. The image we have of Russia is [the port of] Murmansk, where the Russian fleet is rotting — but power comes in many forms." And the most popular form today is oil and gas.

Goodbye NATO, hello Citgo.

The other day, the BBC quoted a senior "E.U. insider" as saying of European Union leaders: "You know what happens when they get in the same room with Putin?" They all prostrate themselves "and say, 'I love you, Vladimir.' " The BBC was reporting about a tense summit meeting last Friday in the Finnish town of Lahti. E.U. leaders reportedly beseeched Mr. Putin to honor contracts with Western oil companies, as well as to ease his crackdown on press freedoms, on human rights groups in Russia and on Georgia, and to investigate the murder of a crusading Russian journalist.

What the E.U. wants, a senior German official explained, is to be able to invest in more Russian oil and gas drilling projects and pipelines upstream, so that Russian and E.U. energy interests will be so intertwined Russia will never consider turning off the gas. Mr. Putin wants Gazprom, the giant Russian gas company, to be able to buy into more downstream consumer operations in Europe. That way Russia could dominate the industry from its oilfields all the way to the gas meters of Berlin and Brussels. Right now, the two sides are in a standoff.

"We cannot allow energy to divide Europe as communism once did," José Manuel Barroso, the European Commission president, told The Financial Times. But it is.

In fairness to Mr. Putin, turnabout is fair play. After the Soviet Union collapsed and Russia was enfeebled, the U.S. and the E.U. crammed NATO expansion down his throat. He's now using petro-power to push back. "Russia is very different from Venezuela or Saudi Arabia," remarked Clemens Wergin, an editorial writer at the German daily Der Tagesspiegel. Russia has nukes and oil, he noted, and therefore has the potential to play a much more domineering geopolitical role in Europe.

German officials don't really think Russia is about to turn off the gas if it doesn't get its way on some issue. After all, it never did that during the old cold war, and Russia today is much more dependent on Western markets. But still, centuries of uneasy relations between Europe and Russia make German officials queasy about how dependent they've grown on the Kremlin to heat their homes and offices. Queasy or not, one thing they know for sure: Russia is back. The gas man cometh.

Europe's Muslims (WP)

The Washington Post, October 25, 2006

AYEAR AGO this week, riots erupted in mostly Muslim suburbs of Paris and other French cities, underlining the alienation of a subculture that makes up 8 percent of the country's population but has suffered from chronic unemployment and discrimination. One year later, that alienation -- and the threat of violence that comes with it -- appears to have worsened, not only in France but across Western Europe. French police are facing what some call a "permanent intifada" in Muslim neighborhoods, with nearly 2,500 incidents of violence against officers recorded in the first six months of the year. Some of these now take the form of planned ambushes: On Sunday a gang of youths emptied a bus of its passengers, set it on fire, and then stoned the firefighters who responded.

In Britain, the London bombings of 2005, which were executed in part by native-born Muslims, have been succeeded by this summer's arrest of another group of native extremists who allegedly plotted to blow up airliners. Two Lebanese residents of Germany were accused of trying to bomb passenger trains. The threat of violence by Muslims angered by perceived insults, whether from the German-born pope or the director of a Mozart opera, has become more frequent.

Europeans are slowly growing more aware that a major part of the global struggle against Islamic extremism must take place in their own countries -- and not just in faraway Afghanistan or Iraq. But their governments, media and political elites still appear to be a long way from coming to grips with the challenge. Rather than seeking to address the larger alienation of mainstream Muslims, European leaders often appear to do the opposite -- by challenging the culture of Muslims and defending gratuitous insults of Islam.

DOJ_NMG_0086248

One recent but hardly isolated example came from Britain's House of Commons leader, Jack Straw, who criticized Muslim women for wearing veils and said he asked those who visited his office to remove them, on the grounds that they impede "communication." It's hard to believe that veils are the biggest obstacle to communication between British politicians and the country's Muslims; and it's even harder to imagine Mr. Straw raising similar objections about Sikh turbans or Orthodox Jewish dress. True, the Labor Party MP was reflecting -- or maybe pandering to -- the concern of many in Britain about the self-segregation of some Muslims. But veils -- which are also under government attack in France and Italy -- are not the cause of that segregation, much less of terrorism. Attacks on Muslim custom by public officials are more likely to reinforce than to ease the community's alienation.

Mr. Straw and other European politicians could contribute far more to combating radical Islam if they focused on those who actually foment intolerance among European Muslims -- as well as those in the mainstream community who promote prejudice against Arabs and South Asians and their descendants. Muslims in Europe should be invited to embrace the countries where they live on their own terms. They should be expected to respect laws and freedoms. But politicians would do better to work on dismantling the barriers Muslims face in getting educations and jobs rather than those that distinguish Islam from the secular majority.

DOJ_NMG_0086249

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, October 25, 2006 8:22 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, October 25, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061025.pdf; agnb061025.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Believes US Is Misunderstood In War On Terror.....3
US Concerned By Release Of Saudi Prisoners For Ramadan 4
"Essential Element" Of Canadian Anti-Terror Law Ruled Unconstitutional.....5

Homeland Response:

In Letter to Gonzales, Grassley Calls Lack Of Anthrax Probe Briefings "Outrageous." 5
Busy US Airports Show Interest In Registered Traveler 5
More Human Remains Found At WTC Site 5
White Louisiana Residents More Likely To Seek Help With Insurance Claims.....5

War News:

More US Troops May Go To Iraq As Government Agrees To Set Timetable 6
Cheney Says Iraqi Forces Must Take Over Responsibility For Security.....8
Overhead Consumes Large Share Of Iraq Reconstruction Budgets 9
Iran's Khamenei Calls For End To Iraq's Sectarian Conflict . 10
Military Searches Fail To Find Missing Soldier..... 10
US, Iraqi Forces Fortify Position In Retaken Insurgent Base .. 10
Army Training Military Advisors For Iraq 10
Service Members Sign Appeal Urging US Withdrawal From Iraq 10
Isikoff Criticizes Weekly Standard For Choosing Novak To Review "Hubris." 10
Islamists Seen As Shifting Attention Back To Afghanistan 11

Corporate Scandals:

Former Comverse CFO Pleads Guilty To Charges Stemming From Options Backdating Scheme..... 11
Skilling Sentence Ends Enron Era, But Corruption Probes Continue..... 12
NEC Says It IS Subject Of SEC Investigation 12
Corporate Scandals Highlight Work Of General Counsels.....13
Study Highlights Cost Of Options Scandal 13
NYTimes Praises Senate Panels For Investigating SEC Pequot Probe.....13

Criminal Law:

Hastert, Reynolds Testify Before House Ethics Subcommittee Investigating Foley Scandal.....13
FBI Has Not "Substantiated" Allegations Against Harman And AIPAC 14
FBI Investigating Renzi's Role In Arizona Land Sale 14
Experts Say Ban Will Not Stop Online Gambling 15
Former Refco CFO Charged With Defrauding Investors.....15
FBI Investigating LANL Classified Documents Found In Police Drug Raid 15
Safavian Defense Submits Support Letters For Friday Sentencing.....16
Suburban Chicago Mayor Pleads Not Guilty To Bribery Charges.....16
Jury Finds Man Guilty Of Murdering NYTimes Editor 16
FBI Investigating Stolen Art In Deceased New Yorker's Collection 17
FBI, Arizona Police Investigating Theft Of Power Line Maintenance Trucks, Tools.....17
FBI, SEC Investigating Online Brokerage Account Hackings.17
Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Online Investment Fraud 17
FBI Investigating Child Porn Allegation Against Connecticut Episcopal Music Director 18
Massachusetts State Trooper To Plead Guilty To Child Enticement Charges.....18
PG County Police Attribute Decline In Crime To Staffing Decisions 18
Ohio Executes Cult Leader For Murders Of Five Followers...18
Maryland Delegate Accused Of Foreclosure-Rescue Fraud.18
New Technologies Spur Wave Of Retail Crime.....19

Civil Law:

COPA Litigation Begins Final Round 19
Group Claims More FOIA Resources Needed 19
Bankruptcy Judge Gives Dana Corp More Time For Bonus Plan 20
WSJournal Says Bankruptcy Overhaul Law Working 20

Civil Rights:

NAACP Calls For DOJ Probe Of Richmond Police Shooting 20
Two Mississippi Jailers Charged With Inmate Assaults 21
Judge To Lift DOJ Oversight Of Hawaii Mental Health Plan .. 21
Studies Finds Racial Disparities In US Health Care 21
Battle Over Virginia Gay Marriage Amendment Heats Up 21

Antitrust:

Steel Tubing Firm Owned By Carlyle To Announce Merger . 22
DOJ Criticized Over Case Involving Shipping Industry Price-Fixing 22
Thompson Corp To Put Learning Unit Up For Sale 22
EU Probing French Guarantee Loan To TVO 22

Environment:

White House Solidly Behind Moratorium On Deep Water Bottom Trawling 23
US, EU Officials To Discuss Environmental Issues At Finland Meeting 23
Interior Department Delays Gulf Oil And Gas Leases In Settlement With Louisiana 23
Schwarzenegger Chides Bush Over Global Warming 24
Environmentalists Rate California Beaches' Levels Of Pollution 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Scam Features Fake Email From Mueller 24
$27 Million Worth Of Meth, Cocaine Seized In Georgia, 3 Arrested 24
Agents Shut Down Pharmacy In Louisiana 25
Five Face Drug-Distribution Charges In Indiana 25
Four Face Charges Following Marijuana Dispensary Raid In California 25
Meth Seized In Indiana Following Warning By Federal Authorities 26
Judge Says Michigan Doctor Ran "Prescription Mill." 26
North Carolina Man Faces Federal Drug-Manufacturing Charges 26
Convicted Doctor Criticizes Federal Investigation In Painkiller Case 26
In California, Marijuana Activist's Trial Prompts Dispute Over Supporters' T-shirts, Buttons 26
Bush Administration Seeks To Maintain Aid To Colombia 26
Two Congressmen Urge Rumsfeld To Step Up Afghanistan Anti-Drug Efforts 27

Immigration:

Role Of DNA Testing In Immigration Examined 27

Tax:

Thomas Questions Tax-Exempt Status Of NCAA Athletics 27

Congress-Administration:

Education Department Eases Restrictions On Single-Sex Classes 28
Federal Auditors Probe Costs Of Transporting Medicaid Patients 28
Senate Finance Committee Produces List Of Possible "Tax Gap" Fixes 28
Reid's "Ethical Transgressions" Seen As Evidence Of Congress' "Entitlement" Mind Set 29
Perino Featured In Esquire's "Women We're Ashamed To Love" Special 29
White House Chief Usher Retiring 29
Patent And Trademark Office Institutes Telecommuting Pilot Project 29
Government Urged To Provide Face Protection In Event Of Flu Outbreak 29

Other News:

Dow Hits New High As Investors Await Federal Reserve Meeting 30
Some Heating Bills To Rise Despite Drop In Natural Gas Prices 30
Judge Rules Nine-Year-Old Cannot Be Forced To Undergo Circumcision 30
Former Editor Wins Lawsuit Against Music Magazine's Founders 30
Bush Says Tax Bills Would Increase Under Democrats 31
White House Uses "Radio Day" To Spread Optimistic Message 33
White House Reaching Out To Disaffected Conservatives 33
Rove Remains Optimistic About GOP Retaining House Majority 34
Pelosi Sees Economy As Number One Election Issue 35
NRCC Focusing On 33 Key House Races 36
Drug Industry's Contributions To GOP Candidates Prove Controversial 36

DOJ_NMG_0086252

Democrats Hope To Create "Blue Belt" Across Three Florida Districts....36
Veteran Republicans Running Like Underdogs....36
In AZ5, Hayworth, Mitchell Display Differences In Personality 37
Despite Bribery Probe, Tight Reelection Bid, Jefferson Projects Confidence....37
NYTimes Endorses Shays' Opponent In CT4....37
Documents Cast Doubt On Taylor Land Ownership Claims. 37
Commentator Criticizes Treatment Of Ney....37
Senate Polls Show Three GOP States May Deny Democrats Senate Majority....37
Impact Of Racial Issues On Tennessee Senate Race Considered....38
Talent Says He Supports Bush On Some Issues, Disagrees With Him On Others....39
Limbaugh Accuses Michael J. Fox Of Exaggerating His Illness In Ad....39
Virginia Candidates, Parties Begin Multi-Million Dollar Ad Blitz....40
Kennedy States Support For Iraq War In New Ad....40
Cardin Says Faith And Family Sustain Him....40
Report Warns Of Potential Voting Problems In 10 States....41
GOP Lobbying Firms Not Clamoring To Hire Democrats As Election Nears....41
WPost Endorses Ehrlich For Reelection....41
Anti-Deval Ad May Have Backfired On Healey In Massachusetts....41
Survey Finds US Muslims Likely To Back Democrats....42
Cheney Says Clinton Would Be A "Formidable" Presidential Candidate....42
Cook Called Most "Prominent" Political Forecaster....42
College Tuition Rising Faster Than Inflation....43
Former Morgan Stanley VP Praises Spitzer As "Good For Business."....43
Rice Defends "Axis Of Evil" Concept....44
Israel Ponders Preemptive Gaza Strike On Hamas Weapons Stockpiles....46
Pentagon Officials Enter Plea On Arms Deals....46
Chavez Continues Security Council Candidacy, Denies He's Backing Bolivia....47
Korologos Expected To Resign As Ambassador To Belgium 47
Study Says Most Automakers Falling Short Of Europe's CO2 Emissions Targets....47
Vietnamese Economy Attracts Investment....47
Book Argues Mercenaries Could End Abuses In Darfur....48
Friedman Say Energy Struggle Reviving Cold War Tensions In Europe....48
WPost Says Europeans Not Bridging Gap With Muslim Community....48

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages....48

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington....49

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Believes US Is Misunderstood In War On Terror. The AP (10/25, Giles) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday he believes some of the U.S. actions in its war on terror have done damage to the image of the United States abroad, particularly its commitment to the rule of law." The AP continues, "The U.S. has drawn criticism around the world for the Abu Ghraib prison scandal in Iraq, its treatment of detainees and secret renditions of terrorism suspects to clandestine prisons in allied countries where they are allegedly tortured. … 'The notion that the United States does not fully support the rule of law is one I find very disappointing,' Gonzales told reporters, especially given that President Bush 'believes the Unites States is the leader, is a beacon of hope in the world and it's important that our actions should reflect a total commitment to the rule of law.'" The AP adds, "He blamed the country's deteriorating image on misunderstanding in Europe about what the U.S. is doing to fight terrorism. … 'Part of the misunderstanding is the fault of the United States in the sense that we need to be out there more, talking about what we are doing and why,' he said." The AP notes, "Gonzales was in Madrid for the sixth meeting of a working group set up two years ago to coordinate the fight against terrorism and other police matters. … Gonzales dismissed criticism that prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay detention facility were in legal limbo and said the recent Military Commissions Act ensured fair trials for terrorists and guarantees that evidence acquired through torture will not be used."

DOJ_NMG_0086253

FNC On the Record (10/24, 10:47 p.m.) FNC's Harris Faulkner "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the U.S. needs to do better job spelling out what it's doing to fight terror and why. On a trip abroad, Gonzales says his trips are an important way to reach his counterparts there about what the U.S. is trying to do to protect America and, in turn, protect the interest of its allies."

US, Spain Agree To Greater Anti-Terror Cooperation. AFP (10/25) reports, "Spain and the United States agreed to ramp up cooperation against terrorism and organized crime during a visit by US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the interior ministry said. … The agreement came during talks between Gonzales and Spanish Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba, it said." AFP continues, "Washington offered to make technology which the US Federal Bureau of Investigation uses to index DNA samples available to Spanish police. … Spanish Justice Minister Juan Fernando Lopez Aguilar told reporters after the meeting, which also saw Gonzales confer with Spanish counterpart Candido Conde-Pumpido, that judicial cooperation between the two nations was 'excellent.' … He added that they were committed to 'achieving good long-term results' in fighting terror." AFP adds, "Gonzales said the United States was sometimes 'misunderstood' in Europe and it had to 'talk more' to explain its position on security. … Asked if Spain was prepared to countenance handing over terror suspects to US military courts, Aguilar told Spanish media that Spain was determined to protect its citizens' rights at all times."

More Commentary. The Longview (TX) News-Journal (10/25) reports, "Alberto Gonzales, who once made headlines when he authored legal arguments that President Bush had the authority to authorize torture, is now disappointed by our nation's sagging reputation. … Gonzales, then the White House counsel but now the U.S. Attorney General, was in Spain for a meeting of an international working group created two years ago to coordinate the fight against terrorism and deal with other global law enforcement issues. While there, he told reporters, 'The notion that the United States does not fully support the rule of law is one I find very disappointing.' … According to an Associated Press report, the nation's top lawyer added that Bush 'believes the United States is the leader, is a beacon of hope in the world and it's important that our actions should reflect a total commitment to the rule of law.' … Of course, Gonzales failed to mention that in order for Bush to live up to his words, he needed to sign legislation last week — the Military Commissions Act — to ensure fair trials for suspected terrorists and assure that evidence garnered through torture will not be used at such trials." The News-Journal adds, "Gonzales told reporters that our country's tarnished image abroad is due to our allies' misunderstandings about what the United States is doing to fight terrorism. … Actually, that tarnished image is due to our allies' growing understanding of measures the United States has taken in its efforts to combat terrorism, including the use of secret prisons abroad, the rendition of prisoners to governments known to use torture and the indefinite detention of people who are suspected but not yet proven terrorists. … Gonzales would like to talk about Bush's 'total commitment to the rule of law' but he has often been reticent about discussing the administration's commitment to the spirit of the law. That's because the longtime Bush aide and attorney has played a key role in seeking loopholes that allow the president to sidestep the spirit of the law. … The attorney general's comments were almost laughable when he opined that the way to dispel the 'misunderstanding' among our European allies is for the United States "to be out there more, talking about what we are doing and why." … Meanwhile, at home we hear administration officials and supporters raising the specter that members of the media are unpatriotic and possibly traitorous when they report about what the administration is doing — and why."

US Concerned By Release Of Saudi Prisoners For Ramadan. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Williams, Connell, Lopez, 918K) reports, "US officials, apparently caught off guard by the Saudi government's recent release of more than two dozen former Guantanamo Bay prisoners, are voicing fears that the men will join the camp of violent extremist groups. The Saudis released the 29 men from jail for observance of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement, with instructions to return to custody by the end of this month. Saudi officials said that although the men were still under investigation for possible terrorist ties, they were not considered serious threats." The Times adds that Saudi decision to temporarily release the 29 men "illustrates the limits of US influence as the Bush administration seeks to shrink the population of Guantanamo by transferring prisoners to other nations. And it underscores how differently the US and other countries, including Britain and Germany, perceive the danger posed by former detainees."

DOJ_NMG_0086254

"Essential Element" Of Canadian Anti-Terror Law Ruled Unconstitutional. The New York Times (10/25, Austen, 1.21M) reports, "An Ontario judge ruled Tuesday that an 'essential element' of Canada's antiterrorism laws was unconstitutional. The decision, by Justice Douglas Rutherford of the Ontario Superior Court, marks the second time in less than a week that a judge at the court has rejected parts of the nation's new antiterrorism laws. Justice Rutherford found that the laws, introduced after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, improperly defined terrorism as a crime committed with religious, ideological or political motives. That definition, he said, is 'an essential element that is not only novel in Canadian law, but the impact of which constitutes an infringement of certain fundamental freedoms,' including 'those of religion, thought, belief, opinion, expression and association.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

In Letter to Gonzales, Grassley Calls Lack Of Anthrax Probe Briefings "Outrageous." Under the headline "FBI Hit For Anthrax 'Dead-Ends,'" the Washington Times (10/25, Seper, 88K) reports Sen. Charles Grassley "wants Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to explain why the FBI has not made an arrest in its anthrax investigation, citing five years of 'dead-ends and a lack of progress.'" Grassley wrote to Gonzales, "The FBI's refusal to brief Congress over the last several years is an outrageous response to reasonable requests at getting to the bottom of the attacks." The Times notes, "FBI Assistant Director Joseph Persichini Jr., who heads the Washington field office, said last month that FBI and U.S. Postal Service investigators were 'fully committed to bringing the perpetrators of these murderous attacks to justice.' … Mr. Grassley said a detailed examination of the probe may reveal the FBI's 'institutional resistance to criticism and dissent.'"

Milloy Says Postal Workers Feel "Forgotten," "Vulnerable." In his Washington Post (10/25, 748K) column, Courtland Milloy writes that postal workers feel "forgotten" in the anthrax saga and notes that Brentwood Exposed president Dena Briscoe said at a memorial service last week for the postal workers killed in the attack, "Like soldiers, we continue to work on the front line, sometimes feeling unarmed, in hopes that our health and safety needs are met, and that the culprits are apprehended." Milloy adds, "The challenge of forgiveness was highlighted by a letter from Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski" to the memorial service, in which she wrote, "It is unacceptable that we still have no leads." However, "Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director of the FBI's Washington field office, told the postal workers that law enforcement agents had worked extremely hard, round-the-clock, and that the failure to solve the crime had caused much grief and frustration. … His humility seemed to soften the crowd," but "the wounds inflicted five years ago are still raw. And it probably doesn't help the healing that some postal workers still feel terribly vulnerable to attack."

Busy US Airports Show Interest In Registered Traveler. USA Today (10/25, 3A, Frank, 2.27M) reports, "Ten of the USA's busiest airports have asked" the TSA to let them run Registered Traveler programs and could start "by the end of the year, launching a much-delayed effort to expedite security for travelers who pass background checks." Among those on "a list of interested airports" released by the TSA after a Freedom of Information Act request by USA TODAY are Atlanta, Chicago O'Hare and Los Angeles airports. "Steven Brill, CEO of a New York company that would run Registered Traveler programs, said 10 large airports would provide a 'critical mass to ensure this program launches and flourishes.'"

More Human Remains Found At WTC Site. The AP (10/24, Kugler) reported that 36 more bone fragments were found Tuesday in subterranean cavities along the edge of the World Trade Center site. Workers found the remains as they "continued burrowing into areas that were apparently missed during the initial cleanup." The AP adds, "The newly discovered bones are just the latest finding of overlooked remains. Hundreds of bone fragments have been found on the roof of a building just south of the trade center site, and officials are eyeing whether other buildings need to be combed again."

White Louisiana Residents More Likely To Seek Help With Insurance Claims. USA Today/AP (10/25, 5A, Callimachi, Bass) reports, "Though poor and minority neighborhoods suffered the brunt of Katrina, residents living in white neighborhoods have been three times as likely as homeowners in black neighborhoods to seek state help in resolving insurance disputes, according to an Associated Press computer analysis of Louisiana's insurance complaints settled in the first year after Katrina."

DOJ_NMG_0086255

Louisiana Insurance Commissioner Jim Donelon "said his department made an extra effort to reach as many people as possible and let them know the agency was willing to press their case with insurers. … Mike Trevino, a spokesman for Allstate, said the state agency treated minority and white homeowners equally. The figures obtained by the AP support his contention."

Quiet Hurricane Season Provides Relief For New Orleans, Insurance Industry. ABC World News (10/24, story 10, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) followed up a brief report on Hurricane Paul weakening to a tropical storm with a report on this year's hurricane season, which "has been…unusually quiet." ABC (Koffman) continued that forecasters, who had predicted an active season this year, "admit theirs is an inexact science." Meanwhile, the light season "is very good news for New Orleans, where the Army Corps of Engineers has another year to rebuild levees Hurricane Katrina overran." An inactive season is also good news for the insurance industry, but not for homeowners, who have "seen rates sky rocket. And they won't be coming down."

Recovery Official Says State Is Rebuilding "Safer, Stronger And Smarter." Norman C. Francis, chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, in an op-ed in USA Today (10/25, 12A, 2.27M) writes that in response to the Katrina, "we in Louisiana have pledged to acknowledge our risks and rebuild safer, stronger and smarter. This is oftentimes an unpopular position, but we've stuck to that commitment." The state "adopted a tough, new statewide building code and FEMA's new flood elevation guidelines. With funding from President Bush and Congress, we created programs to allow families to sell us their flood-damaged homes or elevate as they make repairs." Francis states that the question should not be "whether to rebuild Louisiana, but how to do so safely."

In an opposing editorial, USA Today (10/25, 12A, 2.27M) writes, "Federal taxpayers will be subsidizing reconstruction in flood areas, underwriting the insurance on those homes and will no doubt have to bail out the flood insurance program if the homes get wiped out again. The program collected only $2.2 billion last year in premiums but will pay out more than $20 billion in Katrina claims, leaving taxpayers on the hook for the rest." USA Today states that "the homeowners in and around New Orleans deserve some assistance because of the magnitude of the disaster and the failure of federally constructed levees to protect them. But encouraging rebuilding in the most flood-prone areas is foolhardy."

WAR NEWS:

More US Troops May Go To Iraq As Government Agrees To Set Timetable. All three networks led with Iraq and the news that US commander Gen. George W. Casey Jr. says more troops may be needed to stabilize the situation there. Between them, the networks ran just under 19 minutes on Iraq last night. The tone of the stories was generally negative. The CBS Evening News (10/24, 3:40, Couric, 7.66M) opened its broadcast by saying the "US death toll topped 2,800 today as the military announced the deaths of two Marines, a soldier, and a sailor. With these growing numbers, pressure is building on President Bush to find a way out and bring the troops home. But the President says that cannot happen until the Iraqis can handle their own security. So the question is when will that happen?" Casey was shown saying, "We are about 75% of the way through a three-step process in building those forces. And it's going to take another 12 to 18 months or so, until I believe the Iraqi security forces are completely capable." But CBS (Logan) added, "But these uniformed men you see here in handcuffs are the Iraqi security forces. This time, they're prisoners of an American unit instead of partners. That's because these troops from 101st Airborne Division, believe the grenades just fired at them came from the Iraqi soldiers' weapons, and it's not an isolated incident."

NBC Nightly News (10/24, 4:50, Williams, 9.87M) led with what it called "a relentless drumbeat of bad news from Iraq lately, and the message from officials there today was, they will need more time, maybe even more troops in order to fully join the fight to suppress the enemy in Baghdad. On that front today, the US announced the deaths of four more servicemen. That brings the total for October alone to 92. And that's a grim record pace." NBC (Engel) added, "Today was a carefully orchestrated news event to announce that the Iraqi government has accepted a timetable, clearly driven by Washington. As US troops patrolled Baghdad today, the top American officials in Iraq held a rare joint press conference to deliver a clear message: No staying the course here." NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 2, 2:50, 9.87M) followed on that theme in its next story, with anchor Brian Williams saying, "Last night we reported the President will no longer use the words 'stay the course' in his speeches." NBC (Gregory) added, "There are important signals being sent out" from the White House "two weeks before an election. A senior advisor told me tonight, we don't want to appear to have our heads stuck in the sand in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0086256

CBS Evening News (10/24, story 2, 1:15, 7.66M) anchor Katie Couric asked Pentagon correspondent David Martin, "You've got military leaders expressing guarded optimism, and yet, troops on the ground seeming to feel that things are not going the right way. So why the disconnect?" Martin replied, "I think the generals genuinely believe that success is still possible. But what's changed is that I think they also believe that failure is possible, and with each passing day of sectarian violence, failure becomes more of a possibility." ABC World News (10/24, story 2, 2:15, McCarthy, 8.78M) said "any progress" in Iraq "will require strong political leadership."

ABC World News (10/24, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M), taking a less negative approach, led by saying a "new timetable for when the troops might come home" comes "with the caution that more US troops might be needed before they do." ABC (Karl) said Casey and US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "say that the Iraqi government has agreed to set a time line for resolving major political and economic issues. It's a timeline, they say, that could leave the Iraqis largely self-sufficient within 12 or 18 months. The announcement came at a generally upbeat press conference in Baghdad." But "former generals were skeptical." Retired Maj. Gen. William Nash, Council on Foreign Relations: "If they don't deliver, the time line, undoubtedly, will be extended or we'll withdraw without a political settlement, in which case, we'll leave behind us much more chaos and much more violence."

The New York Times (10/25, Burns, 1.21M) reports in a "news conference held after a week of largely bad news from Iraq," Casey and Khalilzad "sought to reassure an increasingly restive American public that the war was still winnable." But the two men "did not address what would happen if the government failed to meet the timetable, which includes measures meant to address some of the most intractable issues plaguing the country, including the sectarian militias that have been responsible for much of the worst violence this year."

Under the front page headline "More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound," the Washington Post (10/25, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports Casey said he "may call for more troops to be sent to Baghdad, possibly by increasing the overall U.S. presence in Iraq, as rising bloodshed pushes Iraqi and American deaths to some of their highest levels of the war." The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Roug, 918K) leads a similar story by saying Casey said more US troops "might be needed to quell sectarian violence raging in the capital."

The Wall Street Journal (10/25, Jaffe, 2.03M) takes a different tack in a front page report, saying US officials, with "few military options left to counter the violence" in Iraq, are "shifting more of the onus onto Baghdad's beleaguered political leaders to broker compromises they hope might stem the rising bloodshed." The Journal focuses on the timetable, not the possible US troop increase, but concludes that "little in Iraq over the past three years offers reason for optimism that the renewed pressure" on PM Nouri al-Maliki "will produce better results."

USA Today (10/25, Jervis, 2.27M) headlines its front page story "No Major Troop Cut In Iraq For A Year," and spends much of the report discussing current troop levels. The Washington Times (10/25, Scarborough, 88K) and the AP (10/24, Hurst) have straightforward reports on the Casey/Khalilzad announcement.

Baghdad Violence Said To Belie Casey's "Laudable Goal." The New York Times (10/25, Gordon, 1.21M) says Casey's "laudable goal" of turning over security responsibilities within 18 months "seems far removed from the violence-plagued streets of Iraq's capital, where American forces have taken the lead in trying to protect the city and American soldiers substantially outnumber Iraqi ones." The Times says that with the "rise in sectarian killings, a Sunni-based insurgency that appears to be as potent as ever and an Iraqi security establishment that continues to have difficulties deploying sufficient numbers of motivated and proficient forces in Baghdad, General Casey's target seems to be an increasingly heroic assumption." USA Today (10/25, 8A, Jervis, 2.27M) headlines a story "More Troops Means More Targets For Snipers," writing that sniper attacks on US troops "have risen dramatically as more Americans have been pulled into the capital to patrol on foot and in lightly armored vehicles amid raging religious violence."

Some Iraqis Dispute Khalilzad's Assessment. The AP (10/24, Hendawi) reports that while Khalilzad "insisted" that things "are not all bad in Iraq, citing the growing number of satellite dishes on rooftops and consumers with cell phones as signs of economic progress," some Iraqis "saw things differently." Baghdad resident Mohammed Ibrahim, a government employee, said, "We'd prefer he take those back and return just 10 percent of our prewar life. Saying things like that shows the Americans' contempt for us Iraqis."

DOJ_NMG_0086257

Pace Still Optimistic About Iraq's Future. The AP (10/24, Baldor) reports JCS Chairman Gen. Peter Pace said he is "not discouraged by what other U.S. commanders have described as disappointing progress in securing Baghdad, but he predicted no quick turnaround." Pace "told a Pentagon news conference that his optimism about Iraq's future is based on his belief that most Iraqis want peace and stability. He also said Iraqis have plenty of incentive to halt the sectarian violence that threatens to tear their country apart."

Biden Federalism Plan Slowly Gaining Bipartisan Interest. The Hill (10/25, Schor) writes that lawmakers and candidates from both parties "are signaling new openness to dividing the war-torn nation into three autonomous regions, a plan closely associated with Sen. Joe Biden." Biden, "one of his party's most trusted foreign policy voices, has turned up the spotlight on his plan for largely self-governing regions in Iraq." Biden, appearing on CNN's Larry King Live (10/24), said the Bush Administration's Iraq policy has "been wrong from the beginning. There's been no apparent willingness on the part of the civilians in this administration to change it. … The thing is broken. They need a political solution in Iraq and we need a bipartisan solution at home."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "Yes, the Iraq project is difficult, and its outcome dangerously uncertain." But while "timetables and deadlines may sound like realpolitik," they "only feed suspicions that the U.S. will abandon Iraq's leaders once they have walked out onto a political limb. Iraq is not yet in a state of 'civil war,' and it has a functioning, if imperfect, government. If changes of tactics or force levels are needed, by all means make them. But what Iraqis most need from Washington is reassurance of support for the tough decisions and battles that lie ahead."

In a Washington Post (10/25, A17, 748K) op-ed, American Enterprise Institute resident scholar Frederick Kagan writes, "It's been coming for a long time: the idea that fixing Iraq is the Iraqis' problem, not ours -- that we've done all we can and now it's up to them. … The implication of these arguments is clear: The United States should prepare to leave Iraq, after which the Iraqis will work out their own troubles -- or they won't. In any event, we can no longer help them. This notion is wrong and morally contemptible, and it endangers American security around the world."

Cheney Says Iraqi Forces Must Take Over Responsibility For Security. Vice President Cheney was asked on NPR (10/24) why the US does not put a larger force on the ground in Iraq. Cheney said, "Because the judgment has been up until now that the key for us in Iraq is to get the Iraqis into the fight. And we've got 140,000 roughly troops there now, US and coalition forces, and we've worked very aggressively to stand up, and we're -- I think George Casey said today, we're about 75 percent of the way there in terms of getting an Iraqi force that's able to provide for their own security. The sooner we do that, the sooner we can reduce our own presence and turn things over to them."

Asked on NPR (10/24) if he still believes the insurgency is in its last throes, Cheney said, "Can't say that. I made it clear earlier that I would have expected that the political process we set in motion, the three national elections and so forth would have resulted in a lower level of violence than we're seeing today. It hasn't happened yet. I can't say that we're over the hump in terms of violence, no."

Snow Says US Is Winning War In Iraq. White House spokesman Tony Snow was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (10/24) if the US is winning the war in Iraq. Snow said, "Yes." Asked if the US will eventually declare victory, Snow said, "I think what's going to happen is the Iraqi people are going to be able to declare victory, because you're going to have a democratic society that in that part of the world is going to be able to set an example."

GOP Said To Evince Ambivalence On Iraq. The Financial Times (10/25, Sevastopulo, Dombey) runs one of the few optimistic headlines this morning, "Success In Iraq Possible, Say US Officials," but its report is less sunny, saying that while "top US officials in Baghdad on Tuesday said Iraqi forces should be 'completely capable' of taking responsibility for security" within a year and a half, "Republican support for the White House strategy on Iraq continued to erode just two weeks ahead of November's congressional elections."

The CBS Evening News (10/24, story 3, 1:20, Axelrod, 7.66M) said, "The White House is quite a bind, because on one hand it has to project some sense of resolve, certainly to keep appealing to its base. On the other hand, they read the polls, and they know that voters want a change in Iraq policy but as far as and significant change a White House official tells me do not expect to see anything significant prior to Election Day." McClatchy (10/25, Hutcheson, Talev) also examines the US election impact, saying that "judging from the initial reactions" at home, the Casey/Khalilzad announcement "appears unlikely to influence the Nov. 7 congressional elections."

DOJ_NMG_0086258

Columnist Says GOP Defeat Would Be Islamist Victory. In his Washington Times (10/25, 88K) column, Michael Scheuer writes, "In a world where leading Western experts have consigned Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda to near-irrelevant status, the gangly Saudi is on the verge of seeing the forces he leads and inspires knock off their third infidel government. Not bad for a guy running from rock to rock and cave to cave." Scheuer faults "Islamist militancy" for the defeat of then-PM Jose Maria Aznar in Spain and the recent coup in Thailand, and says "bin Laden, et. al, know the biggest prize looms just ahead -- the chance that the Republican Party will be ousted from one or both houses of Congress."

Pelosi Says Americans Will Not "Stay The Course." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, appearing on CNBC's Kudlow and Company (10/24), said President Bush "has said 'stay the course.' It was a slogan, not a strategy. Now he is banning 'stay the course.' I don't know if it is banned as a slogan or a strategy. But in any event it's clear that the American people are just not tolerating this course of action. They don't intend to stay the course."

McGovern Says US Headed Down Vietnam "Road" In Iraq. The Washington Post (10/25, A15, 748K) interviews ex-Sen. George McGovern, co-author of "Out of Iraq: A Practical Plan for Withdrawal Now." The Post leads its story by saying that "during the years that he led opposition to the Vietnam War," McGovern says he "consoled his family with the proposition" that the US "would never again commit such a 'tragic mistake,' as he put it." But McGovern said in the interview "that America is headed down 'the same road' in Iraq."

Columnists Examine Retirement Of "Stay The Course." In her New York Times (10/25, 1.21M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "Things have become so dire for the Republicans that now even Bush is distancing himself from Bush. The president is cutting and running from the president." Bush "will no longer stay the course on the rallying cry 'stay the course.' … Of course, the administration has never really said what 'the course' is, so it was never really apparent what 'staying' it meant, anyhow."

In his Washington Post (10/25, A17, 748K), column, David Ignatius writes, "The Bush administration's Iraq policy is no longer 'stay the course' but, in the phrase of White House spokesman Tony Snow, 'a study in constant motion.' The reality, as near as I can tell, is that the administration isn't sure yet where to move after the November elections. Nor are most of the administration's critics." How can the US, "in its search for an exit, avoid compounding the mistakes it made in invading Iraq? To help light the way, we are blessed with a deus ex machina in the bipartisan Iraq Study Group."

In his Washington Post (10/25, A17, 748K), column, Harold Meyerson writes, "The president has fled the field from 'stay the course,' signaling not just the unwinnability of his war but the bankruptcy of his political strategy. For as the president and his party grope for an alternative plan of action in Iraq, Karl Rove's bright line between Republican resolve and Democratic defeatism has become irreversibly fuzzed. … 'Stay the course' has been replaced by 'anything goes' -- so long as it helps the Republicans cling to power."

Overhead Consumes Large Share Of Iraq Reconstruction Budgets. The New York Times (10/25, Glanz, 1.21M) says a report by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction says "overhead costs have consumed more than half the budget of some reconstruction projects," leaving "far less money than expected to provide the oil, water and electricity needed to improve the lives of Iraqis." Overhead expenses including "housing and feeding employees, completing paperwork and providing security" have "ranged from under 20 percent to as much as 55 percent of the budgets."

IG Report Finds Halliburton Passed On "Unusually High" Costs To US. On the front of its business section, the Washington Post (10/25, D1, Witte, 748K) reports, "A report released yesterday by the inspector general's office overseeing Iraq spending found that at least 55 percent, or $163 million, of $296 million in total costs rung up by Halliburton unit KBR" and "passed on to the government under a key contract to restore Iraq's oil industry" were administrative overhead, "a figure that critics said was unusually high," although the report "does not directly say whether KBR's overhead costs were excessive." It is "significantly higher than it was on work by other firms in Iraq, and experts said it is far above what is typically found on a government contract." Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross "defended the company's administrative spending," and "while the Army Corps of Engineers -- which oversaw the contracts -- acknowledged that some of the administrative costs were high," it "argued that important work was getting done even when money was being spent on administrative matters rather than directly on Corps projects."

DOJ_NMG_0086259

Halliburton To Sell 17% Of KBR In IPO. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, C5, 2.03M) reports, "Halliburton Co. will sell 17% of its Kellogg, Brown & Root engineering unit in an initial public offering of stock later this year, according to an updated Securities and Exchange Commission filing." The filing also said "that an investigation by a magistrate or a public prosecutor in Algeria 'may be pending' regarding sole-source contracts awarded to Brown & Root-Condor SpA, a joint venture with Condor Engineering SpA in which KBR had a 49% interest as of June 30." Following the sale of "27.8 million shares to the public, Halliburton will own the remaining 83% of KBR; it plans to spin that stake off to Halliburton shareholders in April."

Iran's Khamenei Calls For End To Iraq's Sectarian Conflict. The AP (10/24, Karimi) reports, "Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei on Tuesday called for an end to the bloody sectarian conflict" in Iraq. At an Eid al-Fitr event in Tehran, Khamenei told a large crowd, "The Iraqi people should do everything to avoid sectarian conflict."

Military Searches Fail To Find Missing Soldier. ABC World News (10/24, story 3, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that there is "no sign of a US soldier that went missing" in Baghdad on Monday. The soldier "is a translator, fluent in Arabic. And it is believed he was visiting a relative's house when masked men drove up and grabbed him." The AP (10/24, Salaheddin) says the US military "carried out house-to-house searches in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood" for the missing translator, "but said Tuesday they had found no sign of him." The Washington Post (10/25, A14, Anderson, 748K) says the soldier "apparently has family in Baghdad and left the Green Zone…to visit relatives Monday to celebrate Eid al-Fitr."

US, Iraqi Forces Fortify Position In Retaken Insurgent Base. The Washington Post (10/25, A14, White, 748K) reports on US troops' taking of an "enormous power plant that had been used by insurgents" near the Euphrates. Inside they "saw cages -- one containing a pair of shoes and what appeared to be human feces -- on the bottom floor, what U.S. commanders said they believe is an indication that prisoners had been held there and possibly tortured." US and Iraqi soldiers "began fortifying their position inside the plant…as part of a concerted effort to deny insurgents a safe haven scarcely 10 miles from Baghdad's southern edge."

Army Training Military Advisors For Iraq. Under the headline "Army Is Training Advisors For Iraq," the Los Angeles Times (10/25, Spiegel, 918K) reports that at Fort Riley in Kansas, the Army "is building a training base that by early next year will be turning as many as 2,000 of its most promising midlevel officers into military advisors every two months, most of them headed to Iraq." The mission "reflects the U.S. military's vision of its long-range role in Iraq -- as advisors for local forces who will be doing the actual fighting. But it represents something of a gamble as well: The effort is sucking thousands out of their normal combat deployments at a time when American forces are facing personnel shortages and violence in Iraq is surging."

Service Members Sign Appeal Urging US Withdrawal From Iraq. The Washington Post (10/25, A13, Tyson, 748K) reports, "More than 100 U.S. service members have signed a rare appeal urging Congress to support the 'prompt withdrawal' of all American troops and bases from Iraq," according to organizers. The statement, "sponsored by antiwar activists including Iraq Veterans Against the War, Veterans for Peace and Military Families Speak Out," reads in part, "Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home." The "unusual appeal -- the first of its kind in the Iraq war, organizers say -- makes use of a legal protection afforded by the Military Whistle-Blower Protection Act, which provides that members of the military, acting in their capacity as citizens, can send a protected communication to Congress without reprisal."

But the AP (10/24, Flaherty) says "at least two senators -- both critical of the administration's handling of the war in Iraq -- said they were concerned that service members speaking out against the president may undermine the military's apolitical status." Sen. Jack Reed, a West Point graduate, said, "We expect our soldiers to follow…the legitimate orders of their commanders." And Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "We've had a long tradition making sure the military doesn't engage in political debate."

Isikoff Criticizes Weekly Standard For Choosing Novak To Review "Hubris." The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" column (10/25, McCaslin) reports on "the lengthy written exchange between"

DOJ_NMG_0086260

Newsweek's Michael Isikoff, coauthor with the Nation's David Corn of "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War," and conservative columnist Bob Novak, who reviewed "Hubris" for the Weekly Standard. In a letter to the editor of the Standard Isikoff wrote, "I was amused, to say the least, to see that my old friends at The Weekly Standard asked Bob Novak to review" "Hubris." Isikoff asks, "Was Scooter Libby unavailable?" Novak responded, "I regret that my friend Mike Isikoff, in his letter, is still peddling the story of Scooter Libby and Karl Rove attempting to discredit Wilson by revealing his wife's intelligence background. … Apparently, he joins David Corn in not being able to accept that the conspiracy theory was demolished by his own book."

Islamists Seen As Shifting Attention Back To Afghanistan. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Rotella, 918K) reports, "The conflict in Iraq is drawing fewer foreign fighters as Muslim extremists aspiring to battle the West turn their attention back to the symbolically important and increasingly violent turf of Afghanistan. … The shift of militants to Afghanistan this year suggests that Al Qaeda and its allies, armed with new tactics honed in Iraq, are coming full circle five years after U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban mullahs." In Iraq, insurgent leaders "are now mainly interested in foreign recruits ready to die in suicide attacks, anti-terrorism officials say. Moreover, the conflict is dominated by violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims. In contrast, an accelerating Afghan offensive by the resurgent Taliban offers a clearer battleground and a wealth of targets: U.S. and other North Atlantic Treaty Organization troops, and the Western-backed government."

WSJournal Blames Pakistan For Afghanistan's Woes. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "Our finest foreign-policy minds have been abuzz lately trying explain how and why the U.S. and its NATO allies are, as a recent Newsweek International cover has it, 'Losing Afghanistan.' But no need for deep thoughts here: The largest part of the problem is neighboring Pakistan. In September, the Pakistan government of Pervez Musharraf agreed to abandon its North Waziristan province -- which shares a long border with Afghanistan -- to the de facto rule of its 'tribal elders' and the Taliban and mujahadeen terrorists they harbor." Since then, "the number of cross-border raids into Afghanistan has risen threefold. … We don't know what General Musharraf promised President Bush and Afghan President Hamid Karzai during their recent conclave in the White House. But we hope it was more tangible cooperation than we have been seeing of late. Sovereignty has responsibilities, and General Musharraf is not exercising them."

Scholar Urges US-NATO Aid Program On Pakistan-Afghanistan Border. In a Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M) op-ed, Barnett Rubin of the New York University Center on International Cooperation writes, "It will take more than a dinner at the White House…to overcome the longstanding antagonism between Pakistan and Afghanistan. Of course, the political clumsiness on the part of the U.S. does not begin or end there. Had we paid more attention to pre-9/11 history, we might not face a rising Taliban insurgency with sanctuary in Pakistan." Rubin says the US and NATO should "provide aid to develop the border area, where unemployment and illiteracy facilitate recruitment to armed groups" in order to "address the roots of instability and violence in this region, and make those on both sides of the frontier genuine partners in protecting both their own security, and ours."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Comverse CFO Pleads Guilty To Charges Stemming From Options Backdating Scheme. The Financial Times (10/25, Allison, Agencies) reports David Kreinberg, the former chief financial officer of Comverse, a "voicemail software company, on Tuesday became the first top executive to plead guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in connection with options backdating. The guilty plea, part of a deal struck with federal prosecutors, came as the US Securities and Exchange Commission announced that Mr Kreinberg had agreed to pay almost $2.4m to settle civil fraud charges." Kreinberg, "who has been free on $1m bail since he surrendered to the Federal Bureau of Investigations in August, was one of three former Comverse executives to be charged over backdating. Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander, Comverse's founder and chief executive, was arrested in Namibia earlier this month after being branded a fugitive from justice by US authorities. Mr Alexander, who has denied wrongdoing, is fighting extradition to the US, where he could face more than 20 years in jail if convicted. William Sorin, Comverse's former general counsel, is also facing charges."

DOJ_NMG_0086261

The Wall Street Journal (10/25, C3, Davies) reports Kreinberg "has told prosecutors that Mr. Alexander offered him a 'name your price' bribe if he would take sole blame for the fraud, according to people familiar with the situation. The alleged bribe started with offers of $2 million and then $5 million, according to prior court documents from prosecutors. At a hearing yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, Mr. Kreinberg admitted to helping Mr. Alexander select particularly favorable dates on which to grant options, using hindsight. 'I was asked by the CEO to bring him a printout of the company's trading prices over a past year period to enable him to select the 'as of' date that would be used for the exercise price of the option grant,' he said in court."

Bloomberg (10/25, Hurtado) reports that "Kreinberg implicated his former boss as he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in the U.S. probe of illegal manipulation of employee stock option grants." Bloomberg continues, "Former Comverse Chief Executive Officer Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander directed a scheme to systematically backdate stock option grants, Kreinberg claimed today in Brooklyn federal court. Contrary to Comverse's securities filings, Kreinberg told U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis 'the company was in fact issuing backdated options with an exercise price lower than the fair market value on the grant date.' … Alexander was arrested in Namibia last month and is the subject of a U.S. extradition request. Kreinberg, who faces a possible 15-year prison sentence, agreed to cooperate with the government in its prosecution of Alexander, and in related civil lawsuits as part of a separate $2.4 million settlement with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission." Bloomberg notes, "The U.S. Justice Department is trying to persuade the government of Namibia to return Alexander to the U.S. to face charges related to stock-option backdating, including conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings to regulators and money laundering."

The New York Law Journal (10/25, Bar, Perrotta) reports, "Kreinberg, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in the Eastern District U.S. Attorney's Office, is the first person in the country to plead guilty to illegally backdating stock options. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud, and one count of securities fraud. He faces up to 15 years in prison and $1.2 million in fines when he is sentenced Feb. 23. He also could be ordered to pay tens of millions in restitution." The Journal adds, "Kreinberg has separately settled civil charges against him. As part of an agreement with the SEC, he is permanently suspended from practicing as an accountant and must pay $2.4 million in disgorgement and prejudgment interest."

AFP (10/25) reports, "The investigation was led by the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, but it was triggered in early March when a Wall Street Journal reporter became suspicious about Comverse's stock option practices."

Skilling Sentence Ends Enron Era, But Corruption Probes Continue. The Washington Post (10/25, D1, Johnson, 748K) reports, "The sentencing Monday of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling ended the saga of the scandal-ridden Houston energy company and effectively closed the book on an era of high-profile corporate malfeasance. … Hours after a judge sentenced Skilling to more than 24 years in prison, the leaders of the Enron Task Force announced that they would close up shop," but "there were fresh signals about the direction post-Enron corporate crime enforcement would take. A new wave of investigations is targeting executive greed, insider trading and investment pools known as hedge funds. … 'There is an awful lot to do in the world of corporate fraud,' said Chip Burrus, assistant director in the FBI's criminal investigation division. Policing corporate malfeasance after Enron, it seems, won't be slow -- only different." The Post notes, "Timothy J. Coleman, a former prosecutor and Justice Department official, predicted that the legions of investigators hired by securities regulators, federal prosecutors and the FBI will pay lasting dividends because they will become a 'standing army' ready to target business wrongdoing."

NEC Says It IS Subject Of SEC Investigation. The Financial Times (10/25, Nakamoto) reports NEC, "the Japanese electronics group, said on Tuesday it was being investigated by the US Securities and Exchange Commission in connection with its delay in filing results for the last financial year. NEC said it had received 'a letter of informal inquiry from the SEC requesting voluntary production of certain documents' following the delay to its annual results. The Japanese group gave no further information but said it intended 'to co-operate fully with the SEC in connection with this inquiry'. NEC earlier this month received notice from Nasdaq that it could face de-listing as a result of its failure to provide its annual report for last year. … The Japanese group said it intended to maintain its Nasdaq listing but could not say when it might be able to provide last year's results under US GAAP."

DOJ_NMG_0086262

Corporate Scandals Highlight Work Of General Counsels. The Legal Times (10/25, Mandel) reports, "Earlier this year, Judge J. Michael Luttig of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals stunned the legal world by surrendering his lifetime appointment to the bench in favor of the top legal job at Boeing Co. In his letter of resignation, Luttig called the job a 'singular opportunity,' one that he could not pass up. Luttig's move did not come as a surprise, however, to the in-house bar, which has noted that the career door that used to swing between government and law firms now revolves with a corporate stop as well for many top lawyers." The Times continues, "The demand for top legal talent in in-house departments has been growing as increased regulation and an increasing emphasis on corporate accountability have put greater emphasis on the attorney's role in helping to foster an ethical corporate culture. … In the current environment it is not enough for companies to be ethical and compliant; they have to be seen as such. As a result, companies are evaluating candidates for top in-house positions on the strength of their reputation for scrupulous ethics, judgment and objective decision-making beyond narrowly defined legal issues. In addition, law firms are seeing the benefits of seeking out new partners from in-house ranks because of the perspective on client service (and potential clients) that these lawyers can bring."

Study Highlights Cost Of Options Scandal. The San Jose Mercury News (10/25, Poletti) reports, "A financial advisory firm has released an analysis estimating the stock-option backdating scandal has cost at least 152 companies nationwide about $10.3 billion." The News continues, "A recent tally by institutional shareholder advisory firm, Glass Lewis in San Francisco, found that at least 152 companies have announced internal reviews, inquiries from the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department subpoenas related to their stock options granting practices." The News adds, "Glass-Lewis said its internal analysis also showed that the backdating scandal has resulted in an unadjusted initial decline of $5.1 billion in the companies' market value, based on the initial drop in their stock prices. The analysis also pegged an additional $5.2 billion in additional pre-tax compensation costs to the companies. … The firm said that at least 44 executives and directors at 24 companies have been fired or resigned to date. Of the 152 companies nationwide, 42 have headquarters in Silicon Valley." The News notes, "In another development Tuesday, Electronics For Imaging, a developer of technology for high-speed printers and copiers, became the latest Silicon Valley company to announce an investigation into its stock options granting practices."

NYTimes Praises Senate Panels For Investigating SEC Pequot Probe. The New York Times (10/25, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "Among the worst impressions the Securities and Exchange Commission could foster is that it pulls punches on delicate matters involving the rich, powerful and politically connected. Now two Senate committees are investigating whether the commission staff, rather than doggedly pursuing possible insider trading by the hedge fund Pequot Capital Management, held back when it came to taking the testimony of a prominent Wall Street player." A "full airing is in everyone's interest."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Hastert, Reynolds Testify Before House Ethics Subcommittee Investigating Foley Scandal. The CBS Evening News (10/24, story 4, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "House Speaker Dennis Hastert testified before the ethics committee, which is investigating Mark Foley's e-mail to former pages. Hastert has said he didn't find out about the nature of the emails until late last month, but Congressman Tom Reynolds, who also testified, claimed he warned Hastert about them this past spring."

The Chicago Tribune (10/25, Dorning, Clough, 623K) reports, "Speaking briefly to reporters from a prepared statement after his testimony, Hastert said he told the panel 'that they needed to move quickly to get to the bottom of this issue, including who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it.' Hastert, who testified behind closed doors for just under three hours, added that he answered investigators' questions 'to the best of my ability.'" Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean "said the speaker would not answer any questions about his testimony." The AP (10/25, Taylor) reports Hastert "urged ethics investigators to work quickly to unravel the congressional pages scandal Tuesday, testifying before them just after a GOP lawmaker whose recollections differ from his."

DOJ_NMG_0086263

Yesterday's testimony from Hastert and NRCC chair Rep. Tom Reynolds "could signal that the four-member ethics committee is nearing the end of its testimony-taking phase." The AP adds, "Hastert has said he first learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a former Louisiana page…just last month. … But Hastert's appearance followed that of Reynolds, who has said he learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to the Louisiana teen last spring and discussed the matter with Hastert. Hastert has said he didn't recall that conversation. He has also assured conservative activist Paul Weyrich that Majority Leader John Boehner was wrong when Boehner said he and Hastert discussed Foley's problems last spring." Hastert "and some other Republicans have suggested revelations about the messages were timed to hurt the GOP in next month's elections."

A number of news reports focus on the "drama" surrounding Hastert's appearance. The Washington Post (10/25, A3, Weisman, 748K) reports, "The twinning of Hastert's appearance with that of Reynolds surprised House Republican and Democratic leadership aides, and it only heightened the drama of the committee's deliberations. Hastert is the first House speaker to testify before the committee since Newt Gingrich discussed a much-criticized book deal in 1997. But in that case, committee members scheduled Gingrich's testimony at night, sparing him a daylight walk through the throng of reporters and camera crews camped outside the hearing room."

NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 3, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Across town a funny thing happened today outside the hearing room of the House ethics committee. The Speaker of the House walked in while stunned reporters looked on. It was thought that Dennis Hastert would testify but his sudden appearance today was a surprise." CNN's The Situation Room (10/24, Blitzer) said Hastert's "arrival on the Hill was a secret, as was his decision today to show up and testify before the House Ethics Committee."

The New York Times (10/25, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports, "On this day, two weeks before Election Day, Mr. Hastert had planned to be hopscotching from district to district across America, working to preserve Republican control in the House and protect his own seat of power."

The Hill (10/25, Sherman) reports Hastert "sneaked into the ethics committee, avoiding public areas of the Capitol in an apparent move to avoid reporters. As he exited his offices, he utilized the seldom-used Strom Thurmond hallway, and an esoteric attic elevator transported him to the basement. U.S. Capitol Police officers blocked the staircase between the crypt and the basement. Hastert's entourage, which included all three members of his communications staff, three Capitol police officers and his attorney, escorted him to the ethics committee hearing room. Hastert attempted to dodge photographers by repeatedly moving behind his staff."

Hastert Seen As Unlikely To Retain Speakership. The Chicago Tribune (10/25, Dorning, Clough, 623K) reports, "Republican officials said confidence in Hastert…has ebbed as the controversy over Foley has continued. Foley resigned last month. Though the party establishment concluded weeks ago that an ouster of Hastert prior to the election would be counterproductive, Republican officials privately indicated it would be difficult for Hastert to hold on to his leadership post afterward, even if the party retains the majority. At least one key Hastert aide recently explored potential new employment, according to a source familiar with the discussion."

CNN Poll Finds 52% Say Republicans Do Not Have High Ethical Standards. CNN's The Situation Room (10/24, Blitzer) reported that "our new poll shows most Americans, 52 percent, say Republicans do not have high ethical standards. But they're not impressed by the other party either. Forty-six percent of those surveyed don't think Democrats have high ethical standards."

FBI Has Not "Substantiated" Allegations Against Harman And AIPAC. The Washington Post (10/25, A6, Eggen, 748K) reports, "Federal law enforcement sources confirmed yesterday that the FBI opened an investigation in 2005 into whether Rep. Jane Harman improperly enlisted the aid of" AIPAC, "but they cautioned that no evidence of wrongdoing was found. The inquiry focused on whether Harman had made promises to…AIPAC in exchange for its support of her desire to become chairman of the House intelligence committee if Democrats take control of the House, several law enforcement sources said. Although the case is still considered open, officials said, the allegations have not been substantiated, and there has been no significant investigative activity on the issue in recent months. The inquiry was first reported by Time magazine."

FBI Investigating Renzi's Role In Arizona Land Sale. The Washington Post (10/25, A4, Weisman, Eggen, 748K) reports, "US prosecutors in Arizona have opened a preliminary investigation into whether Rep. Rick

DOJ_NMG_0086264

Renzi (R-Ariz.) twice pressured landowners to buy a 480-acre parcel owned by his former business partner, a major backer of Renzi's political campaign, according to federal law enforcement sources." The deal "ultimately netted the business partner a $3 million profit, according to Arizona land records." The Arizona transaction "has drawn the interest of the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI's Phoenix field office. Three law enforcement officials said both are investigating Renzi's involvement in two land deals -- one of which was not completed -- designed to put the 480 acres under federal protection from development in exchange for land more fit for commercial development." The inquiry "was revealed by two liberal Arizona blogs last weekend."

The New York Times (10/25, Johnston, 1.21M) reports, "Federal authorities in Arizona have opened an inquiry into whether Representative Rick Renzi introduced legislation that benefited a military contractor that employs his father, law enforcement officials said Tuesday. The officials said the inquiry was at an early stage and that no search warrants had been issued, suggesting that investigators had yet to determine whether there was a basis to open a formal investigation or empanel a grand jury." Law enforcement officials "said that the most serious accusation involved Mr. Renzi's sponsorship of legislation in 2003 that appeared to indirectly benefit the ManTech International Corporation, a communications company based in Virginia that employs Mr. Renzi's father, Eugene, a retired Army general, as executive vice president."

Experts Say Ban Will Not Stop Online Gambling. The AP (10/25, Goldman) reports, "Gamblers may look over their shoulder now, but experts say a new Internet gambling ban won't keep bettors from ponying up, just turn them on to overseas payment services out of the law's reach. … 'It has put a terrible scare into people,' said I. Nelson Rose, who teaches gambling law at Whittier Law School. 'But it won't by any means wipe out Internet gambling.'" The AP continues, "The fright swept through the $12 billion industry on the heels of the recent arrests of two gambling company executives and a new law President Bush signed Oct. 13 that seeks to ban most online gambling and criminalizes funds transfers. … The law has wiped out billions of dollars in shareholder value of British companies, leaving the industry's future in doubt as U.S. lawmakers initially trumpeted they had found a way to halt bets coming from America. But serious questions remain about whether the legislation can be effective in stopping U.S. residents from playing poker or betting on sports." The AP adds, "The 'Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act' goes after the money, not the millions of players, which would be nearly impossible to enforce. It will essentially try to choke off the way Americans fund their gambling habits, hoping to prevent the transfer of dollars to the popular Internet sites. … It's also widely understood that the law has online poker in its gun sights, identifying it as a game of chance - something the poker companies dispute. They believe poker is a game of skill and therefore not subject to the new rules. … But they're fearful nonetheless."

Former Refco CFO Charged With Defrauding Investors. The AP (10/25, Neumeister) reports, "The former chief financial officer of Refco Inc., one of the world's biggest commodities brokerages, was accused in an indictment Tuesday of defrauding investors in a scheme that resulted in losses of more than $1 billion." The AP continues, "An indictment in U.S. District Court in New York charged Robert C. Trosten with conspiracy, securities fraud, false filings and wire fraud. It also added new charges to the case against Refco's former chief executive officer, Phillip R. Bennett. … Prosecutors said Trosten assisted Bennett in hiding hundreds of millions of dollars of debt owed to Refco by a company controlled by Bennett. … The superseding indictment also added new charges against Bennett concerning fraud against holders of Refco's bonds." The AP adds, "Trosten, 37, of Sarasota, Fla., was scheduled to make his initial court appearance Wednesday. Bennett, 57, of Gladstone, N.J., is free on $50 million bail and subject to electronic monitoring. … A lawyer for Bennett, Gary P. Naftalis, said: 'Mr. Bennett reaffirms that he is not guilty of any of the government's charges and looks forward to his day in court.'"

FBI Investigating LANL Classified Documents Found In Police Drug Raid. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/25, Jordan) reports, "A drug bust at a trailer park in New Mexico turned up what appeared to be classified documents taken from the Los Alamos nuclear weapons laboratory, authorities said Tuesday. Local police found the documents while arresting a man suspected of domestic violence and dealing methamphetamine from his mobile home, said Sgt. Chuck Ney of the Los Alamos, N.M., Municipal Police Department. … Police alerted the FBI to the secret documents, which agents traced back to a woman linked to the drug dealer, officials said. The woman is a contract employee at Los Alamos National Laboratory, according to an FBI official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the case." The AP notes FBI Special Agent Bill Elwell said that the bureau "and the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque were 'evaluating the information obtained as a result of the search warrant.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086265

Safavian Defense Submits Support Letters For Friday Sentencing. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/25, Apuzzo) reports, "A Utah congressman and a former aide to a Virginia congressman have written letters in support of former Bush administration official David Safavian, who is trying to avoid jail time in the Jack Abramoff investigation." Rep. Chris Cannon wrote the court for Friday's sentencing, "When David was my chief of staff, he worked tirelessly in my Washington office. He would come in early, stay late, and devote his undivided attention to the needs of the people in Utah's 3rd Congressional District." Rep. Tom Davis' former Government Reform Committee staff director Melissa Wojciak "wrote that Safavian 'always ensured that he was responsible in managing the taxpayer's dollars.'" The AP adds, "Defense attorneys wrote that Safavian did not harm anybody and committed no fraudulent acts. They have presented a list of past cases they believe are comparable," including Clinton HUD Sec. Henry Cisneros, "who paid a $10,000 fine for lying to the FBI about payments to an ex-mistres."

Rep. Cannon Asks For Leniency For Former Employee Safavian. The Salt Lake Tribune (10/25, Gehrke) reports, "Rep. Chris Cannon is asking a judge for leniency for his former chief of staff, David Safavian, who was convicted with obstructing a federal investigation into his ties with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. … 'When David was my chief of staff, he worked tirelessly in my Washington office. He would come in early, stay late, and devote his undivided attention to the needs of the people in Utah's Third Congressional District,' Cannon wrote in a letter quoted by Safavian's attorneys in court filings." The Tribune continues, "Prosecutors have asked Judge Paul Friedman to sentence Safavian to as many as 37 months in prison. He was convicted of four counts of obstruction of justice and false statements for lying to investigators about his relationship with Abramoff." The Tribune adds, "Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, argued that Safavian has been a committed public servant and family man, that his career has been ruined by his arrest and conviction, and asked the judge to impose probation or home confinement. … 'The government's caricature cannot detract from the fact that, as acquaintances, supervisors, and colleagues attest, Mr. Safavian's history and character reflects dedication to his family, his community, and country,' Van Gelder said. . … Prosecutors said it would be a 'miscarriage of justice' not to impose prison time."

Suburban Chicago Mayor Pleads Not Guilty To Bribery Charges. The Chicago Tribune (10/25, 623K) reports, "Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a five-count federal indictment charging him with taking more than $420,000 in kickbacks for steering local business owners to buy insurance from a longtime friend and his son. … The charges allege that the kickback scheme originated more than 30 years ago with Blase's close friend, Ralph Weiner, who ran an insurance agency bearing his name. After Weiner's death in 2005, his son, Steven Weiner, continued to deliver the monthly bribes to Blase, prosecutors charged." The Tribune notes, "Lawyers for Steven Weiner and Paul Zdon, a former employee of the Weiner insurance agency, have said both are cooperating with the FBI and expect to plead guilty to mail-fraud charges." The AP (10/25) also reports on Blase's plea.

Jury Finds Man Guilty Of Murdering NYTimes Editor. The New York Times (10/25, Stout) reports, "The second of two men accused of killing a retired reporter for The New York Times in January was convicted on Tuesday of murder, robbery and other charges that could put him in prison for the rest of his life. The defendant, Percey Jordan Jr., 42, was found guilty in the slaying of the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, 63, who was beaten and robbed near his home in Washington on the night of Jan. 6 and died two days later. … Jurors deliberated for a day before finding Mr. Jordan guilty of first-degree murder or premeditated murder during commission of a felony; second-degree murder; robbery; conspiracy; and credit-card fraud. The second defendant was Mr. Jordan's cousin Michael C. Hamlin, 24, who pleaded guilty on Sept. 20 to second-degree murder, robbery and conspiracy to commit robbery and testified against Mr. Jordan."

The Washington Post (10/25, B1, Cauvin) reports, "The crime stunned many city residents, particularly those who live in neighborhoods thought to be safe, such as the one where Rosenbaum was robbed and where such random and violent crime is rare."

DOJ_NMG_0086266

FBI Investigating Stolen Art In Deceased New Yorker's Collection. The New York Times (10/25, Barry, 1.21M) reports, "If it was the desire of the man who called himself William M. V. Kingsland to be remembered in the salons of New York long after he died, to be the subject of the kind of scandal-whiffed conversation he once so enjoyed…then the man who called himself William M. V. Kingsland has succeeded. He died in early spring in his one-bedroom apartment on the Upper East Side," and "this summer…his longtime friends learned that his real name was…Melvyn Kohn. Then, last week, they learned that several pieces in his private art collection were" stolen. "Now the Federal Bureau of Investigation is digging into the nature of his collection, two auction houses are cleaning up the artistic mess he left behind, and the Office of the Public Administrator for Manhattan is trying to sort out the increasingly muddy Estate." The Times notes, "A central question for everyone, of course, is Mr. Kingsland's role in all this. Was he a thief, a fence, or just an innocent collector of pretty things that happened to be hot?"

FBI, Arizona Police Investigating Theft Of Power Line Maintenance Trucks, Tools. The AP (10/25) reports, "Thieves in Yuma County stole three specialized power line maintenance trucks and more than $100,000 in tools used to work on major power lines over the weekend, and the FBI is seeking the public's help tracking down the thieves. The trucks and tools were stolen from the U.S. Department of Energy's Gila Substation Maintenance Facility," and "specialized knowledge is needed to use them. There is no known terror threat from the theft and young people are known to hang out in the area, said FBI Special Agent Deb McCarley. However, the specialized nature of the equipment and its possible use is raising concerns." The AP notes, "The FBI and the Yuma County Sheriff's Office are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the persons responsible."

FBI, SEC Investigating Online Brokerage Account Hackings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/25, Funk) reports, "The government has launched investigations into fraud cases in which computer hackers apparently manipulated client accounts at two of the nation's largest electronic brokerages, stealing millions of dollars." TD Ameritrade COO Randy MacDonald "said the fraud that his company experienced during the quarter was part of an industrywide problem and that the company was working with the FBI and other law enforcement agencies." Ameritrade and E-Trade officials "said that while hackers manipulated individual accounts, their own computer systems remained secure." The AP notes, "The Securities and Exchange Commission, like the FBI, is investigating hacking fraud throughout the online brokerage industry."

US Banks, Insurers Expand Online Security Assessment Program. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A4, Guth, 2.03M) reports, "A group of U.S. banks and insurance companies concerned about data security are expanding a program for assessing the security of online banking and related financial services. The Financial Services Roundtable, an industry trade group, said that five banks have joined an effort to standardize how they judge the security of companies that provide online services. The new participants are Bear Stearns Cos., Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Regions Financial Corp., Wachovia Corp. and Morgan Stanley." The Journal notes that the Shared Assessment Program "formalizes procedures that have historically been handled differently by each financial institution, an approach that the members say is costly and isn't as effective in assuring a high level of security."

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Online Investment Fraud. The Oregonian (10/25, Denson, 329K) reports Frank Hendricks of Florida "pleaded guilty Tuesday to heading a Corvallis-based Internet investment scam that victimized 1,500 investors in the United States and Canada. … When sentenced in February, he faces as long as 26 years in prison and as much as $1.3 million in fines, plus mandatory restitution." The Oregonian notes that Hendricks and Scott Guenther allegedly "created a CD-ROM and electronic book-marketing business named Pacific Achievements International. Guenther is scheduled to plead guilty to some of the charges Dec. 5 in Eugene, authorities say." The Oregonian adds, "In early 2004, the FBI seized two residences purchased by Hendricks in Shalimar, Fla., and two residences in Gig Harbor, Wash., from a company promoter, federal prosecutors reported."

DOJ_NMG_0086267

FBI Investigating Child Porn Allegation Against Connecticut Episcopal Music Director. The New York Times (10/25, Cowan, 1.21M) reports from Greenwich, Conn., "Federal authorities are investigating whether the longtime music director of a prominent Episcopal church here, who was a mentor to thousands of children, was involved in child pornography, according to people involved in the investigation. The head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's cybercrimes squad in New Haven, Tim Egan, said 'there is a pending investigation' into the matter, but declined to comment further. Susan Marks, a spokeswoman for Christ Church…said that Robert F. Tate, the music director, had recently resigned, and that the church's membership had been notified." The Times notes, 'It was unclear whether the reputed pornographic images that piqued the criminal investigation were stored on a church-owned computer or not."

NBC News (10/24, Sandler, 5:51 p.m.) reported on its Web site that "sources say that earlier this month the FBI searched a building on the grounds of Christ Church…after obtaining information that allegedly implicates" Tate. "A grand jury is convening in the case, and NBC has learned that other top church officials have been called to testify." NBC notes, "Located in one of the country's most wealthy communities, Christ Church in Greenwich has attracted an affluent membership since its inception in the 1830s. Former President George H.W. Bush attended services in his youth and, as president, returned to the church in 1992 for the funeral of his mother," and "a Christ Church minister reportedly signed the baptism records of President George W. Bush."

Massachusetts State Trooper To Plead Guilty To Child Enticement Charges. The AP (10/25) reports, "A state trooper charged with trying to solicit sex from an undercover officer he thought was a 14-year-old boy plans to plead guilty in federal court, according to court documents, and has resigned from the force. Brian O'Hare was charged with using the Internet to entice an individual under 18 for sexual activity." The AP notes, "O'Hare allegedly had several sexually explicit chats with an FBI agent who was posing as a 14-year-old high school boy, and the two arranged to meet at the Medford Mall, authorities said. O'Hare was arrested by FBI agents in February after he showed up."

PG County Police Attribute Decline In Crime To Staffing Decisions. The Washington Post (10/25, B2, Partlow) reports Prince George's County police "have attributed a decline in violent crime and property offenses this year to more officers on the streets, the availability of overtime funds to keep experienced officers working and investments in new technology. Compared with the first nine months of last year, the number of homicides in the county has declined by 28 percent (from 128 to 92), rapes by 11.7 percent (163 to 144) and carjackings by 37 percent (from 565 to 356), police said. In preliminary statistics compiled by the Maryland State Police that cover the first half of the year, Prince George's showed a total decline in major crimes of 15.1 percent, the largest percentage decrease among the 23 Maryland counties and Baltimore."

Ohio Executes Cult Leader For Murders Of Five Followers. The AP (10/25, McCarthy) reports, "Ohio executed a religious cult leader Tuesday for the murder of a family of five followers who were taken one at a time to a barn, bound and shot to death. The youngest was a girl just 7 years old." The AP continues, "Jeffrey Lundgren, 56, died by injection at 10:26 a.m. at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility for the deaths of the Avery family." The AP adds, "The evidence against Lundgren was compelling. … Upset by what he thought was the Avery family's lack of faith, arranged a dinner hosted by cult members. Afterward, he and his followers led the Averys one by one - the father first, young Karen last - to their deaths while the others unknowingly cleaned up after dinner. A chain saw was used to muffle the gunfire. … Lundgren argued at his trial in 1990 that he was prophet of God and therefore not worthy of the death penalty." The AP notes, "Lundgren's attorneys had tried to put off the execution, arguing that he should be allowed to join a lawsuit challenging Ohio's use of lethal injection as cruel and unusual punishment. They said his execution had more of a chance of being painful because he was diabetic and overweight at 275 pounds. … Late Monday, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati issued an order allowing the execution to go forward. The U.S. Supreme Court refused a last-minute request to stop his execution Tuesday, and Gov. Bob Taft denied clemency."

Maryland Delegate Accused Of Foreclosure-Rescue Fraud. The Baltimore Sun (10/25, Butler) reports, "Anne Arundel County police are looking into whether Del. William A. 'Tony' McConkey might have engaged in criminal acts during a real estate deal that he is being sued over, although a police spokesman said that the review is not 'a full-blown investigation.' Police said they are reviewing claims by Teresa Milligan, 42, that the Severna Park Republican committed foreclosure-rescue fraud, in violation of a new law that has civil and criminal penalties. She filed a civil suit Monday in Anne Arundel County Circuit Court alleging that McConkey tricked her into signing over her townhouse to him."

DOJ_NMG_0086268

New Technologies Spur Wave Of Retail Crime. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A1, Zimmerman), in a front-page story titled, "Creative Crooks: As Shoplifters Use High-Tech Scams, Retail Losses Rise," reports, "Using sophisticated tactics such as bar-code forgery and fraudulent gift cards, criminals are stealing larger amounts, and it has gotten harder to catch them. Law-enforcement officers say many of the high-tech thieves belong to organized-crime rings that have turned retail theft into big business. And the Internet has made it easier for them to find buyers for the loot. Retail crime rose to about $37 billion in 2005 from $31 billion in 2003, according to a study conducted by the University of Florida, increasing almost twice as fast as retail sales over that period. Store employees, who have access to merchandise and familiarity with antitheft systems, account for 48% of retail-crime losses, according to the 2005 study. But professional thieves, many of them using sophisticated new methods, also are responsible for a big part, says Joseph LaRocca, vice president of loss prevention at the National Retail Federation, a trade group. The value of merchandise snatched in the average shoplifting incident has more than tripled to $855 in 2005, from $265 in 2003, the University of Florida survey reported."

CIVIL LAW:

COPA Litigation Begins Final Round. The Legal Intelligencer (10/25, Duffy) reports, "It's not all that often that a month-long trial begins in federal court where everyone knows from the start which side is likely to win. … But that was the situation Monday in ACLU v. Gonzales as the final round of litigation got underway in a challenge to the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), a law which threatens criminal penalties for commercial Web site operators that allow children to access material that is 'harmful to minors.'" The Intelligencer continues, "Eight years after it was passed, COPA has never gone into effect because Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. granted a preliminary injunction that, after two trips to the U.S. Supreme Court, won the approval of a 5-4 court. … Although the majority was a slim one, the high court's holding was that the ACLU and its co-plaintiffs are 'likely to succeed' in proving that COPA is unconstitutional. … But 'likely' doesn't mean certainly, and the Justice Department isn't giving up the fight." The Intelligencer adds, "In preparation for Monday's trial, Reed ordered lawyers on both sides to file their proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. … Ordinarily, such briefs are filed after a nonjury trial has concluded to aid the judge in his drafting of an opinion that announces his verdict. … But ACLU v. Gonzales is no ordinary case, and Reed apparently wanted the lawyers to provide a roadmap for the trial, which is expected to boil down to a battle of the experts."

Group Claims More FOIA Resources Needed. Government Executive (10/25, Pulliam) reports, "A recent Justice Department report on agencies' compliance with a presidential mandate to improve processing of requests for government documents failed to address resource constraints, an independent research institute has charged." GE continues, "In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last week, the National Security Archive, a research institute and library located at The George Washington University, said the report did not acknowledge the scale of the challenge agencies face in reforming their Freedom of Information Act procedures. It avoided mentioning a lack of adequate funding and staffing, as well as the need for cross-agency leadership, the letter stated. … The executive order, signed by President Bush on Dec. 14, 2005, directs agencies to ensure that their FOIA implementation is citizen-centered and results-oriented. They must also appoint chief FOIA officers." GE adds, "The order states that any changes should be made using 'available resources' and 'existing agency staff.' The FOIA chief can, however, recommend adjustments to agency personnel and funding as "may be necessary to carry out" the order's policies. … Daniel J. Metcalfe, director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy, said there was little discussion of resources in the Oct. 16 report because the agency FOIA improvement plans reviewed in it were due 'only six months after the executive order was signed, in the middle of a budget cycle.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086269

The Federal Times (10/25, Curl) reports, "The National Security Archive, criticizing a recent report by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, has called on Congress to hold hearings to determine if genuine progress is being made in agency administration of the Freedom of Information Act." The Times continues, "Gonzales' report, issued Oct. 16, highlighted progress agencies are making to comply with a presidential directive, issued last year, that requires agencies to name chief FOIA officers and create improvement plans to streamline the processing of FOIA requests. Gonzales wrote that the executive order 'has had an immediate and widespread positive effect on the operations of the federal agencies that administer the FOIA.'" The Times adds, "In letters to both Gonzales and leaders in the Senate Judiciary and House Government Reform committees, the Washington-based research group — which collects and publishes documents obtained through FOIA requests — called the report 'rosy' and said it 'ignored critical challenges facing the federal FOIA system.' … 'While the AG report is optimistic about the agencies' newfound embrace of technology/automation, FOIA request status tracking and backlog reduction, it fails to provide an honest assessment of where agencies' FOIA programs stand today and what it will take to bring their FOIA programs into compliance with the law,' the letters said."

Bankruptcy Judge Gives Dana Corp More Time For Bonus Plan. Dow Jones (10/25, Kary) reports, "Dana Corp. on Tuesday won more time to develop a new legal strategy to obtain a package of bonuses for its chief executive and other top executives." Dow Jones continues, "Judge Burton Lifland of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan, who previously rejected the proposed bonuses, approved the auto-parts suppliers request to further its legal work on a schedule that would permit a Nov. 8 final hearing on its request for a long-term incentive plan for executives. … Even so, Lifland continued to question whether the timeline was too 'aggressive' and whether Dana's strategy made sense. 'Frankly, I'm not fully comprehensive of the strategy of this motion,' Lifland said." Dow Jones adds, "The Toledo, Ohio, company has asked Lifland to reconsider his ruling striking down a program that would have paid Chief Executive Michael J. Burns $9.1 million over the next few years _ including a $6 million bonus once Dana exits Chapter 11 protection. … The Justice Department has called the request improper because it is in effect asking the court guidance on how to get the bonus plan approved. … 'We are not as of yet a part of the growing consensus in this case,' said Andrew Velez-Rivera, speaking in court Tuesday as a trial attorney representing the Justice Department's Office of the U.S. Trustee. That office monitors bankruptcy cases to ensure that participants comply with bankruptcy law."

WSJournal Says Bankruptcy Overhaul Law Working. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, 2.03M) says in an editorial, "When President Bush signed the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act last year, Democrats and 'consumer' groups not only cried foul but predicted doom. A year after the law was enacted, however, the evidence suggests that their fears were misplaced, not to say cynical." Today, "the number of bankruptcy filings is down some two-thirds from what it's been in recent years. Partly this has to do with people rushing to file for Chapter 7 before the law took effect last October. But there are also indications that people are responding to the new incentives." In the past, "about 20% of bankruptcy filers have had incomes above the national median. But since the law took effect, nearly all filers are below the median. One plausible explanation is that many past filers were abusing the system."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

NAACP Calls For DOJ Probe Of Richmond Police Shooting. The Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch (10/25, Nolan) reports, "Leaders of the state and Richmond-area branches of the NAACP yesterday decried the $2,500 fine imposed against a former police officer convicted of manslaughter in the May 29, 2004, shooting death of Santanna Olavarria." The Times-Dispatch continues, "On Friday, a jury convicted Michael Couture, 33, of manslaughter. Two hours later, the jury returned with a recommended sentence of $2,500 and no jail time, which the judge imposed. Couture could have faced up to 10 years in prison. … 'This sends a message that black people's lives have very little value to citizens, the criminal justice system and all other institutions in this society,' the NAACP leaders said in a joint statement issued at a news conference yesterday afternoon." The Times-Dispatch adds, "The leaders also called for the Justice Department to pursue a civil-rights investigation into the shooting, in which then-officer Couture fatally shot the 21-year-old Olavarria following a traffic stop in the city's East End. … In February 2005, Police Chief Rodney Monroe forwarded all of the department's police-involved shooting cases to the Justice Department for investigation, including the Olavarria shooting. To date, there have been no federal charges filed in the Olavarria case. … Couture is believed to be the first police officer in the modern history of the city's police department to have been convicted of a homicide while on duty."

DOJ_NMG_0086270

Two Mississippi Jailers Charged With Inmate Assaults. The AP (10/25, Mohr) reports from Jackson, MS, "A former jailer at a regional prison in Louisville has pleaded guilty to assaulting an inmate and is working with federal prosecutors in a case against two former correctional supervisors accused of similar crimes, the U.S. Justice Department said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Former Winston-Choctaw County Regional Correctional Facility Deputy Warden Scotty L. Graham and former Captain David G. Mitchell are charged with violating the inmates' civil rights, conspiring to obstruct justice and providing false statements, the Justice Department said. … Former officer Marcus Coleman already has pleaded guilty to similar charges, the Justice Department said, and has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors." The AP adds, "An indictment unsealed Tuesday in Washington accuses Graham and Mitchell of assaulting an inmate in October 2001 with a device known as a 'shock stick.' Mitchell is charged with an additional civil rights violation for allegedly attacking another inmate the same day. … Details of the alleged attacks were not available. … 'The details will come out if there's any sort of trial proceeding,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson."

Judge To Lift DOJ Oversight Of Hawaii Mental Health Plan. The Honolulu Advertiser (10/25, Kobayashi) reports, "A federal judge this morning cleared the way for the lifting on Nov. 30 of the federal oversight over the state's efforts to comply with a community mental health plan to serve Hawai'i's estimated 11,000 seriously mentally ill residents." The Advertiser continues, "U. S. District Judge David Ezra essentially approved the latest federal magistrate's status report on the state efforts. … Although U. S. Magistrate Judge Kevin Chang could not say in his report in August that the state met a June 30 deadline to be in substantial compliance with the plan, he said the state made progress and he recommended the lifting of the oversight on Nov. 30. … 'This case will simply terminate (on Nov. 30),' Judge Ezra said." The Advertiser adds, "Attorney General Mark Bennett said even with the lifting of the federal oversight, the state will continue to seek to improve the mental health services. … 'We will keep our noses to the grindstone,' he said. … The state has been under federal oversight for 15 years as a result of a Justice Department lawsuit alleging violations the constitutional rights of patients at Hawai'i State Hospital. … The hospital emerged from the oversight in late 2004, but the oversight continued over the community plan aimed at providing adequate services to the mentally ill in the community. … Justice Department attorneys agreed to the lifting of the oversight on Nov. 30 after the state raised concerns about whether the federal oversight could continue beyond June 30."

Studies Finds Racial Disparities In US Health Care. The Washington Post (10/25, Lee, 748K) reports that three new studies "in today's issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association…add to the voluminous evidence that the US health-care system works differently for minorities than for whites despite years of efforts to erase racial disparities." But "while the persistent disparities are well-documented, the causes remain the focus of research and debate. One explanation is that minorities tend to be poorer and less educated, with less access to care. And they tend to live in places where doctors and hospitals provide lower quality care than elsewhere. Others suspect cultural or biological differences play a role, and there is a long-running debate about whether subtle racism infects the health-care system." Now, "major medical organizations, private foundations and government health agencies have begun a host of studies, programs and initiatives in the past decade to try to close the gap."

Battle Over Virginia Gay Marriage Amendment Heats Up. The Washington Times (10/25, McLaughlin, 88K) reports that the battle over a proposed constitutional ban on same sex marriage in Virginia "is heating up as both sides of the debate deliver their final sales pitches two weeks before the Nov. 7 election. … Political analysts agree that the amendment could motivate conservatives to turn out for [GOP Sen. George] Allen, who is in a tight race against Democrat James H. Webb Jr. for the U.S. Senate. Mr. Webb opposes the amendment." The Times adds, "A poll conducted by The Washington Post earlier this month showed that 53 percent of Virginians support the marriage amendment, while 43 percent oppose it."

DOJ_NMG_0086271

ANTITRUST:

Steel Tubing Firm Owned By Carlyle To Announce Merger. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, C5, Sender) reports, "John Maneely Co., a maker of steel tubing that is owned by private-equity giant Carlyle Group, is expected to announce a merger with Atlas Tube Inc. today in a deal valued at almost $1.5 billion, including stock and debt. The move to bulk up Maneely comes amid a boom in private-equity transactions, in which groups like Carlyle team up to buy companies they believe are undervalued -- often using elaborate financial arrangements -- with hopes of selling them later at a profit. While the proposed Maneely transaction is relatively small, it illustrates how not all these deals are about financial maneuvering. In this case, Carlyle is buying a rival manufacturer in order to gain economies of scale. Both Maneely and family-owned Atlas manufacture tubing used in the construction industry. The merger with Atlas, which is based in Harrow, Ontario, will make Carlyle the parent of the largest North American maker of steel tubing, with sales in excess of $2 billion, the companies say."

DOJ Criticized Over Case Involving Shipping Industry Price-Fixing. The Wall Street Journal's Holman W. Jenkins Jr. (10/25) writes, "Stolt-Nielsen is a name that won't ring many bells unless your peculiar interest is ocean shipping or knotty business cases that might tempt the Supreme Court's intervention. Or perhaps you are a corporate counsel for a major international company who just happened to be wondering, out of idle curiosity, whether the amnesty deals signed by the Justice Department in price-fixing cases are worth the paper they're written on." Stolt "finds itself hanging on whether the Supreme Court will hear its plea challenging the Justice Department's right to revoke an amnesty deal granted to Stolt in return for its help in cracking the cartel. … Justice granted Stolt immunity in return for Stolt coughing up the evidence to allow the successful prosecution of its fellow conspirators (two Norwegian firms, one Japanese). Only after the cases were concluded did Justice renege on grounds that Stolt's management had allowed the collusion to continue for several months between the whistleblower's internal hullabaloo and Stolt's decision to seek amnesty. Of course, Justice had known all this from day one and had chosen to sign the agreement and benefit from Stolt's help anyway. Nine petitioners, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, have joined Stolt in urging the Supreme Court to find that Justice has no business indicting Stolt and its employees until the lower courts have definitively ruled the amnesty deal invalid. In fact, the one federal court that looked into the matter ruled that Stolt had upheld its end of the bargain and ordered Justice to do likewise." Jenkins concludes, "With its brain a little less clouded by self-righteousness, the department might notice that its campaign to impose its dubious ideal of price regulation on the world might actually be helped if it grew up a little about antitrust."

Thompson Corp To Put Learning Unit Up For Sale. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, Berman, Cherney) reports, "Publishing and information giant Thomson Corp. is near a plan to put its Thomson Learning division on the auction block, in a deal that could fetch somewhere north of $5 billion, said people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "A deal would separate the company's second-largest unit as measured both by revenue and operating income. And it would concentrate Thomson's broad operating lines around legal, financial and scientific-information businesses. Analysts have been calling for a sale of Thomson Learning because it doesn't fit with the company's strategy of selling to professionals. The Learning division also wasn't moving as quickly to sales of electronic products as had been hoped." The Journal adds, "In recent years, Thomson has adeptly exited certain businesses that subsequently declined in profitability. Starting in the late 1990s, the company began shedding newspaper assets -- a move away from its historic roots as a Canadian-based newspaper empire -- to refashion itself as an information provider, with more of its services delivered online instead of in print. The sales included The Globe and Mail as well as other smaller dailies."

EU Probing French Guarantee Loan To TVO. The AP (10/25) reports, "EU antitrust regulators on Tuesday opened an investigation into a French state guarantee for a euro570 million (US$716 million) bank loan to Finnish power company Teollisuuden Voima Oy that may have helped a French-German supplier win a contract to build Finland's newest nuclear plant." The AP continues, "The European Commission said the guarantee may have cut TVO's financial costs below normal market levels -- and could have encouraged the company to pick Areva-Siemens to build the first new European reactor in more than 10 years. … 'The guarantee may also have lowered the financial costs linked to the Areva/Siemens offer for TVO and, thereby helped the consortium Areva/Siemens to get the contract for the construction of the new nuclear power plant,' it said." The AP adds, "The EU executive said it would quiz France about the loan -- the interest rate and the guarantee premium TVO paid the French government -- to find out if it gave TVO a cheaper deal and an unfair advantage over rivals. … It said it was acting on two complaints about the guarantee the French state export credit insurance agency Coface gave to TVO to purchase equipment from France's Areva-Framatome."

DOJ_NMG_0086272

ENVIRONMENT:

White House Solidly Behind Moratorium On Deep Water Bottom Trawling. The Christian Science Monitor (10/25, Spotts, 58K) reports that while less than one percent "of the world's commercial fish catch comes from trawling the ocean floor of the high seas," the "environmental impact is large - so large that many countries ban or severely restrict the practice within their territorial waters. This week, an international effort to curb bottom-trawling on the open ocean got a significant boost." In a letter to US negotiators "at the United Nations on Monday, a top State Department official set out Washington's unambiguous support for a halt to the practice 'until such time as conservation and management measures are adopted.'" The Administration's "stance on this critical marine-conservation issue may come as a surprise to some, given what many environmentalists call a shaky White House record on other environmental issues. But the president appears to have a deep personal concern about overfishing," says Joshua Reichert, "who heads the environment program at the Pew Charitable Trusts in Philadelphia."

US, EU Officials To Discuss Environmental Issues At Finland Meeting. The AP (10/25) reports, "Officials from the United States and the European Union - split over the Kyoto protocol - met Tuesday in Finland to discuss ways of improving cooperation on environmental issues." The AP continues, "The EU-U.S. meeting is a follow-up to a summit held in Austria in June, when both sides pledged to work 'more closely to address the serious and long-term challenge of climate change, biodiversity loss and air pollution.'" The AP adds, "Signed in 1997, the Kyoto protocol came into force in February 2005 after it was ratified by the required number of nations, including EU members. It requires signatories to cut emissions of six greenhouse gases to 5 percent below 1990 levels by 2012. … The United States rejected the Kyoto targets as placing an unnecessary burden on its economy, drawing criticism from environmental campaigners who say American pollution is responsible for one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gases. … No decisions will be taken at the Helsinki meeting, hosted by the Environment Ministry, but the aim is to explore ways of increasing trans-Atlantic cooperation on environmental questions, Finnish officials said."

Interior Department Delays Gulf Oil And Gas Leases In Settlement With Louisiana. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, Jackson Randall, 2.03M) reports, "The state of Louisiana and the U.S. Department of the Interior Tuesday said they have agreed to settle a lawsuit over oil and natural-gas leasing in federal waters off Louisiana's coast, with the agency agreeing to delay future offshore lease sales pending a complete environmental analysis. Meanwhile, Louisiana, under the pact, won't object to the department issuing leases to energy companies seeking to produce oil and natural gas under Lease Sale 200, which encompasses 20.4 million acres in the Western Gulf of Mexico." The state "sued the department in July, charging that it did not conduct a proper environmental review for its Lease Sale 200 because it didn't take into account coastal environmental damage caused by drilling as well as that brought on by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year. The move was seen as part of the state's battle to receive a bigger share of the revenue generated by oil and gas produced in federal waters off its coast."

The New York Times (10/25, Nossiter, 1.21M) says, "The suit, filed by Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, was part of the longtime quest for more of the $7 billion in royalties that Washington receives from the oil companies in the gulf." Officials and environmentalists in Louisiana "deem the new accord as a major victory for the state, because it implicitly acknowledges that drilling for oil and gas off Louisiana harms the coastline and contributes to devastating erosion. That, in turn, strengthens a push by the Louisiana Congressional delegation to obtain more oil and gas royalties out of the gulf, money that the state has said it will use to rebuild the coast."

DOJ_NMG_0086273

The Times notes, "The Senate has passed a bill that would give Louisiana and other coastal states 37.5 percent of the royalties. The House has yet to agree."

Schwarzenegger Chides Bush Over Global Warming. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Finnegan, Martelle, 918K) reports that in a "tart" letter to President Bush, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger chided the President "for ignoring his plea for more leeway to toughen California's vehicle exhaust standards, Schwarzenegger complained about 'the absence of a coherent federal policy' to stop global warming. At the same time, Schwarzenegger's Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, dismissed the governor's detachment from Bush as a ruse." The Times adds, "At tightly staged events this week in San Diego, Glendale and Oakland, Schwarzenegger has all but severed his Republican ties while playing up the value of bipartisan harmony. He has also taken pains to widen his appeal beyond white Republican men, his most loyal supporters. At every stop, Schwarzenegger has surrounded himself with African Americans or Latinos and stuck to themes that resonate with Democrats, independents and women: the environment and education."

Environmentalists Rate California Beaches' Levels Of Pollution. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Kennedy) reports, "Los Angeles County predictably earned the dubious honor Tuesday of having the most polluted beaches in California. Less predictably, Long Beach jumped out as the worst offender among the worst. But having made those pronouncements, Heal the Bay, the environmental group that routinely conducts pollution studies along the California coast, declared this one a victory of sorts. The reason: a number of the usual cellar-dwellers passed with flying colors because of recent cleanup efforts." Mark Gold, executive director of Heal the Bay, "pointed to such perennial polluters as Will Rogers State Beach as examples of cleanup efforts along the coast that were starting to yield results."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Scam Features Fake Email From Mueller. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/25, Jordan) reports, "Think twice about answering e-mail from G-man. A new Internet scam promising cash for responding to a document request claims to be from FBI Director Robert S. Mueller. The top government cop's request is followed by a second e-mail threatening that 'failure to comply will result in charges being brought against the individual by the FBI.' 'This e-mail is a hoax,' the FBI said in an alert to consumers that was posted Tuesday on its Web site. 'Do not respond.'" The AP notes, "The spammed scan is the second in as many months to appear to be from Mueller."

ABC News (10/24, Ryan) reports on its Web site, "The e-mail contains information lifted from the FBI's Web site that descibes what an Identification Record is and how to obtain it from the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Services Division. … FBI officials say the hoax is a typical Nigerian scam, which has become more prevalent in recent years." ABC added that after the Mueller email, "individuals receive a second, more threatening notice, claiming to come from Donna Uzzell, another senior FBI official, which says, 'It has come to the attention of our Money Trafficking investigation department, that you have some funds valued at U.S $10.5 Million to your name. ... You are under an observational /Investigation in connection with money laundering.'"

Local TV News Reports Warn Of Scam. The email scam also was covered by local TV news broadcasts across the country. Some examples: WSB-TV Atlanta, (10/24, 11:10 p.m.) reported, "FBI director Robert Mueller is issuing an e-mail fraud alert tonight. Mueller says two e-mails with his name on them are circulating. First one says the recipient could be eligible for a big cash payment. The second e-mail threatens federal criminal charges if the recipient does not respond to first e-mail." WCPO-TV Cincinnati, (10/24, 11:11 p.m.) reported, "Think twice about answering e-mail from the FBI. A new internet scam promises cash for responding to a document request that claims to be from FBI director Robert Mueller. It is followed by a second email threatening that 'failure to comply will result in charges' and demands that a fee be sent to FBI Nigeria. The FBI says the email is a hoax and do not respond." KXXV-TV Waco, (10/24, 9:58 p.m.) noted, "This is the second scam in two months purporting to come from the top g-man."

$27 Million Worth Of Meth, Cocaine Seized In Georgia, 3 Arrested. The Atlanta Business Chronicle (10/24) reports federal officials "have busted three Mexican citizens living in metro Atlanta on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crystal methamphetamine ('ice'). The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and the U.S. Attorney's Office jointly announced the filing of a federal criminal complaint. DEA also seized 145 pounds of ice and 72 kilograms of cocaine -- with a street value of $27 million -- in a house in Clayton County searched in conjunction with the arrests."

DOJ_NMG_0086274

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/25, Jefcoats) reports Clayton County Assistant Police Chief Jeff Turner "said the men kept a low profile. 'But that's what you'd expect if you had that amount of drugs and money around,' he said. … The arrests are the culmination of a month-long federal investigation by the U.S. Department of Drug Enforcement Administration and DeKalb Police Department."

Jonesboro, Georgia's News-Daily (10/25) reports the DEA and a metro-area drug task force have "seized 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine and 72 kilograms of cocaine from a Jonesboro house. … DEA officials believe the drugs, seized in a bust Monday, were being delivered to the house from Mexico and stashed there. They were then being delivered from Mexico to …Jonesboro and then distributed from Jonesboro to be sold on the street in Atlanta and in other cities along the East Coast."

On its Web site, WSB-TV, Atlanta (10/24) reports this latest drug bust "is bringing more than drugs and money – it's also bringing a title Atlanta does not want. Agents tell Channel 2 the metro area is now the largest meth distribution hub on the East Coast. Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration say it's a balancing act. They say they've reduced the number of local meth labs but are working to also crack down on international shipments, which make Atlanta number one for meth distribution on the East Coast."

On its Web site, WXIA-TV, Atlanta (10/24) reports the DEA "says it's another indication Atlanta is a meth hub. 'With the recent seizures of meth and ice in Atlanta, each one being larger than the other one, I don't want us to become numbed by the numbers,' said DEA Special Agent in Charge Sherri Strange. It is the third-largest seizure of meth for the DEA in Atlanta."

Local TV Coverage. WAGA-TV, Atlanta (10/24, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Federal officials say you are looking at more than $27 million worth of drugs, half cocaine and half methamphetamine."

WGCL-TV, Atlanta (10/24, 11:00 p.m.) aired, "You are looking at Atlanta's dose of reality. Twenty-seven million dollars worth of crystal meth, cocaine and cash, all seized in a single bust."

WSB-TV, Atlanta (10/24, 11:00 p.m.) aired, "Atlanta apparently has become the largest meth distribution hub on the East Coast. Today, federal authorities announced they made a huge dent by seizing drugs worth millions of dollars. About 27 million dollars in meth and cocaine from a home in Clayton County. … Authorities say they arrested three men linked to a Mexican drug ring. … In all they seized 145 pounds of methamphetamines and 72 grams of cocaine. They say that this was one of the largest busts of its kind in the metro area."

WXIA-TV, Atlanta (10/24, 11:00 p.m.) aired, "In Clayton, agents conducted one of the largest drug busts in state history and arrested three men. Nearly 27 million dollars worth of meth and cocaine and thousands in cash were found inside a home in Jonesboro."

Agents Shut Down Pharmacy In Louisiana. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (10/25) reports federal agents "shut down and searched an Elmwood pharmacy they suspect of shady Internet business practices on Tuesday, marking the second crackdown of its kind in East Jefferson this month. … Unlike the previously shuttered Elite Pharmacy…Pharmacy 101 began as a retail operation about two years ago and later added Internet sales, investigators said. … But similar to Elite, Drug Enforcement Administration officials said huge purchases of painkillers drew their attention to Pharmacy 101. They said the pharmacy was Louisiana's largest purchaser of oxycodone, used in OxyContin, and the third-biggest purchaser of hydrocodone, found in Lorcet, Lortab and Vicodin."

Five Face Drug-Distribution Charges In Indiana. The Fort Wayne (IN) Journal Gazette (10/25) reports federal prosecutors "have accused five men of drug distribution in the transportation of 1,000 pounds of marijuana – packaged in bales – from Texas to Fort Wayne. … According to federal court documents, an undercover Texas Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent tipped off authorities to the plan. … All five men were arrested. When questioned by agents, (one man) said he would be paid $10,000 for his role in the delivery."

Four Face Charges Following Marijuana Dispensary Raid In California. Torrance, California's Daily Breeze (10/24) reports federal agents "seized about 70 pounds of marijuana along with nearly 100 pot plants, a shotgun and a small amount of cash during last week's raid of a medical marijuana dispensary in Torrance, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman said

DOJ_NMG_0086275

Monday. Following the raid at Green Cross, four people "were taken into custody after they allegedly attempted to sell pot to undercover detectives working for LA IMPACT, a countywide task force with an emphasis on drug trafficking."

Meth Seized In Indiana Following Warning By Federal Authorities. The Indianapolis Star (10/24) reports Greenwood police "have seized $300,000 of methamphetamine -- a drug that police in Indiana have been fighting hard to eradicate -- in a bust involving a highly addictive and often-imported variety called 'ice.' … Greenwood police arrested two men Friday and seized two pounds of crystal methamphetamine. Federal authorities had warned local police that Mexican ice had been found in the northeastern United States and soon would be reaching the Midwest, said Greenwood Police Chief Joe Pitcher."

Judge Says Michigan Doctor Ran "Prescription Mill." The Flint (MI) Journal (10/24) reports a one-time Flint Township doctor who "was convicted earlier this year for distribution of narcotic drugs will spend the rest of his life in prison. 'You were running a prescription mill,' U.S. District Judge Paul V. Gadola told Mukunda D. Mukherjee of Fenton, who formerly practiced as an M.D. … Mukherjee was indicted in June 2004 on one charge of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and 53 felony and misdemeanor counts of illegal distribution of various prescription painkillers, including OxyContin, Vicodin, morphine and drugs with codeine. … The investigation had started some four months earlier. Tipped off by a confidential informant, agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the state-local narcotics units, the Flint Area Narcotics Group and the Bay Area Narcotics Enforcement Team started a probe."

The Detroit Free Press (10/25) reports a federal judge "has sentenced a Flint-area doctor to 328 years in prison for illegally prescribing prescription drugs, one of the stiffest sentences ever handed down in an illegal prescription case in eastern Michigan. Gadola imposed the sentence Monday on Mukunda Dev Mukherjeree. … Gadola also ordered Mukherjeree to forfeit $150,000 in assets."

North Carolina Man Faces Federal Drug-Manufacturing Charges. The Staten Island Advance (10/24, Annese) reports that more than a year ago, when federal drug agents "raided his 600-plant marijuana warehouse in Port Richmond, Scott Lawler said the loss was disappointing, but 'it could have been worse,' the feds allege." A federal grand jury now has "indicted the North Carolina man on federal drug manufacturing charges -- charges that could bring him 10 years to life in prison. … Lawler, whose name was on the warehouse lease and who paid the security deposit with a personal check, was arrested this summer. The grand jury indicted him this month."

Convicted Doctor Criticizes Federal Investigation In Painkiller Case. The Morris (IL) Daily Herald (10/24) reports Dr. Parambaloth Edwin "believes the federal government spent five years and $5 million just to hand him six months in jail. 'A lot of money for nothing,' he said Monday, in the wake of his sentencing in federal district court in Chicago for failure to accurately track tens of thousands of tablets of prescription painkillers he dispensed through the years to patients. … He said Monday the Drug Enforcement Agency cleaned out his office during the case. He was charged in June 2005 on 17 counts of allegedly dispensing painkillers to patients without a legitimate medical purpose."

In California, Marijuana Activist's Trial Prompts Dispute Over Supporters' T-shirts, Buttons. The Fresno (CA) Bee (10/24) reports that in the upcoming trial of Merced marijuana activist Dustin Costa, prosecutor Karen Escobar "says the federal government — just like the defendant — has the right to a fair trial. To that end, she is asking a federal judge to prohibit Costa's supporters from wearing buttons, T-shirts or anything else that promotes legalizing medical marijuana. … The request prompted Costa's defense attorney, Robert Rainwater, to point out that Escobar was wearing a lanyard with 'DEA' on it, for the Drug Enforcement Administration — which could bias a jury in the opposite direction. Why should she have that right, Rainwater said, when supporters of Costa and medical marijuana might not."

Bush Administration Seeks To Maintain Aid To Colombia. The AP (10/24, Goodman) reports the Bush administration "will ask Congress to maintain current aid levels to Colombia - running at more $600 million yearly - to support the Latin American nation's fight against terrorism and drug trafficking." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns "said the mostly military aid would remain unchanged through at least 2008. … The call for continued funding is a major boost to President Alvaro Uribe, Washington's staunchest ally in Latin America, and comes despite the failure of efforts to reduce the country's cocaine trade."

DOJ_NMG_0086276

In Bogota, the Miami Herald (10/25) reports Plan Colombia formally "ended in late 2005 with outlays topping $4 billion. The U.S. Congress extended the aid this year as the two countries negotiate a longer-term arrangement. The U.S. money has improved the security situation here, but its impact on the cocaine and heroin industries remains unclear."

Also in Bogota, Prensa Latina (10/24) reports Uribe and Burns "are analyzing Tuesday results of the Colombia Plan, which many consider has failed in wiping out the drug trade in this nation. Until Thursday, Burns will be in Colombia on an official visit accompanied by top functionaries of the departments of State, Defense and Justice, of the Agency for International Development and the Office of National Drug Control Policy. Several analysts and politicians from both countries think the Colombia Plan has also been insufficient in reducing illegal drug crops and eliminating guerrillas in the Andean state."

Two Congressmen Urge Rumsfeld To Step Up Afghanistan Anti-Drug Efforts. The AP (10/25) reports two GOP congressmen "have told Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that more needs to be done about Afghanistan's opium crisis because of increased violence and terrorism against coalition forces. The opium and illicit drug trafficking has greatly increased in recent months and threatens to 'totally corrupt all of the new Afghan democratic institutions we support,' Illinois Reps. Henry Hyde and Mark Kirk said in an Oct. 12 letter." The congressmen "suggested that the Drug Enforcement Administration combat the problem by focusing on drug kingpins in Afghanistan, heroin processing labs and drug convoys. Hyde and Kirk said the convoys that carry the drugs out of the country bring back land mines and modern weapons bought with drug money from the Taliban and other anti-coalition forces." More than 30 newspapers used the AP story, including the Washington Post, Wall Street Journal, San Francisco Chronicle, Houston Chronicle, Los Angeles Times, and Newsday.

UPI (10/24) cites the USA Today story included in yesterday's briefing and writes, "Others officials, including Rumsfeld, voiced similar concerns that drug money is fueling a resurgence of Taliban and al-Qaida forces in Afghanistan. Rumsfeld has not responded to Hyde's letter, but a Defense Department spokeswoman said the department is treating the matter seriously."

IMMIGRATION:

Role Of DNA Testing In Immigration Examined. The Washington Post (10/25, A1, Aizenman, 748K) reports in a front page article that while the use of DNA testing to prove family relationship in immigration cases has "been invaluable" for those lacking sufficient documentation, "some immigration lawyers worry that US authorities are increasingly requiring DNA tests even when the paperwork is in order -- adding substantial costs and delays to an arduous process." Though State and Homeland Security department officials "said they do not track the number of DNA tests submitted by people seeking to sponsor a relative for a visa," the Post notes that Fairfax Identity Laboratories, one of two DNA laboratories in the Washington region accredited to handle immigration cases, said "the number of requests for tests has increased about 20 percent, to about 2,000, in the past year."

TAX:

Thomas Questions Tax-Exempt Status Of NCAA Athletics. In his column for the Washington Post (10/25, A17) George Will writes that earlier this month, Rep. Bill Thomas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, wrote "an eight-page letter to the president of the National Collegiate Athletic Association, asking awkward questions. Thomas wonders how, or whether, big-time college sports programs, which generate billions of tax-exempt dollars -- CBS pays the NCAA an annual average of $545 million, mainly for the rights to televise the March Madness basketball tournament -- further the purposes for which educational institutions are granted tax-exempt status. … In recent decades the NCAA has increased the number of games that football and men's basketball teams are allowed to play. Thomas wonders how these changes help athletes improve their academic performances. Perhaps these changes have pecuniary purposes?"

DOJ_NMG_0086277

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Education Department Eases Restrictions On Single-Sex Classes. The AP (10/25, Feller) reports that the Education Department yesterday "announced rules that will make it easier to create single-sex classes or schools, a plan that's been expected for almost three years." Education Secretary Margaret Spellings "said more parents deserve to have the option. … 'Research shows that some students may learn better in single-sex education environments,' Spellings said, careful not to offer an outright endorsement. 'The Department of Education is committed to giving communities more choices in how they go about offering varied learning environments,' she said." The AP adds, "To be published Wednesday and take effect Nov. 24, the rules update the enforcement of Title IX, the landmark anti-discrimination law. The current language has stood since 1975."

The New York Times (10/25, Schemo, 1.21M) reports that the new rules "will allow districts to create single-sex schools and classes as long as enrollment is voluntary. School districts that go that route must also make coeducational schools and classes of 'substantially equal' quality available for members of the excluded sex." The Times adds, "The federal action is likely to accelerate efforts by public school systems to experiment with single-sex education, particularly among charter schools."

The Washington Post (10/25, A4, Strauss, 748K) reports that the Education Department "made the change even though it reported a year ago that there was not enough evidence to say whether single-sex education is beneficial or harmful to students."

USA Today (10/25, Toppo, 2.27M) reports, "The shift is the biggest in 31 years and for the first time allows schools to separate students by gender if they believe it helps -- a standard that is under debate in the existing research." USA adds, "Spellings said research shows that 'some students may learn better' in single-sex environments, but other administration officials Tuesday admitted that the best research offers only tepid support."

The Washington Times (10/25, Price, 88K) reports, "The guidelines have been studied for four years. Education officials began examining policy changes after research indicated that some students learn and behave better in boys-only or girls-only environments. … Education Department officials in a teleconference yesterday made it clear that the evidence is mixed. 'The research suggests single-sex education can provide benefits to some students under certain circumstances,' said Stephanie Monroe, the department's assistant secretary for civil rights. 'We're not imposing this as a one-size-fits-all mandate. This is an option that can be helpful to some students, and that's what the literature says. Local schools and parents will make the decision on what is appropriate for their students,' she said."

NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 7, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Some women's advocacy groups fear the new rules will end up short-changing girls."

Embattled Schools Try Marketing Themselves To Parents. The Washington Post (10/25, B1, De Vise, 748K) reports that embattled schools, that are falling behind the No Child Left Behind Act's requirements and risk losing students to the transfers allowed by the Act "are trying a new tack: fighting back by marketing themselves to parents. They promote the extra resources afforded to schools after their test scores repeatedly fail to meet standards, the easy proximity of a neighborhood school, the familiarity of friends and even their so-called inadequate results. … Principals point out that the standard for 'adequate yearly progress,' the measure of success under the 2002 federal law, is a bit higher each year. And a school can be labeled a failure if any one of several statistical subgroups misses the mark. For example, the test scores of special education students or those with limited English skills can open an entire school to transfers."

Federal Auditors Probe Costs Of Transporting Medicaid Patients. The Washington Times (10/25, McElhatton, 88K) reports, "Federal auditors are examining the skyrocketing costs of providing transportation to Medicaid patients across the country, a problem that DC officials are struggling to control. The Office of Inspector General for the US Department of Health and Human Services said it 'will determine whether state Medicaid agencies make erroneous payments for transportation services,' according to its recently released 2007 work plan. Medicaid transportation costs across the nation rose by 48 percent from 1999 to 2003, reaching $1.5 billion, according to the work plan."

Senate Finance Committee Produces List Of Possible "Tax Gap" Fixes. The Wall Street Journal

DOJ_NMG_0086278

(10/25, D2, Wells, 2.03M) reports, "Congress, in a perpetual hunt to raise revenue without appearing to raise taxes, has a new list of ways to fatten the federal Treasury. One proposal would force brokers to track historical price-basis information on stock sales, which could mean a stiffer capital-gains hit for investors who, intentionally or not, misstate the original purchase price. Another proposal would tighten the interest deduction for some mortgage refinancings. Still another would remove a key tax advantage for many family-owned businesses. The proposals, released to little fanfare last week by Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation, are viable options for lawmakers looking to offset the cost of future tax cuts, tax experts say. … This list of revenue-boosting options was produced at the request of Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley and Sen. Max Baucus, who asked the joint committee to pinpoint ways to close the estimated $290 billion tax gap, a measure of uncollected taxes."

Reid's "Ethical Transgressions" Seen As Evidence Of Congress' "Entitlement" Mind Set. In her Washington Post column (10/25, A17), Ruth Marcus says, "As recent ethical transgressions go," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's "actions aren't the biggest deal around. Election rules bar candidates from using campaign funds for personal expenses, but Reid contends that the tips were to thank the staff for the hassle of dealing with a resident dignitary. That's arguable, and after the Associated Press reported on Reid's donor-funded generosity, he repaid the three years of campaign-funded tips, $3,300." Reid's actions are "more important, though, as an illustration of the entrenched, bipartisan congressional mind-set of entitlement. Republicans and Democrats may not agree on much, but their joint operating ethos too often boils down to an attitude of: 'It's my due. Why shouldn't I?'" What's "striking about Congress (aside from flagrantly corrupt members such as former representative Randy 'Duke' Cunningham) is the nickel-and-dime nature of the benefits they feel entitled to take, from Reid's acceptance of free boxing tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission to California Republican Rep. John Doolittle's use of campaign funds to pay the babysitter."

Perino Featured In Esquire's "Women We're Ashamed To Love" Special. Al Kamen, in his Washington Post "In the Loop" column (10/25) writes that his month's Esquire magazine features a "photo display of 'The Women We Love' from various fields. … The section includes 'Women We're Ashamed to Love,' topped by White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino. 'Hotter than Tony Snow and Scott McClellan combined,' Esquire says of Perino. 'Plus, the executive branch seems so much more capable in her dulcet voice. Lie to us, Dana. Lie to us.'"

White House Chief Usher Retiring. The Washington Post (10/25, A6, Romano, 748K) reports, "Gary Walters, the longtime chief usher at the White House who has kept the secrets of seven first families, will retire at the end of the year after nearly four decades of service." Walters "said last night that he told first lady Laura Bush and the president last week of his decision. … In a statement, President Bush and the first lady praised Walters, who also worked for the first Bush White House, and said that they were 'grateful for making our family feel at home.'"

Patent And Trademark Office Institutes Telecommuting Pilot Project. The Washington Post's "Federal Diary" column (10/25, D4, Barr) reports on "a telecommuting pilot project developed by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office…and one of its unions. Under the pilot, 10 experienced trademark lawyers with good job-performance ratings will be permitted to move anywhere in the continental United States and work from home. … There is a catch. The lawyers must show up once a week at the Alexandria headquarters, at their own expense. That requirement will allow the PTO to keep the employees on the roster at agency headquarters and avoid triggering a law that mandates reimbursement for employee travel and per diems."

Government Urged To Provide Face Protection In Event Of Flu Outbreak. In a New York Times op-ed (10/25), Lawrence Wein of Stanford's graduate school of business says, "Despite all the attention given to anthrax and smallpox and potential weapons of mass destruction, pandemic influenza is probably the world's most serious near-term public health threat." It is "highly likely that an effective vaccine will not be available during the pandemic's first wave, that we won't have enough antiviral drugs for large-scale prophylactic use, and that hospitals will be too overwhelmed to treat most cases." To prevent the virus' spread, the government "must draw up a plan for educating the public about effective nonpharmaceutical interventions like hand washing and face protection like masks." While the government "says that it might be beneficial, it doesn't make respirators or masks available. Yet face protection would guard against aerosol and droplet transmission, and even reduce contact transmission by making it difficult to place fingers into one's mouth or nose."

DOJ_NMG_0086279

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Hits New High As Investors Await Federal Reserve Meeting. The Financial Times (10/25, Mackenzie) reports US stocks "were caught in narrow ranges on Tuesday, as earnings continued flowing while unsettled investors were distracted by the two-day policy meeting of the Federal Reserve." The S&P500 "was up 0.36 points, or 0.03 per cent, at 1,377.38 while the Nasdaq Composite was 10.72 points, or 0.5 per cent, lower at 2,344.84. The Dow Jones Industrial Average settled up 10.97 points at 12,127.88, marking its fourth record close in five days." But "some observers warn that the surge in equities since markets bottomed in July might not be sustainable."

NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 5, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now the Wall Street Now. The Dow was up almost 11points to another record close [to close at 12,127.88]. NASDAQ was down just under 11 points [to close at 2,344.84]."

The Wall Street Journal (10/25, C1, McKay, 2.03M) reports, "Investors shied from making big bets ahead of the Federal Reserve's latest interest-rate decision, due out this afternoon." On a day "when major stock indicators ended mixed, the Dow Jones Industrial Average did close at another record, its 11th in the past 16 sessions." Fed officials are "expected to leave their interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25%, although their written statement, expected at 2:15 p.m. EDT, may offer surprises for Wall Street." Even "without the central bankers' thoughts in hand, investors' hopes for a rate cut by the end of the year have been fading in recent days, amid a generally strong batch of strong third-quarter corporate earnings reports."

Federal Reserve Debating Public Inflation Target. The Washington Post (10/25, D1, Henderson, 748K) reports "a fervent debate is underway this week" at the Federal Reserve: "Should the Fed explicitly tell the public what level of inflation it wants to achieve? And if so, should that goal be in the 1 to 2 percent range, or 'comfort zone,' expressed by many central bankers in recent years, or should the upper limit be raised to as high as 3 percent?" How much "people's paychecks will buy in the future, how far their retirement money will go, how many people might need to be thrown out of work to achieve a stated inflation goal -- all these outcomes could be influenced by a debate among the nation's central bankers at their meetings yesterday and today, to which the public has no access." One option, "long-advocated by Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, is for the Fed to adopt a formal, numerical inflation goal, a practice called inflation targeting and used by central banks in 25 countries. The Bank of England, for example, is one of several central banks that seeks to keep inflation at or near 2 percent." The policymaking Federal Open Market Committee "includes supporters and skeptics, making a quick decision unlikely. If committee members ultimately decide to adopt a target in principle, the next challenge would be setting the number."

Some Heating Bills To Rise Despite Drop In Natural Gas Prices. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A13, Smith, 2.03M) reports, "A substantial drop in natural-gas prices won't help some U.S. consumers with their heating bills this winter." The Journal says, "Some utilities that raised rates significantly last year, in the aftermath of gas-production disruptions along the Gulf Coast, will offer substantial reductions this year because of the fall in gas prices. Others will have modest increases or decreases depending on whether they locked in gas supplies when prices were high or rolled the dice on the spot market."

Judge Rules Nine-Year-Old Cannot Be Forced To Undergo Circumcision. The Chicago Tribune (10/25, Peres) reports, "In a case that has been closely watched by anti-circumcision groups nationwide, a Cook County judge ruled Tuesday that the medical benefits of the procedure are not clear enough to compel a 9-year-old Northbrook boy to be circumcised against his will. The boy's mother and her new husband had claimed the operation was necessary to prevent recurrent episodes of redness and discomfort. The boy's father sought a court order barring the circumcision, which he called an 'unnecessary amputation.' The mother has sole custody, but their 2003 parenting agreement gave her ex-husband a say in non-emergency medical decisions."

Former Editor Wins Lawsuit Against Music Magazine's Founders. The Washington Post (10/25, C1, Carlson) reports, "After a tumultuous two-week trial, Kimberly Osorio, a former editor in chief of the Source magazine, won a workplace lawsuit against the popular hip-hop monthly, and a Manhattan jury awarded her $15.5 million. … Osorio, who was fired by the Source last year, sued the magazine and its founders, David Mays and Raymond Scott, alleging sexual harassment, gender discrimination, defamation, retaliatory discharge and maintaining a hostile work environment."

DOJ_NMG_0086280

Bush Says Tax Bills Would Increase Under Democrats. The AP (10/25, Loven) reports, "Look around the dinner table and add $500 to your tax bill for each child, President Bush said Tuesday as he sought to convince voters that Democrats would destroy the economy and the family budget if they took over Congress." During a "fundraising swing through Florida aimed at adding nearly $1.4 million to GOP coffers," Bush said, "When you go to the voting booth in two weeks, the lever you pull will determine the taxes you pay for years to come. You will feel the results every April 15." The AP adds that "each one of the president's recent political speeches has offered new zingers aimed at making more ominous the specter of Democrats in charge of the House or Senate, either on the subject of tax cuts or fighting terrorism. On Tuesday, Bush singled out for special emphasis the gradual doubling of the child tax credit from $500 to $1,000, one of several cuts passed during his administration with expiration dates." But "Bush skimmed past the fact that the child tax credit is not yet $1,000 and doesn't reach that level until 2010," and he "also ignored that many Democrats now say they want to retain that tax cut." The AP adds Bush "made his cash-raising visit for GOP congressional candidate Vern Buchanan cheaper for the Republican businessman's campaign by stopping briefly at Gyrocam Camera Systems."

ABC World News (10/24, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M), the only network to report on Bush's trip, said the President "hit the campaign trail visiting Sarasota, Florida, to stump for the Republican for the seat being vacated by Katherine Harris. This is one of the seats around the country that the GOP had considered safe, but are now in play. The President's visit underscores just how concerned his party has become about its prospects this fall."

The Sarasota Herald Tribune (10/25, Wallace) reports Bush "exhorted Republicans to show up on election day, saying that a strong GOP turnout is critical to preserving his tax cut package and winning the War in Iraq." Bush said, "We're going to do everything we can to protect you before the enemy attacks." The Herald Tribune adds, "Appearing at a $20 a person fundraiser for Republican congressional candidate Vern Buchanan, the president spent a good portion of his speech warning the audience that Democrats, if they gain control of Congress, will discontinue tax cuts and disrupt U.S. efforts in Iraq." After his speech, Bush's "motorcade made a stop at Gyrocam Camera Systems, a local company with a $51 million contract to provide the Armed Forces with explosive-detecting cameras that can be mounted on personnel carriers and other military vehicles." Meanwhile, Republican Sen. Mel Martinez "has been hitting the campaign trail for Buchanan pretty hard. This is his third visit to Sarasota in the last 60 days. Prior to that, it had been almost two years since his last public visit."

The Miami Herald (10/25, Piedra, Clark, 310K) reports the Sarasota House seat "should have been a cakewalk." But polls "suggest Democrats are poised to seize control of the House -- in part by possibly picking up this seat and two others in South Florida." Strategists "suggest Democratic prospects have been aided by bleak reports out of Iraq, mixed with distaste for corruption scandals -- topped by U.S. Rep. Mark Foley's resignation last month after graphic Internet exchanges with former House pages were made public." Buchanan has "had trouble gaining traction since he limped out of a bitter primary with 32 percent of the vote amid attacks on his business practices. The millionaire auto dealer and major GOP donor has pumped nearly $4.5 million of his own cash into the campaign, making it one of the nation's costliest." Internal polls "are said to show him trailing Democrat Christine Jennings."

The Washington Post (10/25, A7, Abramowitz, 748K) reports President Bush "accused Democrats on Tuesday of being 'genetically disposed' to raise taxes, as he sharpened his rhetoric on the economy in an effort to rally Republicans to the polls next month." Bush "mocked Democrats for what he described as their misplaced pessimism that tax cuts would not stimulate the economy. He said it was only one of many poor predictions by the Democrats and suggested they are making another mistake in their growing confidence that they might take the House next month."

The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Gerstenzang, 918K) reports Bush used "mocking language to belittle Democrats" as he "launched a new, muscular political attack today in his campaign to preserve Republican majorities in the House and Senate, challenging the Democrats' economic record and their commitment to fighting terrorism and succeeding in Iraq." Bush "brought up, as he has done before, a statement by Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the likely House speaker if Democrats win a majority, expressing Democrats' 'love' of tax cuts." But citing Democratic "opposition to tax cuts he had proposed, the president said sarcastically: 'Time and time again, she had an opportunity to show her love for taxes. If this is the Democrats' idea of love, I wouldn't want to see what hate looks like.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086281

The Palm Beach Post (10/25, Bennett, Laforgia) reports President Bush "raised more than $1 million for the Republican National Committee during a brief stop here as the costly battle over which party controls Congress entered its final two weeks." After campaigning in Sarasota, Bush "attended a late-afternoon fund-raiser at the home of advertising executive Jordan Zimmerman in The Sanctuary neighborhood between Federal Highway and the Intracoastal Waterway." The "$25,000-a-head event raised more than $1 million for the party, a GOP spokeswoman said. Gov. Jeb Bush and U.S. Sen. Mel Martinez also attended."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (10/25, Blum, 265K) reports President Bush "passed through Fort Lauderdale on Tuesday to raise last-minute cash in Boca Raton for Republican candidates fighting to hold onto the party's majority in Congress." Supporters who "gathered at Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood International Airport to see Air Force One touch down received just a quick glimpse of the president before his motorcade sped off to a Boca Raton fundraiser. The private event held at the mansion of advertising executive Jordan Zimmerman raised $1 million for the Republican National Committee." On Friday, First Lady Laura Bush is "expected to attend a Palm Beach fundraiser for U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw, who is in a tight race against Democratic state senator Ron Klein for Florida's 22nd Congressional District."

Democrats Seize On Bush Social Security Comments. The Washington Post (10/25, A7, Montgomery, 748K) reports, "More than a year after Social Security reform faded from the political radar screen, the debate erupted anew yesterday, as Democrats seized on news that President Bush hopes to revive an unpopular proposal to make changes in the national retirement program." Bush has recently "said Social Security remains one of the 'big items' he wants to tackle next year and he continues to 'believe that a worker, at his or her option, ought to be allowed to put some of their own money...in a private savings account, an account that they call their own.'" With just "two weeks to go until the Nov. 7 congressional elections, Democrats highlighted Bush's comments, seeing an opportunity to remind voters about a Republican proposal that polls have shown is highly unpopular with many voters." Democratic strategists "were gleeful about the chance to draw a sharp distinction between the parties on Social Security, an explosive issue among elderly voters." Some Republicans "were equally perplexed by Bush's timing." Rep. Thomas Davis III said, "I guess you could argue if it gets Iraq off the front page, it was probably a good thing at this point."

Bush Gets Limited Campaign Exposure In Final Weeks. The New York Times (10/25, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports President Bush's visit to Sarasota, Florida for Republican Vern Buchanan "offers a hint of how White House strategists will use Mr. Bush in the final two weeks of the midterm campaign." A Republican strategist "close to the White House" said "some Republicans — among them Senate candidates in tight races in Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Tennessee — simply do not want their final campaign images to include Mr. Bush, and have spurned White House offers for help." Instead, White House strategists "are sending Mr. Bush to Republican-leaning districts like Sarasota, where he can help energize the base and increase voter turnout. The president will also appear in swing districts where the Republican candidate has calculated that the last-minute infusion of cash he can bring in is worth more than any bad publicity surrounding the visit." GOP strategist Charlie Black said, "You probably won't see him too much in the Northeast or the areas where he has less popularity. But we do have a number of races that are very close, where the president, as champion fund-raiser, can still get some extra money in there and allow us to outspend the opponent."

The Washington Times (10/25, Curl, 88K) reports Bush "has become the Stealth Campaigner. Candidates across the country, especially those in tight races where the president's power to draw cash is most valuable, want him to drop by for a fundraiser. They just don't want their picture taken with the head of the party -- mainly because they know it will end up in their opponents' television commercials." So far this year, Bush has "done 10 times as many closed-press fundraising events compared to 2002. He has also not appeared at a single major Republican rally, unlike four years ago, when he did 32."

Bush Advised To Seek Credit On North Korea. In their column in The Hill (10/25), Dick Morris and Eileen McGann say President George Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "have succeeded beyond expectations in lining up China as a strong ally in forcing North Korea to abandon its nuclear ambitions. The New York Times reports that the Chinese are even threatening to ratchet back on their oil shipments to North Korea, which is totally dependent on Beijing for fuel." But Bush "is getting no credit for it and neither are the Republicans. All of the focus has been on the role that Rice and UN Ambassador John Bolton are playing in forcing North Korea back from membership of the nuclear club. President Bush needs to do much more to rivet popular attention on Korea, as opposed to Iraq." To "guard against" a possible strong Democratic close, Bush "needs to distract the country from Iraq, and North Korea offers the best way to do so."

DOJ_NMG_0086282

Huffington Expects Bush To Make Political Hay Over North Korea. In a CBS Evening News (10/24, story 8, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) commentary segment, liberal commentator Arianna Huffington said, "Don't get me wrong, North Korea testing a nuke is real bad news. Yet, I couldn't help but wonder what political use Karl Rove and the President would put this real bad news to. After all, banging the fear gong and trying to scare the hell out of us has worked like a charm for the President and the GOP."

White House Uses "Radio Day" To Spread Optimistic Message. The AP (10/25, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush's political top gun Karl Rove gushes with optimism about Election Day," while National security adviser Stephen Hadley "says the Iraqis need to do more to secure their nation — and do it faster. Presidential confidant Dan Bartlett takes a few verbal punches at Democrats." It "was 'Radio Day' at the White House where more than 30 talk show hosts were invited to set up shop in a heated white tent on the North Lawn to quiz senior administration officials. Beginning at 5:30 a.m., the broadcasters chatted live about everything from Iraq to homeland security to the Nov. 7 elections." In an interview with Fox News Radio, Rove "predicted the Republicans would retain control of Congress, discounting polls that show the Democrats threatening to take over." In an interview with Charlie Sykes of WTMJ in Milwaukee, Wis., Bartlett "also predicted a Republican victory." The AP adds, "Talk about Iraq was buzzing in the tent." Other officials who stopped by the tent or were interviewed at other spots at the White House included Vice President Dick Cheney, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and White House press secretary Tony Snow."

The Washington Post (10/25, A7, Kurtz, 748K) reports that for "15 years, the conservatives who dominate talk radio have served as shock troops for the GOP, bashing Democrats, hitting the hot buttons and rallying their listeners. Since the Republicans won back Congress in 1994, a feat in which Rush Limbaugh played a catalyzing role, through the disputed election of 2000 and President Bush's first term, the radio talkers have wielded a powerful megaphone for their ideological side." But "as Bartlett, Karl Rove, Tony Snow, Michael Chertoff and other top administration officials worked the tent during yesterday's day-long event, it became apparent that there are serious cracks in this once-solid wall of support." Jan Mickelson, "a fixture in Des Moines radio," said, "The corps of Bush supporters are just seething, angry and disappointed." Mickelson said Iraq "has become 'ungovernable,' voters are upset about 'perceived corruption in the Republican Party,' and 'social conservatives feel like they've been used again.' But in a point echoed by several of the hosts, Mickelson said that 'immigration is the number one issue' fostering disgruntlement with the Republicans, because his listeners are 'seeing the effects of lack of border control every single day.'" The "biggest star on the right yesterday was Sean Hannity, who is heard on 515 stations. He was granted interviews with Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, whom Hannity hailed as 'a great American.'"

USA Today (10/25, Jackson, 2.27M) reports the hosts, "both national and local, hailed from cities from New York to San Diego. They included a smattering of liberals." Bush spokesman Tony Snow, "himself a former radio talk show host, sat for at least 34 radio interviews in the big white tent. His list included national hosts Glenn Beck and Neal Boortz, as well as Inga Barks of Bakersfield, Calif., and Dave Jaconette of Kalamazoo, Mich."

White House Reaching Out To Disaffected Conservatives. The Washington Post (10/25, A1, Baker, 748K) reports in a front page story, "Beset by discouraging polls and division within ideological ranks, the White House is accelerating efforts to woo back disaffected conservatives and energize the Republican base in a reprise of a strategy that succeeded in the last two campaign cycles." President Bush and Vice President Cheney "have given multiple interviews to conservative journalists, senior adviser Karl Rove has telephoned religious and social activists, and the White House has staged signing ceremonies for legislation cracking down on terrorism and illegal immigration. Two weeks before Election Day, Bush aides invited dozens of radio talk show hosts for a marathon broadcast from the White House yesterday to reach conservative listeners." The "message that Bush and others are sending to alienated supporters is that, no matter how upset they have been about various policies or political missteps over the past couple of years, life would be far worse under the Democrats." But "some conservatives said it is too late." GOP pollster Frank Luntz said, "I've given up on 2006. They've already made so many mistakes, there's no way they can fix it in two weeks. But I'm worried now they're going to lose all the marbles." The Post adds the White House "courtship of the right paid enormous dividends in the past, but this year it is complicated by a far more skeptical audience than in 2002 and 2004."

DOJ_NMG_0086283

Republicans Could See Defections Among Religious Voters. The Christian Science Monitor (10/25, Lampman, 58K) reports, "Recent surveys show signs of a shift among religious voters that could give Democrats a boost." An October Gallup poll "found white religious voters 'equally as likely to say they will vote Democratic as Republican.' And a Pew Research poll last week found just 57 percent of white Evangelicals planning to vote Republican, a drop from 68 percent in 2002 and 74 percent in 2004. Among white Catholics, the decline was even greater." Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life fellow John Green said, "The GOP's problems with white Evangelicals are important, but they have even bigger problems with white Catholics." The Monitor adds, "The shift reflects plummeting support for the Republican administration and Congress over the war in Iraq and multiplying political scandals. But it appears that Democratic candidates' efforts to articulate their faith and values - and tie them to a broader range of issues - are also resonating with voters."

Kuo Book Gets Muted Reaction Among Christian Conservatives. In the Wall Street Journal's "Campaign Journal" column (10/25), Jackie Calms reports a book "that perhaps should be required reading for evangelical conservatives" is "Tempting Faith." Author David Kuo "worked in the White House office for the faith-based social initiatives that were a foundation block of Mr. Bush's 2000 platform. The book recounts his disillusionment with officials, up to the president. On his promotional tour, Mr. Kuo is calling for Christians to 'fast' from politics for two years." The book recounts how White House aides cynically treated Christian Conservative leaders and the faith based initiative. Perhaps "understandably, Mr. Kuo's book hasn't gotten the attention of another, best-selling author Bob Woodward's 'State of Denial' on the administration's mal-administration of the Iraq-Afghanistan war -- the biggest issue on Americans' minds generally these days. Yet even among Christian conservatives, the reaction to the Kuo book -- where there is any -- is a shoot-the-messenger dismissal."

Rove Remains Optimistic About GOP Retaining House Majority. The Hill (10/25, Kaplan) reports Karl Rove "told Republican supporters last Friday that the media was misreading the political environment — that the combination of money and mobilization of religious conservatives could keep the House in Republican hands after November." Speaking at a fundraiser "for Ohio GOP congressional candidate Joy Padgett at the Old Ebbitt Grill, Rove said polls showed that evangelical Protestant voters were still enthusiastic and suggested that Republicans started with a two- to three-point advantage because of their successful voter turnout operations in 2002 and 2004." The Hill adds, "Despite evidence that voters could direct a barrage of negative public opinion against Republican officeholders on Election Day, Rove and President Bush have been upbeat, making some Democrats nervous about current predictions and worrying some Republicans."

Snow Predicts Republicans Will Maintain Control Of House. White House spokesman Tony Snow was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (10/24) if Republicans will retain control of the House after this election. Snow said, "Yes, they are." Asked about polls that do not look good for Republicans right now, Snow said, "You know the difference between a generic poll and an individual poll. There are 435 House races. I think you're going to see a couple of things. I think, for instance, the fact that for a long time when it comes to Iraq, people have been focusing like another network did on a sniper taking down an American, rather than the achievements of the Americans. People are going to start thinking what's actually going on there? They are also going to ask about the economy. Who is going to be better off? The president cut taxes. We have been through an amazing run of difficulty in the American economy."

Democrats Leery Of Overconfidence. The Washington Times (10/25, Fagan, Hallow, 88K) reports

DOJ_NMG_0086284

Democrats, "stung by unexpected defeats in the past two national elections, are trying to fend off poll-generated overconfidence by staying on the offensive and focusing on get-out-the-vote efforts." Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network, said, "We've learned our lessons. The last two elections we thought we'd do better. Nobody's taking their foot off the gas." The Times adds Danny Briscoe, "a campaign media consultant and former Kentucky state Democratic Party chairman, says from party leaders and pundits to grass-roots Democrats, feelings swing between disbelief and superconfidence -- at least when it comes to House control." Fighting those "feelings of disbelief, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi has emphasized that a Democratic takeover of the House isn't definite and that there's still work to be done."

Pelosi Sees Economy As Number One Election Issue. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi was asked on CNBC's Kudlow and Company (10/24) what the number on issue in this election is. Pelosi said, "Number one issue -- where the economy isn't. The economy is tremendous issue for middle income families caught in the middle income squeeze. Poorer families in the crunch. We have to have a fair economy where we raise the minimum wage. We give access to higher education. Make it more affordable. Access to quality healthcare. Dignified retirement. Where there is certainty in people's lives so they can be entrepreneurial. They can take economic risks. They can help grow the economy."

Cheney Says Pelosi Is "Not In Sync" With Most Americans. Vice President Dick Cheney was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/24) for his thoughts on House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi and her claims that Republicans are immoral and corrupt, and that she "wants to restore civility in Washington." Cheney said, "It would seem to be a little inconsistent to use that kind of language on her adversaries and then talk about trying to restore civility. Nancy Pelosi is -- she's the Democratic leader in the House. She earned that post, ran for it, had to compete for it. I think, frankly, she helps our cause with that kind of talk, but also because of what she believes. I think Nancy is not in sync with the vast majority of the American people."

Pearlstein Says Democrats Seemed Poised To Repeat GOP Mistakes. Steven Pearlstein writes in the Washington Post (10/25, D1, 748K), "There are lots of reasons why businesses run into trouble, but a few pop up with remarkable regularity. … It should be no surprise that these business missteps are also common in politics. They are the key mistakes that led Republicans to overplay their hand and perhaps throw away the chance to renew their political lease on Congress and the White House. Though the election is still two weeks away, there are signs the Democrats, if they win, are determined to make the same mistakes." The Democrats' "six-point program is more a compendium of political slogans and ideological hot buttons than a serious policy agenda -- again, the very thing the customers say they don't want. … In politics as in business, the way to create enduring advantage is not by beating the competition at its game but changing the nature of the game. Up to this point, all Democrats have been doing is beating the Republicans at their game."

Thomma Says Waxman Could Cause Trouble For Bush Administration. In his column for McClatchy (10/24), Steven Thomma wrote that "if you want to watch a Democrat who could give the Bush White House hell for the next two years, keep an eye on Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif." Waxman "would become chairman of the House Government Reform Committee if the Democrats take over the House. He's one of the shrewdest, most effective inside players in Congress. And armed with the committee's subpoena power, he'd force the Bush administration to spend much of its last two years in office answering questions about its first six." Thomma adds, "Giving Waxman the gavel would be a dramatic shift for the House, which all but dropped congressional oversight of the executive branch when a Republican administration was sworn in on Jan. 20, 2001. It would also be a shift for Waxman, who spent the 1990s largely defending the Clinton administration and accusing the Republican House of overreaching in its investigations."

Lack Of Economic Confidence Could Boost Anti-Business Agenda. In his Wall Street Journal column (10/25, A2), Alan Murray says, "There's something unnerving about watching an anti-incumbent tidal wave roll in at a time when the economy, by most macro measures, is cruising. Unemployment is at a historic low -- 4.6% -- and inflation remains under 3%. The big economic bugaboos of earlier this year -- rising interest rates and soaring oil prices -- have both eased off." But a "majority of voters who responded to last week's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll say they disapprove of President Bush's handling of the economy." The "economic backdrop for election 2006 should raise a warning flag about the future. Large numbers of Americans seem to have lost their belief in John F. Kennedy's famous aphorism that a rising tide lifts all boats." Political analyst Charles Cook said, "They know the economy is white hot, but they also know they aren't in it....There's a feeling that some people are getting theirs, but we aren't getting ours." The "danger for business is that the broad social support for pro-business and pro-market policies that has characterized American politics for a quarter century or more could be breaking down." A Democratic "wise man told me recently that if he were asked what economic platform would offer a Democratic presidential contender the best chances of success in 2008, he would have to say it's an antitrade, antiglobalization, anti-immigration platform."

DOJ_NMG_0086285

NRCC Focusing On 33 Key House Races. GOP strategists are urging donors to contribute to 33 key House races in which members and candidates are in need of support. The Hill (10/25, Cusack) reports, "The National Republican Congressional Committee's (NRCC) 'Final Push List' consists of 29 Republican seats and only four Democratic seats, indicating that the GOP is playing defense. The list, obtained by The Hill, provides a rare glimpse of the races that congressional strategists are concentrating on close to Election Day. NRCC focuses on most but not all toss-up House races in its Final Push roster, dated Oct. 19." The Hill adds, "Republican incumbents who did not make the Final Push cut include Reps. Chris Chocola (Ind.), Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.), John Hostettler (Ind.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Jon Porter (Nev.), Clay Shaw (Fla.), Christopher Shays (Conn.), and Charles Taylor (N.C.). These Republicans are in highly competitive races, but several have major fundraising advantages over their opponents and are not in dire need of NRCC assistance."

Drug Industry's Contributions To GOP Candidates Prove Controversial. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A1, McKinnon, 2.03M) reports in a front page story, "Assailed by Democrats, drug companies are pouring millions of dollars into close races, giving some Republicans a financial edge. In the process, the industry is becoming not just a campaign backer, but also a campaign issue." Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum "is a big beneficiary of the industry's push. He was a leading proponent of the 2003 law that gave seniors Medicare coverage for prescription drugs, and helped shape the law in ways that benefited the industry." Santorum's campaign has "received almost $500,000 from pharmaceutical interests and their employees, according to the Center for Responsive Politics." Democrat Bob Casey Jr. "regularly attacks the Medicare program as 'a giveaway to Big Pharma,' in part because it bars the government from negotiating prices. He and many fellow Democrats say they will overhaul the benefit if they win control of Congress on Nov. 7. Not surprisingly, Mr. Casey counts just $11,850 in contributions from pharmaceutical interests." The Journal adds, "Companies and business groups have long thrown money at candidates to further their interests. But with a Democratic victory increasingly likely, few recent elections have been so critical, particularly for the drug industry."

Democrats Hope To Create "Blue Belt" Across Three Florida Districts. The Hill (10/25, Blake) reports that the two districts that have been battlegrounds in Florida this election season, Rep. Vern Buchanan's 13th and Rep. Clay Shaw's 22nd, "both border former Rep. Mark Foley's (R) south Florida district." According to Buchanan, "the month-old scandal surrounding Foley's communications with House pages has thrown a wrench in the final month of the campaign, Buchanan said. Foley's 16th District, now a tight battle between Democrat Tim Mahoney and Republican Joe Negron, lies in south Florida between the Sarasota-based 13th on the west coast and the Fort Lauderdale-based 22nd on the east coast. The Democrats hope to turn the three of them into a blue belt across the peninsula, chipping away at the Republicans' 18-7 House advantage in this very purple battleground state. The three would go a long way toward a possible Democratic majority in Congress, and Florida could rival states like Indiana and Ohio, which have long been considered prime pickup territory for the Democrats, as an impact state in 2006."

Veteran Republicans Running Like Underdogs. The Hill (10/25, O'Connor) reports that many veteran Republican lawmakers are running like underdogs this election year. The "expanding field of veteran Republicans in serious danger this October is further evidence of a national wave that appears to be cresting this fall, imperiling the GOP's majorities in both chambers. In some cases, this eroding political landscape has made seniority a millstone rather than an advantage."

DOJ_NMG_0086286

In AZ5, Hayworth, Mitchell Display Differences In Personality. The Hill (10/25, Hearn) reports on the race in AZ5, which pits incumbent Rep. J.D. Hayworth, "a tough, boisterous Republican from upscale Scottsdale" against Harry Mitchell, "an easygoing Democratic native son from a university town." According to The Hill, "In television ads and on the stump, the pair carve out stark differences in personality." Mitchell "portrays himself as friendly and accessible in campaign ads, appearing with children and senior citizens amid soft lighting and cheerful hues, a deliberate strategy, said one Democratic aide." Hayworth "welcomes the tough-guy image, arguing that he delivers for his constituents. He is a vigorous campaigner with an uncanny memory for names and personal details that is rare even among seasoned politicians. His ads focus on cracking down on illegal immigration, showing him at a cattle ranch talking with worried residents."

Despite Bribery Probe, Tight Reelection Bid, Jefferson Projects Confidence. The New York Times (10/25, Nossiter, 1.21M) reports that Rep. William Jefferson is unbowed by the pending federal bribery investigation against him and his tight reelection bid. Indeed, Jefferson "still maneuvers with relative ease in the world of New Orleans politics, which he has partly owned since his opponents in the Nov. 7 primary election were barely in high school." Jefferson "is outwardly projecting confidence in the biggest challenge of a career that stretches over nearly 30 years." The Times adds, "Over the congressman's protests, the state Democratic Party endorsed his leading challenger, Karen R. Carter, a state representative with a reputation for seriousness. Experts reckon that he and Ms. Carter are the likeliest in the field to wind up in a runoff in December, to be held if no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote, under the state's idiosyncratic election rules."

NYTimes Endorses Shays' Opponent In CT4. In an editorial, the New York Times (10/25, 1.21M) endorses Democrat Diane Farrell in her bid against Republican Rep. Chris Shays in CT4. The Times argues that Farrell "is an excellent candidate," and adds that Shays "may be a beacon of integrity, but if he is re-elected, he will vote to continue House control by a party that has repeatedly sold out the country to special-interest lobbyists. … With due respect for Mr. Shays's service, we strongly endorse Diane Farrell for Congress."

Documents Cast Doubt On Taylor Land Ownership Claims. The Hill (10/25, Schor) reports, "Public land records in Haywood County, N.C., show that a company registered to Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) owns 17 plots of land in the mountain community of Maggie Valley, an interest that tax records indicate is worth more than $500,000." The records "raise questions about an assertion Taylor made in an Oct. 12 statement, part of a strong public defense mounted by the House Appropriations 'cardinal' after a Wall Street Journal report alleged this month that Taylor steered federal funds to projects that would benefit businesses in which he has an interest." Taylor's "strongly worded defense comes in the thick of a hard-fought race between the wealthy lawmaker, whose estimated personal assets topped $50 million last year, and" Democrat Heath Shuler.

Commentator Criticizes Treatment Of Ney. In an op-ed in The Hill (10/25), Ellen Ratner, Washington bureau chief for the Talk Radio News Service and a commentator on the Fox News Channel, says, "I happen to be a proud liberal, one who gets to spout off on 300 radio stations every day." Yet "even in the rancid atmosphere that passes for political interaction in Washington these days, one can occasionally reach across the partisan and ideological divide to form genuine friendships with those on the other side. Thankfully, that's what happened with me and my friend, Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio." As Republicans "distance themselves from him and Democrats use him as a campaign tactic, let me say that I'm heartbroken over what's happened to him." Ney "was a guy who really did remember where he came from. He knew that the kids he'd grown up with couldn't afford to raise their children in quality housing, and he went to Washington determined to do something about it." Ratner adds, "I only wish he'd had a chance to tell his side in a court of law — and, take it from me, there is another side to this. Today's Justice Department, however, tries its evidence in the public press, not a courtroom, so it can't be challenged or cross-examined."

Senate Polls Show Three GOP States May Deny Democrats Senate Majority. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Brownstein, 918K) reports Democrats are "within range of capturing a Senate majority, but face potentially decisive resistance from rural voters in three critical Republican-leaning states, a series of Times/Bloomberg polls have found." If Democrats "can't break through to win the Senate races in at least two of those three states — Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia — they are unlikely to control the chamber." The surveys "show Democrats leading in bids to claim hotly contested Republican-held seats in Ohio and Virginia. Republicans lead in Missouri and Tennessee, both also held by the GOP." But the Democrats "maintain a slim advantage in New Jersey, where Republicans are pressing their strongest bid in this year's campaign to gain a Democratic seat." Polls in "the other key Senate races show Democratic challengers holding consistent — though in some cases narrow — leads against GOP incumbents in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Montana. If Democrats captured those three seats, won Ohio and held New Jersey, Senate control would hinge on the outcomes in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia." The Times/Bloomberg polls "found that among likely voters:"

DOJ_NMG_0086287

- In Ohio, Democrat Sherrod Brown leads Republican Sen. Mike DeWine 47%-39%.
- In New Jersey, Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez leads Republican Tom Kean Jr. 45% to 41%.
- In Virginia, Democrat James Webb leads Republican Sen. George Allen, 47% to 44%.
- In Missouri, Republican Sen. James Talent leads Democrat Claire McCaskill, 48% to 45%.
- In Tennessee, Republican Bob Corker leads Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., 49% to 44%.

GOP Increases Funding For Missouri, Virginia Senate Races. The AP (10/25, Kuhnhenn) reports Republicans "pumped money into Missouri and Virginia Senate races this week, part of a GOP strategy to cling to their Senate majority by fending off strong Democratic challenges in Republican-leaning states." The National Republican Senatorial Committee "purchased $1.4 million of television time to air an ad that portrays Democratic candidate Jim Webb as insensitive to women. The ad is the first investment by the Republican Party in the state, reflecting concern among Republican officials that incumbent Sen. George Allen is in a closer contest than they expected." In Missouri, the Republican National Committee "spent $1.78 million on Monday on ads opposing Missouri Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill, who is running against Republican Sen. James Talent. Missouri has been a target for both parties. Democrats have poured $6.37 million into the Senate race and Republicans have spent $5.39 million."

Democratic Gains Could Result In Evenly Divided Senate. The AP (10/25, Abrams) reports, "Expected Democratic gains in the election raise the possibility that the Senate, for the second time in six years, will end up in a 50-50 tie." In that event, Democrats "would like to revive a power-sharing deal that was struck in 2001. But partisan passions on Capitol Hill are stronger now." Republicans would "officially still be the majority party in an evenly divided Senate because Vice President Dick Cheney, in his role as president of the Senate, would give the GOP a tie-breaking vote. But Democrats would surely demand a greater role in determining how the Senate treated Bush's legislative agenda in his final two years in the White House."

Impact Of Racial Issues On Tennessee Senate Race Considered. The Christian Science Monitor (10/25, Feldmann, 58K) reports that if Rep. Harold Ford Jr. wins the Tennessee Senate race, he "would be the first African-American from the South to take a Senate seat since Reconstruction - a victory that could nudge another ambitious black politician, Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois, toward running for president by showing him how to win in the South." On the other hand, after "falling behind in the polls and replacing his campaign manager late in September," Republican Bob Corker "has now settled on his final argument to the people of Tennessee: Vote for me because of my experience and my maturity and because I'm the 'real Tennessean.'" Corker, "his campaign, and national Republicans have also worked hard to drive up Ford's negatives, highlighting some of his relatives' legal troubles, a life spent mostly away from Tennessee, a career in politics, and his bachelor, designer-suit lifestyle." The "racial dimension of the Ford-Corker contest looms large. Pollsters speak of a race effect on surveys- that is, shave off a few percentage points from the black candidate's total, since some white voters tell pollsters what they think they want to hear, that they're willing to vote for a black candidate when in reality they're not." But one Tennessee Republican activist "says he believes the racial aspect will be a wash in this race: Some whites won't vote for a black man, but turnout in the black community, 16 percent of the electorate, will be higher than usual."

The Washington Post (10/25, A1, Murray, 748K) reports in a front page story that Ford "announced his Senate campaign 18 months ago with three strikes against him: He was a Democrat, he was black, and he carried family baggage. The five-term congressman was wildly popular in his Memphis House district and was viewed as a rising star in the Democratic Party. But statewide office seemed beyond reach in Tennessee, a state with a history of racially divided voting where Republicans had won recent Senate races." Corker and Ford "tangle over all the usual issues, including the war in Iraq, education and energy independence, with both candidates holding mainstream views on most topics. Yet every speech, slogan and campaign ad seems to echo with double meaning." Corker "often appears to be tiptoeing through a rhetorical minefield, eager to discredit his Democratic opponent with the sharpest weapons he can find but wary about accusations of playing racial politics." The state Democratic Party "is working particularly hard to rally black voters. State party officials believe African Americans could push Ford over the top if they turn out in large numbers."

DOJ_NMG_0086288

GOP Ad Said To Play To Racial Biases. NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 4, 2:55, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Ford could become the first African American elected to the Senate from the South since Reconstruction. But crossing that color barrier might not be easy. Watch this Republican ad for his components." GOP ad, Unidentified female: "I met Harold at the playboy party." Unidentified male: "I'd love to pay higher taxes." Unidentified male: "Canada can take care of North Korea, they're not busy." Unidentified male: "So he took money from porn movie producers. I mean, who hasn't?" Unidentified female voice: "The Republican National Committee is responsible for the content of this advertising." Unidentified male: "Harold, call me." Mitchell: "The NAACP says the ad 'plays to pre-existing prejudices about African American men and white women.' On MSNBC today the party chairman defended it." Ken Mehlman, National Republican Committee Chair: "African American folks, Hispanic folks and myself, we all looked at it, all of us are sensitive to that and we did not have that same reaction to it. So I just think there's disagreement about it." Mitchell: "Advertising experts, like Republican Jerry Della Femina, say it is a blatant racial appeal." Jerry Della Femina, advertising executive: "This is clearly an attempt to attack Harold Ford in a racist way. A blond, a Playboy bunny. It's just wrong."

Ford Says Republicans Are Desperate. Rep. Ford said on MSNBC's Hardball (10/24) that Republicans "are a little desperate and they are doing things you do when you get desperate in a campaign. We've stayed focused on Iraq and North Korea. We've tried to lay out how we can make college more affordable for these kids here, not only at UT, but at University of Tennessee at Chattanooga, the University of Memphis. Kids all across the state deserve a better chance and a more affordable option. And again, we're just working hard and pushing and pounding away. The numbers say good things. But more than that, everybody here is excited about this race for one reason. They know we can be better as a country than what we are right now."

Talent Says He Supports Bush On Some Issues, Disagrees With Him On Others. Sen. Jim Talent was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (10/24) if President Bush helps or hurts his campaign. Talent said, "It depends on what issues that you're talking about. I mean, you talk about economic growth, for example. I mean, look what the economy is doing. He's a strong supporter of renewables. There are other areas where, you know, I disagree with him and I think Missouri does. I think a classic example of that is immigration. I mean, I'm not in favor of an amnesty. I support a border fence, and he's on the other side of those issues. But, sure, there is a whole lot of issues where Missouri is strongly in support of the president."

Limbaugh Accuses Michael J. Fox Of Exaggerating His Illness In Ad. The Washington Post (10/25, C1, Montgomery, 748K) reports that radio host Rush Limbaugh yesterday accused actor Michael J. Fox of exaggerating the effects of his Parkinson's disease in a series of political ads he has done in support of candidates who favor stem cell research. Limbaugh "was reacting to Fox's appearance in another one of the spots, for Missouri Democrat Claire McCaskill, running against Republican Sen. James M. Talent." Limbaugh said, "He is exaggerating the effects of the disease," adding, "He's moving all around and shaking and it's purely an act. ... This is really shameless of Michael J. Fox. Either he didn't take his medication or he's acting." The Post adds, "Later Monday, still on the air, Limbaugh would apologize, but reaction to his statements from Parkinson's experts and Fox's supporters was swift and angry."

USA Today (10/25, Stone, 2.27M) reports that Limbaugh "told listeners Monday that Fox's lurching, palsied movements in a TV ad for Missouri Senate challenger Claire McCaskill were 'an act.' Limbaugh said that Fox, a longtime advocate for research on embryonic stem cells, has said he sometimes does not take his medication in order to illustrate Parkinson's severe physical effects. Uncontrolled shaking and stiffness are among the symptoms of the nerve disease."

DOJ_NMG_0086289

The New York Times (10/25, Stanley, 1.21M) reports, "Mr. Limbaugh later apologized for accusing Mr. Fox of exaggerating his symptoms, but said that 'Michael J. Fox is allowing his illness to be exploited and in the process is shilling for a Democrat politician.'" The Times adds, "If Mr. Fox did forgo medication for the advertisement as Mr. Limbaugh suggested, it could hardly be considered fraudulent: if anything, masking the extent of the disease's ravages is the deception, not revealing them. (A spokesman for Mr. Fox said his tremors were caused by his medication.) It was certainly the most dramatic way Mr. Fox has to personalize the issue; he used his infirmity much the way the late Christopher Reeve did when he lobbied for stem cell research to seek a cure for spinal injuries."

Talent Camp Says Fox Ad Is False. ABC World News (10/24, story 5, 2:30, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Michael J. Fox has been an impassioned advocate for years. Lobbying for embryonic stem cell research, which he argues can help people who suffer as he does from Parkinson's disease. But Fox has never injected himself so directly and so emotionally on the campaign trail and on TV until now." Michael J. Fox: "In Missouri, unfortunately Senator Jim Talent opposes expanding stem cell research. Senator Talent even wanted to criminalize the science that gives us a chance of hope." Tapper: "That's one of three TV ads so far Fox has recorded for candidates this season. This one goes after Republican Senator Jim talent of Missouri, where embryonic stem cell research is also on the ballot as a referendum. Today, the Talent campaign called the Fox ad, false. Since Senator Talent supports stem cell research that doesn't involve destroying a human embryo."

Virginia Candidates, Parties Begin Multi-Million Dollar Ad Blitz. The Washington Post (10/25, B5, Shear, Craig, 748K) reports Virginia's Senate candidates "and their national party backers will begin a final, multimillion-dollar advertising blitz Wednesday, flooding the state's airwaves with campaign commercials during the two weeks before Election Day." During the next week, "television watchers in Northern Virginia will see an average of five Virginia Senate ads a day. Together, the campaigns and the Senate party committees in Washington are spending $3.45 million over the next week in Northern Virginia." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "Voters are going to see so much stuff. If they are not numb already, they ought to shoot their brains full of Novocain." The Post adds voters "in other parts of the state will also be deluged with the commercials about" Republican Sen. George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb. But "most of the money will be flowing to Northern Virginia and its expensive media market, where a week's worth of ads for one candidate costs about $1 million. By contrast, running the same number of ads in the Roanoke media market costs about $89,000." The Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee's first ad "attacks Webb for his reaction to the Navy's Tailhook Association scandal, in which women were assaulted at a Las Vegas convention in 1991."

Clinton Jokes About Webb's Past Criticism Of Him. Al Kamen, in his Washington Post "In the Loop" column (10/25) writes former president Bill Clinton, "talking to Democratic contributors here last week, recounted how he had earlier chatted with Jim Webb, a Virginia former Republican who is running for the Senate as a Democrat. 'He said: "I can't believe you're going to campaign for me after all the terrible things I said about you,"' Clinton said. Clinton said he told Webb that 'if that was my test, I'd have no one to campaign for.'"

Kennedy States Support For Iraq War In New Ad. The AP (10/24, Condon) reported that in his new TV ad, Minnesota Senate candidate Mark Kennedy "squarely states his support" for the Iraq war, "'even though I know it may not be what you want to hear,' he tells voters." The 30-second ad "is the latest attempt by the Republican to catch Democratic frontrunner Amy Klobuchar, and may be the only ad of its kind in the country. Staring into the camera, Kennedy acknowledges that 'we've made some mistakes in Iraq' but says that 'leaving Iraq now will create a breeding ground for new attacks on America.'" The AP added, "Political observers said Tuesday they've not seen an ad like it anywhere this election cycle, with the Bush administration and Republicans on the defensive over Iraq. Just a day earlier, the White House acknowledged President Bush had dropped his familiar "stay the course" phrase in talking about the war."

Cardin Says Faith And Family Sustain Him. The Washington Post (10/25, Shaver, 748K) reports, "During 40 years in public office -- 20 in the General Assembly followed by two decades in Congress – [Maryland Democratic Senate candidate Benjamin] Cardin has woven his political life into the faith and family that he says sustain him." Cardin's faith "informs his actions in the House of Representatives, particularly a six-year membership on the ethics committee, he said." Cardin "said he remains grounded in what his father told him after his election to the General Assembly at 23. 'He said I had something people worked a lifetime for,' Cardin said, 'that I had the opportunity to make a difference and that I should think about that. ... I think about that frequently, and it affects everything I do in life.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086290

WTimes Endorses Steele. In an editorial, the Washington Times (10/25, 88K) endorses Republican Michael Steele in the Maryland US Senate race, noting that he is "anything but a conventional politician." Steele's "openness to new ideas offers a refreshing contrast from the sort of orthodox liberalism represented by Mr. Cardin. And Mr. Steele, the first black candidate elected statewide in Maryland in modern times, offers a compelling personal success story that is in many ways the embodiment of the American Dream." The Times adds that Steele "is a nontraditional candidate who has brought a different style of campaigning to an old-school blue state, and there are no gray areas when he stands on issues. The Washington Times is pleased to endorse Michael Steele for the US Senate."

Report Warns Of Potential Voting Problems In 10 States. The Washington Post (10/25, A3, Goldstein, 748K) reports that a study released yesterday by a nonpartisan clearinghouse that tracks electoral reforms across the US warns that at least 10 states are ripe for voting problems in this year's election. The report by Electionline.org "says those states, and possibly others, could encounter trouble on Election Day because they have a combustible mix of fledgling voting-machine technology, confusion over voting procedures or recent litigation over election rules -- and close races. The report cautions that the Nov. 7 elections, which will determine which political party controls the House and Senate, promise 'to bring more of what voters have come to expect since the 2000 elections -- a divided body politic, an election system in flux and the possibility -- if not certainty -- of problems at polls nationwide.'"

GOP Lobbying Firms Not Clamoring To Hire Democrats As Election Nears. The Hill (10/25, Tiron, Young) reports that while seasoned Democrats are in high demand as lobbying shops gear up for a possible Democratic take over of Congress, "some top all-Republican firms are not clamoring to hire them. Despite a growing sense of urgency in recent months to bring well-positioned Democrats to lobby shops, company government-relations offices and trade associations, several all-GOP and GOP-leaning lobby firms said that they are doing nothing to prepare for a change of congressional power." The Hill adds that "some firms that have few or no ties to Democratic lawmakers can expect to continue to flourish, particularly if they have close relationships to Republican committee leaders, as opposed to the leaders of the chambers," a Republican lobbyist said.

WPost Endorses Ehrlich For Reelection. The Washington Post (10/25, A16, 748K) endorses Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich for reelection in an editorial this morning. The Post says Ehrlich "has grown in the role to become a generally proficient, pragmatic governor, if not always a disciplined or mature one." The Post adds, "Mr. Ehrlich, for all his faults, has shaken up the old guard in Maryland politics -- while appointing plenty of Democrats to his cabinet and judgeships. If he were wise, he would use a second term to start anew with the legislature and build on his record of achievement."

Anti-Deval Ad May Have Backfired On Healey In Massachusetts. ABC World News (10/24, story 6, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Massachusetts will either have its first elected female governor or its first African-American governor. The race in the final days, like so many races around the country, is getting very rough." ABC (Berman) added that in the contest between Republican Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey and Democrat Deval Patrick, "his race and her gender don't seem to matter in this election." Frank Phillips, State House Bureau chief, Boston Globe: "It's not an issue in the campaign for governor here that Deval Patrick is an African-American. It's not an issue that Kerry Healy is a woman." Berman: "What are the issues? Both candidates are talking about jobs and education. But lately." Patrick: "They have thrown at us, everything but the kitchen sink. And I expect the kitchen sink any day now." Healey: "Deval Patrick says..." Berman: "Lately it seems that candidates are spending most of the time talking about each other. Patrick is tying Healey to an unpopular Republican governor. And Healey is running an ad on letters that Patrick wrote about a convicted rapist." But there "are signs it might be backfiring." A new poll "shows Patrick opening up a 27-point lead. More than double the lead he had just a few weeks ago. And the majority of the people on the poll, say they are turned off by the tone of Kerry Healey's campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0086291

Survey Finds US Muslims Likely To Back Democrats. The Washington Times (10/25, Duin, 88K) reports America's Muslim voters "are a young, highly educated and prosperous voting bloc that will overwhelmingly back Democrats in November, according to a survey released yesterday by the Council on American-Islamic Relations." They are "also coming of age in terms of political representation. Next month, Democratic nominee Keith Ellison of Minneapolis is poised to become the first Muslim member of the House of Representatives. He says, if elected, he will take his oath of office with his hand on the Koran instead of the Bible." With their "large families and socially conservative leanings, Muslims mirror the GOP's demographic profile. Seventy-eight percent of those interviewed were married. Of those respondents, 83 percent had at least one child and 54 percent reported two or three children. Muslims had an average of 4.5 members per family, contrasted with a 2005 Census Bureau figure estimating the number of family members in an average American household at 3.14." But ideologically, "their differences with Republicans are vast. Sixty-six percent favor normalization of relations with Iran, 55 percent are afraid the 'war on terror' has morphed into a war on Islam, just 12 percent think the war in Iraq is worthwhile and only 10 percent support the use of the military to spread democracy."

Cheney Says Clinton Would Be A "Formidable" Presidential Candidate. Vice President Dick Cheney said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/24) that Sen. Hillary Clinton would be a "formidable" presidential candidate. Asked if she can win, Cheney said, "I think she could win. I hope she doesn't. I disagree with her on nearly all the issues, but nobody should underestimate her. She's a very serious candidate for President."

The AP (10/24) reported that Cheney "handicapped the Democratic field of potential candidates in an interview with conservative talk show host Sean Hannity." In addition to his comments on Clinton, Cheney said Sen. Barrack Obama "was an 'attractive guy. Don't know him well, met him a few times. I think at this stage, my initial take on him was he's been two years as a senator. I think people might want a little more experience than that, given the nature of the times we live in. But certainly, he's an attractive candidate." USA Today (10/25, 2.27M) carries the AP story this morning.

The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Gerstenzang, 918K) reports that Cheney said if Obama runs, "he'll be a player on the Democratic side."

Hollywood Democrats Ponder An Obama Presidential Bid. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Daunt, 918K) reports, "Just the hint of a possible presidential run by US Sen. Barack Obama ...has Hollywood Democrats talking." While Obama is "pondering his options, you can bet that some people in Hollywood are already envisioning his inaugural bash. Director Rob Reiner compared a possible run by Obama to Abraham Lincoln's victory." The Times adds, "Almost anyone who has met Obama will tell you that he's charismatic and warm, but not giddy. … But there's no denying that since he rocked the Democratic National Convention in 2004 with an impassioned speech about America, his life has changed. For one, he became an instant political star." Obama "says he appreciates the supports he's been shown by Hollywood Democrats. … 'There are some celebrities who have really done their homework and know what they are talking about and are terrific advocates for justice and peace and opportunity around the world,' he said. 'I want all citizens to get involved. Whether they are the secretary in an office building or a movie star, I think the more engaged and interested people are, the better off we all are.'"

Cheney Says He Will Not Run For President In 2008. Cheney was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/24) if anyone has approached him about running for president in 2008. Cheney said, "I've made it very clear that I'm not a candidate, won't be a candidate." Cheney added, "I'm not coy about it. I made my decision a long time ago, and it's firm, final, fixed, irrevocable. I don't know how else I can say it. If nominated, I will not run; if elected, I will not serve."

Cook Called Most "Prominent" Political Forecaster. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (10/25, A2), Dana Milbank says political analyst Charles Cook , "for a fee of $5,000 to $20,000, gives his audiences the (very) early returns." Last week "he spoke to pharmaceutical and insurance groups. On Monday, he flew to Las Vegas and back to talk to the American Beverage Association. Later this week it's American Express and a hedge fund in New York and the paper industry in Georgia. Yesterday found Cook at a breakfast with the DLA Piper law firm, lunch with automobile manufacturers and dinner in Boston with a corporate housing group." All are "looking for the same thing: next month's election returns. And Cook has them. 'Senators Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio are pretty much done,' he told the Piper audience at the Willard hotel. And the lifelines of Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) aren't looking any longer." Milbank says Cook is "not the boldest of election prognosticators (that honor goes to Stuart Rothenberg), nor the most telegenic (washingtonpost.com's Chris Cillizza gets the nod there), but he is surely the most prominent."

DOJ_NMG_0086292

College Tuition Rising Faster Than Inflation. ABC World News (10/24, story 7, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that a new study from the College Board has found "tuition increases at the nation's colleges slowed this year. But still rose faster than inflation. Average tuition and fees at public colleges increased more than 6% to more than $5,800 a year. And the average cost of attending a private college rose 5.9% to more than $22,000."

The CBS Evening News (10/24, story 5, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Now, here's a warning for parents. College costs are still rising faster than the overall inflation rate, which ran about 2% in the fast year. Tuition fees at public colleges are up more 6% from last year, now averaging nearly $6,000 a year. At private four-year college tuition has increased by nearly 6% to $22,000 a year."

The New York Times (10/25, Glater, 1.21M) reports that the report also found that "in the past five years, tuition and fees at public institutions rose more than at any other time in the past 30, increasing by 35 percent to $5,836 this academic year. Tuition and fees at private four-year colleges increased by 11 percent over the same period, though the average price of attending a private institution is $22,218." Education Secretary Margaret Spellings "said in a statement that the report 'underscores the need to make colleges and universities more accountable for results and at the same time increase need-based aid.'"

The Washington Post (10/25, A4, Matthews, 748K) notes that while costs are rising, "tuition and fees are not rising as fast as they did a few years ago. The College Board said the increase in tuition and fees at public four-year colleges, although still higher than the national inflation rate, slowed for the third year in a row. Increases at private four-year colleges have also cooled off in recent years, although the average yearly price of attending a private college is $22,218, far more than the state school average of $5,836."

The Wall Street Journal (10/25, B1, Tomsho, 2.03M) reports, "The number of students from all income levels pursuing post-secondary education continues to grow. But to stay in school, educators say, low-income students are taking loans, using high-interest credit cards to pay tuition, working more hours, and opting for two-year schools. Low-income students are choosing two-year colleges for financial reasons even though studies show more of them are academically qualified for four-year schools due to efforts by school districts to push them into tougher, college-prep courses. But only 23% of community college students earn a bachelor's degree -- a vital credential in today's workplace -- within six years, as compared with 63% of students at four-year institutions, according to the College Board."

Meanwhile, USA Today (10/25, Marklein, 2.27M) reports that "federal Pell Grant funding for low-income students declined for the first time in six years, and students borrowed more from private lenders last year than ever before." The report from the College Board "notes that financial aid averages conceal the wide range of aid awards; some students get a full ride, others pay the full amount. And federal tax benefits and a trend toward non-need-based state and institutional aid benefit middle- and upper-income students more than lower-income students, it says."

Former Morgan Stanley VP Praises Spitzer As "Good For Business." Donald Kempf Jr., retired executive vice president and chief legal officer of Morgan Stanley, writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M), reassuring that presumptive Gov. Eliot Spitzer will be "good for business" in the state and disagreeing with critics who say he overreached on federal securities law as attorney general. In his experience, Kempf says Spitzer came across as "smart," "self-reliant," and a "catalyst for constructive change." He "often had a better grasp of the underlying facts, legal implications and policy considerations than many from the federal regulatory agencies," Kempf says. In addition, Spitzer is different from other public servants and regulatory agencies because he "does not welsh on deals" and is "willing to engage where others at times seek to hide behind their status." Before stating that his "heroes" include Ronald Regan and George Herbert Walker Bush, Kempf lays outs Spitzer's "comprehensive strategy" for businesses in the state and is confident Spitzer will "pull much of it off" because "it spells a healthy and positive business climate."

DOJ_NMG_0086293

Rice Defends "Axis Of Evil" Concept. The AP (10/25, Gearan) reports comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that "recent events in Iran and North Korea support President Bush's 2002 claim that those nations were part of an 'axis of evil.'" When asked if Bush offered "a pretty good analysis" of Iran, Iraq and North Korea, Rice said, "It really was." She is further quoted saying, "The president three years ago realized that in order to manage the North Korean nuclear problem, a problem that's been going for decades, we have to have a regional coalition. This isn't something the United States was going to be able to do alone." The AP continues, "Proof of the strategy's success came when China voted this month to impose sanctions on its neighbor and ally North Korea, she said."

In related reporting, the Financial Times (10/25, Dinmore, Dombey) notes comments by UN Ambassador John Bolton that "imposing economic and political sanctions against Iran and North Korea will help democratic forces in those countries as Washington pursues its 'ultimate objective' of regime change." Those remarks "reflect the views of hardliners in the Bush administration who doubt that the threat of nuclear proliferation can be dealt with through negotiations." The Times says Bolton's "linking of sanctions with 'democratic forces' are likely to complicate delicate coalition-building efforts by" Rice.

Western Allies Move Ahead With Limited Iran Sanctions Plan. CNN's The Situation Room (10/24, Verjee) reported, "A new proposal may be in the works to sanction Iran for its disputed nuclear program. The US, Britain and France purportedly plan to urge the UN Security Council to ban the sale of missile and nuclear to Tehran. Diplomats say the draft resolution is essentially aimed at winning the backing of Russia and China. Iran has said imposing sanctions will backfire."

The AP (10/25, Jahn) reports Washington "and its allies want the [UNSC] to ban the sale of missile and atomic technology to Iran and end most U.N. help for its nuclear programs — moves diplomats said Tuesday are narrowly focused in hopes of winning Russian and Chinese backing for sanctions." AP sources "said the proposal also would commit U.N. member nations to denying entry to Iranian officials involved in developing missiles or nuclear systems," and likened some of the provisions under consideration to UNSCR 1718. "One of the diplomats described all three measures aimed at Iran as moderate in impact, saying that was an attempt to win Russian and Chinese support. Moscow and Beijing could be formally presented with the draft later this week, the diplomat said." The AP adds, "Canceling technical assistance to Iran from the [IAEA] would do little to ease [uranium enrichment] fears. But as the first such withdrawal of IAEA help, it would send a strong signal of international displeasure with Tehran."

Beijing Says Kim Didn't Apologize, But Isn't Planning Second Nuclear Test. The Financial Times (10/25, McGregor, Fifield) reports Beijing "said on Tuesday North Korea had no immediate plans to conduct a second nuclear test, damping speculation of another blast following the imposition of [United Nations Security Council Resolution 1718] on the reclusive state. However, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesman suggested that Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, had warned in a meeting with a senior Chinese politician last week that Pyongyang could test another bomb if the pressure on it was not eased." Experts' "fears" last week of a second test "failed to materialise and many analysts think Pyongyang will try to drag out the crisis for as long as possible." The Times says, however, that "because the first test was considered a technical failure – the small size of the blast suggested the weapon had not fully detonated – it was likely that North Korea would want to try to iron out the problems then eventually test again, analysts said."

In lengthy reporting on the Chinese diplomatic mission to Pyongyang, the AP (10/25, Olesen) adds Beijing "gave its first full public account Tuesday of its mission to North Korea, saying it got no apology from top leader Kim Jong Il for the atomic explosion but did receive assurances there were no plans for a second nuclear test." Kim "also expressed a willingness to return to six-nation talks over its nuclear program if financial restrictions levied by the U.S. are first resolved, said Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao." Talks in Pyongyang "resulted in no breakthroughs, but China cast the discussions in a positive light."

AFP (10/25) reports remarks by Assistant Secretary of State Chris Hill that Washington and Beijing "'have never been closer' in the wake of North Korea's nuclear test earlier this month." Hill said of Secretary Rice's Asia trip, "In China we felt we were speaking with one voice on this issue. At no time have we felt closer together than we have felt in the wake of these North Korean provocations. … It always used to be that the Chinese would ask for more patience and we'd ask the Chinese for less patience but I think today we are really working better together."

DOJ_NMG_0086294

Rice Backs Asian Security Organization, Will Elaborate On Plan Today. The Washington Times (10/25, Kralev, 88K) notes Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "is urging Asian nations to form a regional security organization to address common threats, suggesting that the six-nation forum dealing with North Korea -- which includes China and Russia -- could be a useful starting point." The Times says Rice believes that forum "would not come even close to NATO's integrated political and military structures, but it would assure more effective responses to crises such as Pyongyang's recent nuclear test." Rice is quoted saying earlier, "There are highly developed security arrangements all throughout Europe -- as a matter of fact, some people think too many. I don't think this region is probably going to develop an organizational structure anything like what you have in Europe." A State Department official "said the secretary will elaborate on the concept during a speech at the Heritage Foundation in Washington today." Regarding North Korea's candidacy for such a grouping, one "official familiar with interagency talks on the issue said membership could be held out as a reward to Pyongyang if it dismantles its nuclear program." The Times adds, "Analysts generally agree that a regional security organization in Asia is necessary, and point to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation as a model." However, "several diplomats and analysts expressed doubts that China in particular would sign on to a security arrangement that institutionalizes the dominance of the United States in the Asia-Pacific region."

Japanese Anger Could Hurt North Korean Expats. The AP (10/25, Greimel) reports, "Harassment of Japan's insular North Korean community, the biggest outside the homeland or China, dates back decades. But animosity has flared to new levels since North Korea stunned the world with its nuclear test." A recent arson attempt against the headquarters of Chongryon, an organization of North Korean expatriates, "was one of several outbursts putting people on edge. … North Koreans in Japan have long been vilified as a communist fifth column, but with Tokyo leading a worldwide campaign to sanction Pyongyang for its nuclear test, they now stand in an unwanted spotlight." The AP says that every one of the 600,000 "Koreans in Japan face discrimination in Japan. All Koreans were stripped of their Japanese citizenship after World War II and those in Japan found themselves in a society that often looked down on them as former colonial subjects. Yet given the long-standing animosity between Tokyo and Pyongyang, North Koreans face especially limited economic opportunities, confined to tight-knit community-run businesses." Economic sanctions imposed by Japan on North Korea "will dig deep into North Korean businesses that rely on importing manufactured goods like cheap men's suits, marine and agriculture products, like clams and mushrooms, and raw materials such as coal."

Joint Chiefs Chairman Says US Victory Over North Korea Would Be Costly. The AP (10/25, Burns) carries remarks by Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace that the "U.S. military would prevail in a war against North Korea but at a greater cost in lives than if the United States were not already fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan." He is quoted saying, "It would not be as clean as we would like it to be, but it would certainly be sure, and the outcome would not be in doubt." Pace "told a Pentagon news conference that the U.S. military has plenty of people available to fight wars beyond Iraq and Afghanistan, but he acknowledged that U.S.-based ground combat units are not fully equipped." Pace "said U.S. intelligence can determine the size of the North Korean military but it cannot provide an equally important piece of information in assessing the threat of war: the intent of North Korea's leaders."

South Korean Public Opposes Confrontation, Rejection Of North. A 1,164-word piece in the New York Times (10/25, Fackler, 1.21M) details solidifying South Korean attitudes towards engagement with North Korea. "Once fervently anti-Communist, South Korea has slowly parted ways with the United States, its largest ally and wartime protector, on how to deal with the North. Across age groups and political persuasions, most South Koreans now appear to believe that their nation has no choice but to keep building ties with the North, despite the widespread shock and anger here over its nuclear test." The Times says that "bedrock of public sentiment" explains the differences in tone between Washington and Seoul, which "has been reluctant to tighten the economic screws on the North, hoping instead to entice it to the bargaining table with increased links with the outside world." South Korea's "softer approach is a result of a deeper evolution in public perception [there] since the end of the cold war and South Korea's subsequent emergence as an Asian economic powerhouse." Recent opinion polling suggests

DOJ_NMG_0086295

"that while the claimed nuclear detonation hardened attitudes toward the North, a majority of South Koreans still oppose outright confrontation." The Times adds, "Political analysts say a big factor behind the desire to maintain economic ties is a deep ambivalence in South Korean views of the North. While the two Koreas still face each other across the minefields and barbed wire of the demilitarized zone, many South Koreans have come to see the North as nothing more than a destitute, misguided relative."

Israel Ponders Preemptive Gaza Strike On Hamas Weapons Stockpiles. The Washington Times (10/25, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "Applying a lesson from the recent war against Hezbollah, Israeli leaders are increasingly talking about staging a pre-emptive military offensive in the Gaza Strip in order to avert a Hamas buildup of improved missiles." Some Israeli "politicians say a broader operation against Hamas is necessary if Israel wants to deny it the ability to stockpile weapons like the Shi'ite militia Hezbollah, which was able to build up its arsenal during six years of relative calm." While Israeli military forces "have uncovered more than a dozen smuggling tunnels used to sneak weapons, money and contraband into Gaza from Egypt," some "intelligence officials say they think that Syria and Iran are supplying Hamas with the advanced anti-tank missiles that turned armored vehicles like the Merkava tank into a sitting ducks, according to local press reports." Defense Minister Amir Peretz "has said that Israel cannot allow Gaza to become another Lebanon. At the same time Mr. Peretz, the chairman of coalition partner Labor party, said that Israel has no desire to reconquer the Gaza Strip permanently."

AP Photographer Released In Gaza. The AP (10/25, Laub) reports AP photographer Emilio Morenatti "was freed unharmed Tuesday after a harrowing day in the hands of Palestinians who abducted him at gunpoint and dressed him in women's clothes to spirit him from one secret location to another." Fatah Party officials brought him to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' office late yesterday. "It was not clear who kidnapped him, though officials said he was taken by criminals. The government and main Palestinian groups denounced the abduction. Morenatti, a 37-year-old Spaniard, looked fatigued after his daylong ordeal but said he was unharmed."

NYTimes Pans Olmert's Coalition Choice. In an editorial today, the New York Times (10/25, 1.21M) says Israeli Prime Minister "Ehud Olmert "has chosen to make an unwise and damaging trade-off. Bringing the pro-settler Israel Beiteinu party into his governing coalition reinforces his vulnerable parliamentary majority. But it makes it virtually impossible for Mr. Olmert to carry out the partial West Bank withdrawal program he ran on just seven months ago." The possibility of a "new momentum toward" a peace settlement "now seems less likely than ever." Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' attempts "to bring Hamas around have not gotten as much support as they should from Israel. With Israel Beiteinu joining Mr. Olmert's coalition, they are likely to get even less." The Times concludes, "Creating new obstacles to peace with the Palestinians is the last thing Israel needs after the Lebanon fiasco."

Israeli Official Says Iran And Syria Are Rearming Hezbollah. A Washington Times (10/25, Sands, 88K) interview reports comments by Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shaul Mofaz that "Iran and Syria are rapidly rearming Hezbollah guerrillas in southern Lebanon as an international peacekeeping force has failed to carry out a U.N. mandate to disarm the Shi'ite militia group." Mofaz "also warned that time was growing short for the international community to implement effective sanctions to halt Iran's drive for nuclear weapons." He "said Israel's 34-day war with Hezbollah fighters this summer had dealt the Shi'ite militia a major setback in its southern Lebanese base. But he expressed frustration that the Lebanese army and an enhanced U.N. peacekeeping force had not disarmed Hezbollah or sealed the border to prevent Syria and Iran from rearming their 'proxy.'" Despite Olmert's criticisms of Iran's nuclear program, Mofaz "put greater stress on multilateral efforts to pressure Iran, calling for strong sanctions against Tehran if it refuses to cooperate. .. The North Korea nuclear test earlier this month has heightened the need for a tough stand against Iran, Mr. Mofaz said." The Times adds, "The hawkish Mr. Mofaz is the transportation minister under the unity government headed by [Olmert], but he remains a major voice on defense and security issues in Israel."

Pentagon Officials Enter Plea On Arms Deals. The AP (10/25, Apuzzo) reports that Ronald W. Wiseman, a former official the Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service, the Pentagon agency that sells excess military equipment, "was sentenced to 18 months in prison" for "selling military equipment in the Middle East and pocketing hundreds of thousands of dollars." He "and a Saudi Arabian auctioneer agreed to sell some equipment off the books and share in the profits." While "most of the equipment was unneeded and scheduled for auction," some Humvees "were still weaponized and were not supposed to have been sold." Wiseman previously pleaded guilty "and agreed to cooperate in a federal investigation. A second U.S. official, Gayden C. Woodson of North Ogden, Utah, pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiracy to steal government property." Woodson, he joined Wiseman's conspiracy in January 2001 "and continued it after Wiseman left the Middle East the following year."

DOJ_NMG_0086296

Chavez Continues Security Council Candidacy, Denies He's Backing Bolivia. The AP (10/25) reports Bolivian President Evo Morales "said Tuesday that Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez would throw his support behind the Andean country if Venezuela is unable to win enough votes to defeat U.S.-backed Guatemala for a" rotating UNSC seat." Morales "said he had spoken by phone with Mr. Chavez on Monday, who told him that if Venezuela does not get the two-thirds majority it needs to win, he will 'propose Bolivia as a candidate.'" While Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro "said [his nation] would continue its drive for" seat, "a 36th round of voting is scheduled to be held [today], and some countries in the region -- from Brazil to Guyana -- expressed hope of seeking an alternate candidate. Other possibilities mentioned by diplomats included Chile and Uruguay." The Washington Post (10/25, A18, 748K) focuses its coverage on Caracas' plan to continue its candidacy, saying Venezuelan leaders "denied Bolivian President Evo Morales's claim that Venezuela had decided to withdraw from the competition…and would instead nominate his country as a candidate."

Under the headline, "Venezuela Diatribe Backfires," the New York Times (10/25, Hoge, 1.21M) says of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's speech last month to the UN General Assembly, "Now it appears that [his] histrionic performance -- styled to win him support from the United States' many detractors at the United Nations — may have cost his country the seat on the Security Council that he has conducted a global campaign to win." While "developing nations make up a vast majority of the 192 countries in the General Assembly and generally warm to rants against Washington," most "also value the United Nations as a place where their voices can be heard in a dignified setting, and both supporters and detractors here say Mr. Chávez may have miscalculated in turning it into his bully pulpit." The Times says "Venezuela's candidacy is already considered finished," and those "poor results came as a surprise," with many analysts noting "Mr. Chávez's performance as the cause." Also, "the unseemly process is embarrassing to Latin diplomats who acknowledge that the 33-nation Latin American and Caribbean group at the United Nations has often shown disunity, while the 53-nation African group and the 54-country Asian group yearly produce candidates without dispute."

Korologos Expected To Resign As Ambassador To Belgium. Al Kamen, in his Washington Post "In the Loop" column (10/25) writes "famed Washington lobbyist" Tom Korologos "is said to be leaving his fine posting as ambassador to Belgium early next year. Korologos, 73, often known as the 101st senator, helped out in Iraq in 2003. Word is the White House has tapped wealthy St. Louis developer Sam Fox, 77, to replace Korologos. Fox, a major GOP fundraiser, is national chairman of the Jewish Republican Coalition."

Study Says Most Automakers Falling Short Of Europe's CO2 Emissions Targets. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A8, Echikson, 2.03M) reports, "About three-quarters of auto makers are failing to improve fuel efficiency to meet Europe's voluntary targets to cut carbon-dioxide emissions, according to an environmental group's study." The group "produced the study to heat up a debate over whether the European Commission should impose mandatory emissions cuts for automobiles. The federation backs mandatory controls, while the commission has set only voluntary targets." The Journal adds, "Any effort to impose new rules on the auto industry is likely to meet resistance from individual governments. The European Parliament's environment committee voted last month to delay compliance with CO2 standards to 2011 from 2008, saying auto makers needed the time to develop technologies."

Vietnamese Economy Attracts Investment. The New York Times (10/25, Bradsher, 1.21M) reports, "In the three decades since Vietnam has gone from communism to a form of capitalism, it has begun surpassing many neighbors. It has Asia's second-fastest-growing economy, with 8.4 percent growth last year, trailing only China's, and the pace of exports to the United States is rising faster than even China's." It is a "sign of Vietnam's economic vitality" that it has nearly completed the WTO accession process. "The latest Asian economic tiger, Vietnam now produces and uses more cement than France, its former colonial ruler. The main index for the Ho Chi Minh City stock market and a smaller exchange in Hanoi have nearly doubled in value this year. Vietnam has become the talk of investment bankers and investors across Asia." In "some ways, Vietnam is more pro-business than China." The Times also reports that "Republicans in Congress are divided over" permanent normal trade relations, and "corporate America is divided, too, over a Bush administration initiative to win votes for full trade status by throwing a bone late in September to Southern senators representing states where textiles are made."

DOJ_NMG_0086297

Book Argues Mercenaries Could End Abuses In Darfur. In his column in the Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M), Max Boot says mercenary "outfits have grown in importance as the armed forces of the U.S. and other countries downsized after the end of the Cold War. Today, from Afghanistan to Iraq, much of the logistical support for American troops is provided by Halliburton subsidiary KBR." Noting that "hired hands" work in Iraq "to safeguard supply convoys, buildings and VIPs," Boot says, "Among foreign troop contingents, they are second in number – and in casualties – only to the U.S. military." Mercenaries "can actually perform valuable work that we won't send our own troops to do," including, Book suggests, defending civilian populations in Darfur. Citing cases of mercenary units creating the conditions for peace, Boot adds, "Hired guns could be equally effective in stopping the campaign of rape, murder and ethnic cleansing carried out by the Sudanese government and the janjaweed militia in Darfur." He concludes, "Sending mercenaries to Africa isn't politically correct. But it would be a lot more useful than sending more aid money that will be wasted or passing ineffectual resolutions that will be ignored."

Friedman Say Energy Struggle Reviving Cold War Tensions In Europe. In his column in the New York Times (10/25, 1.21M), Tom Friedman "posits that the price of oil and the pace of freedom operate in an inverse relationship in petrolist states — states with weak institutions and a high dependence on oil for their G.D.P. As the price of oil goes down, the pace of freedom goes up." He says "a black tide of petro-authoritarianism [is] emanating from Russia, and it is blunting the Berlin Wall tide of free markets and free people." Russia under President Vladimir Putin "has gone from the sick man of Europe to the boss man." EU and Russian "energy interests" are "in a standoff," and Friedman says "turnabout is fair play," with Russia "now using petro-power to push back." He concludes, "Centuries of uneasy relations between Europe and Russia make German officials queasy about how dependent they've grown on the Kremlin to heat their homes and offices. Queasy or not, one thing they know for sure: Russia is back. The gas man cometh."

WPost Says Europeans Not Bridging Gap With Muslim Community. Noting the one year anniversary of the suburban Paris riots, a Washington Post (10/25, A16, 748K) editorial says the "alienation" felt by Muslims "appears to have worsened, not only in France but across Western Europe. … Europeans are slowly growing more aware that a major part of the global struggle against Islamic extremism must take place in their own countries -- and not just in faraway Afghanistan or Iraq." However, European elites still appear to be a long way from coming to grips with the challenge. Rather than seeking to address the larger alienation of mainstream Muslims, European leaders often appear to do the opposite -- by challenging the culture of Muslims and defending gratuitous insults of Islam." The Post pans British Commons Leader Jack Straw's recent comments about veiled Muslim women, and says "veils -- which are also under government attack in France and Italy -- are not the cause of [self-] segregation, much less of terrorism. Attacks on Muslim custom by public officials are more likely to reinforce than to ease the community's alienation." Politicians should focus "on those who actually foment intolerance among European Muslims -- as well as those in the mainstream community who promote prejudice against Arabs and South Asians and their descendants." The Post concludes, "Politicians would do better to work on dismantling the barriers Muslims face in getting educations and jobs rather than those that distinguish Islam from the secular majority."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Democrats' Senate Hopes Lie With Rural Voters, Poll Finds."

DOJ_NMG_0086298

"War On West Shifts Back To Afghanistan."
"Army Is Training Advisors For Iraq."
"Making Sabbath A Day At The Beach."
"Governor Is Blunt To Bush."

USA Today:

"By The Numbers."
"Single-Sex School Restrictions Ease."
"When A Heart Attack Goes Undiagnosed."
"No Major Troop Cut In Iraq For A Year."
"Projections."

New York Times:

"General Weighs 2nd Troop Shift To Calm Baghdad."
"Idle Contractors Add Millions To Iraq Rebuilding."
"To Lower Costs, Hospitals Try Free Basic Care For Uninsured."
"Federal Rules Back Single-Sex Public Education."
"Pieces Of Art Collection Were Someone Else's."
"Vietnam's Roaring Economy Is Set For World Stage."

Washington Post:

"More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound."
"The GOP Leans On A Proven Strategy."
"A Sense Of Service."
"A Contentious Campaign In A Battleground State."
"DNA Testing a Mixed Bag for Immigrants."
"FBI's Fairfax Agents Packing For Pr. William."
"Failing Schools Are Fighting Back."

Washington Times:

"Democrats Won't Count Votes Before They're Cast."
"Iraqi Takeover target Set."
"National Medicaid Transport Probed."
"Virginia Battle On Same-Sex 'Marriage' Down To Wire."
"Rice Proposes Asia Form Security Alliance."
"Tracking device Places Parents In Driver's Seat."

Detroit Free Press:

"Tigers Must Start Hitting-Or Else."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Potty Talk Ends Shock jock Era In Atlanta."
"Schools Move To Gender Divide."
"Titanic Relics Emerge From Secret Warehouse."
Who'll Pay For Civil Rights Museum."
"Perdue Tax Break Spotlights Legislator."

Houston Chronicle:

"State Tuition Surpasses U.S. Average."
"If These Walls Could Sing."
"Will Skilling Get Prison Of Choice."
"Us May Boost Troop Level In Baghdad."
"Worker For All Jobs And All Seasons."
"Friedman Feels Sting OF Political Attacks."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Iraq Timeline-Changing Course; Iraq War Analysis; Kidnapped Soldier-Iraq; Bush Hits Campaign Trail; Michael J. Fox AD- Anti Stem Cell Research; Massachusetts Governors Race; College Tuition Increase; Heart Attack Risk; Tropical Storm Paul; Light Hurricane Season; Stock Market.
CBS: Iraq Timeline-Changing Course; Iraq war Analysis; Iraq War Analysis; Foley Investigation; College Tuition Increase; Genetic Medicine-Medical Breakthrough; Campaign 2006-Microtargeting; Arianna Huffington Opinion-UN Sanctions; Stock Market; Dead Celebrities; Kenny Rodgers & Baseball.
NBC: : Iraq Timeline Changing Course; Iraq War Analysis; Foley Investigation; Campaign 2006; Stock Market; Flu Shots; Separate Education; Housing Market; Fashion Goes illegal.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

CBS: Casey-US Troop Levels In Iraq; Hastert-Ethics Committee Testimony; Study-Health Care Costs; Study-Effects Of Flu Shots On Children; World Series.
NPR: Casey-Us Troop Levels In Iraq; Hastert-Ethics Committee Testimony; Nm-Los Alamos Documents Found; Ethiopia-Somalia Conflict; La-Offshore Drilling; Paulson-Us Economy's Health; World Series.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with President Leonel Fernandez of the Dominician Republic, Oval Office, pool at bottom.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Addresses Cincinnati USA Regional Chamber, The Phoenix, Cincinnati.

LAURA BUSH —Delivers remarks at a Michele Bachmann for Congress and Republican Party of Minnesota breakfast, Minneapolis Marriott Southwest, 5801 Opus Parkway, Minnetonka, Minn., open press; delivers remarks at a Minnesota Victory 2006 Rally, Mayo Civic Center, Rochester, Minn., open press; delivers remarks at Indiana Victory 2006 Rally, Bartholomew County 4-H Fairgrounds, Columbus, Ind., open press.

DOJ_NMG_0086299

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: MILITARY COMMUNICATIONS _ Milcom 2006, the Military Communications Conference, will be held. Theme: ``Networking the Warfighter.'' The conference will include classified and unclassified sessions, discussion panels, and tutorials, focused on advanced technology in military communications. Highlights: 12 p.m. Lunch with Gordon England, Deputy Secretary of Defense. Location: Wardman Park Marriott, 2660 Woodley Road, NW, and Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert Street NW. The classified program will take place in the Ronald Reagan International Trade Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US-CHINA _ Five-day meeting of the US-China Economic and Security Review Commission. Location: Hall of the States, 444 N. Capitol St.

BEST COLLEGES _ 9:30 a.m. Education Sector holds discussion on American colleges and universities and whether they're really ``the best.'' Participants include Paul Glastris, Editor-in-Chief, The Washington Monthly; David Dunn, Chief of Staff to the U.S. Secretary of Education; Brian Kelly, Executive Editor, U.S. News & World Report; Patricia McGuire, President, Trinity University; and Kevin Carey, Education Sector. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW., Capitol Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

GENETIC DATABANKS _ 9:30 a.m. The American Civil Liberties Union holds a panel discussion on the expansion of forensic DNA databases and their implications for civil liberties and criminal justice, with Barry Scheck of the Innocence Project, Helen Thompson of Genewatch UK, William Thompson of UC, Irvine, Tania Simoncelli, science adviser to the ACLU. Location: Room 2226, Rayburn.

AMTRAK _ 10 a.m. Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., joins D. Hamilton Peterson, Deputy Counsel - Director of Special Investigations, Office of Inspector General, National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak) for a press conference to release a report on an investigation of Amtrak Contracts With Private Law Offices. The Inspector General's report outlines what it says are serious problems, lack of oversight and excessive charges In awarding millions of dollars In legal contracts. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn House Office Building.

DROPOUT RATE _ 10 a.m. Pew Partnership for Civic Change holds briefing and discussion on ``Why the Dropout Rate Goes Beyond the Schools.'' With Alma Powell, Pew Advisory Board; and representatives from the Joint Center for Political Studies; National Governors Association; National Association of Manufacturers; others. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

GAYS-MARRIAGE AMENDMENTS _ 10 a.m. The National Press Club and the National Lesbian and Gay Journalists Association sponsors a newsmaker media briefing, ``The Gay Factor: How Marriage Amendments and the Foley Fallout will Affect the Election.'' Location: National Press Club.

ZOGBY POLL _ 10 a.m. Arab American Institute releases Zogby Battleground Poll of Arab-American Voters in Florida, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

IRAQ-PROTEST _ 11:30 a.m. There will be telephone news conference on Active-Duty troops launching a campaign to press Congress to end U.S. Occupation of Iraq, with 65 members -- including two who served in Iraq -- sending ``Appeals for Redress under the Military Whistle-blower Protection Act. Contacts: Trevor Fitzgibbon, 202-246-5303. Notes: To participate, call 800-362-0574; password ``Active-Duty.

TOM DAVIS-AWARD _ 11:30 a.m. Rep. Tom Davis (R-VA) receives the Gen. L.V. 'Sonny' Montgomery Award, the National Guard Bureau's highest award. Location: Room 2154 Rayburn.

FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL SERVICE _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. Michael Yost, administrator, Foreign Agricultural Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, addresses a Women in International Trade Agriculture Section luncheon. Topic: ``The Restructuring of the Foreign Agricultural Service -- How Will It Be Impacted?'' Location: Chinatown Garden Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

ENERGY-BODMAN _ 12:30 p.m. Energy Secretary Bodman speaks on ``Biofuels and the Future of US Energy'' at the US Chamber of Commerce. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

SENATE RACES _ 12:30 p.m. Sens. Elizabeth Dole, R-NC, chair, National Republican Senatorial Committee; and Charles Schumer, D-NY., chair, Democratic Senatorial campaign Committee, participate in a National Press Club Luncheon. Location: National Press Club.

ARLINGTON BURIAL _ 1 p.m. There will be a burial service for Army CW2 Scott Dyer, an Army Special Forces officer killed in Iraq. Location: Arlington National Cemetery.

CHRISTIAN-ZIONISTS-ELECTIONS _ 1 p.m. - 3 p.m. The Council for the National Intertest sponsors a discussion, ``The Armageddon Vote in 2006: Christian Zionists and the Midterm Elections." Speaks include Rev. Bob Edgar, General Secretary, National Council of Churches; and Rev. Robert O. Smith, co-author, ``Christians and a Land Called Holy: How Can We Foster Justice, Peace, and Hope?" Location: Room 2168, Rayburn House Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0086300

RICE SPEECH _ 1:30 p.m. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice speaks on her recent diplomatic mission to Asia, aimed at building consensus in dealing with North Koreas nuclear program. Location: 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

US FOREIGN POLICY _ 3 p.m. New America Foundation forum on ``The American Way of Strategy: US Foreign Policy and the American Way of Life." With Michael Lind, author, ``The American Way of Strategy," and Bruce Stokes, New America Foundation director. Location: 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

DEMOCRATIC ELECTIONS _ 5 p.m. National Endowment for Democracy holds panel discussion on ``Electoral Systems and Democracy: What Have We Learned?" With Donald Horowitz of Duke University; Larry Diamond, Hoover Institute; others. Location: 1025 F St. NW, Suite 800.

CHINESE TECHNOLOGY _ 5 p.m. American University Professor Douglas Fuller speaks on ``China's Emerging Technology Tracjectory." Location: American University, Butler Board Room, 4400 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

COURAGE AWARDS-JILL CARROLL _ 6 p.m. International Women's Media Foundation's 2006 Courage in Journalism Awards. Winners include Jill Carroll, The Christian Science Monitor, who was held in captivity in Iraq for 82 days; May Chidiac, a journalist with the Lebanese Broadcasting Corporation, who survived a car bomb attack; and Gao Yu of China, pro-democracy reporter who was sentenced to six years in prison for ``leaking state secrets." Lifetime Achievement Award goes to Elena Poniatowska Amor, who's spent much of her career reporting on the lives of poor Mexicans. Location: National Geographic Society, 17th and M sts NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0086301

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Believes US Is Misunderstood In War On Terror 3
US Concerned By Release Of Saudi Prisoners For Ramadan 4
"Essential Element" Of Canadian Anti-Terror Law Ruled Unconstitutional 4

Homeland Response:

In Letter to Gonzales, Grassley Calls Lack Of Anthrax Probe Briefings "Outrageous." 4
Busy US Airports Show Interest In Registered Traveler 4
More Human Remains Found At WTC Site 5
White Louisiana Residents More Likely To Seek Help With Insurance Claims 5

War News:

More US Troops May Go To Iraq As Government Agrees To Set Timetable 5
Cheney Says Iraqi Forces Must Take Over Responsibility For Security 7
Overhead Consumes Large Share Of Iraq Reconstruction Budgets 8
Iran's Khamenei Calls For End To Iraq's Sectarian Conflict 8
Military Searches Fail To Find Missing Soldier 8
US, Iraqi Forces Fortify Position In Retaken Insurgent Base 9
Army Training Military Advisors For Iraq 9
Service Members Sign Appeal Urging US Withdrawal From Iraq . 9
Isikoff Criticizes Weekly Standard For Choosing Novak To Review "Hubris." 9
Islamists Seen As Shifting Attention Back To Afghanistan 9

Corporate Scandals:

Former Comverse CFO Pleads Guilty To Charges Stemming From Options Backdating Scheme 10
Skilling Sentence Ends Enron Era, But Corruption Probes Continue 11
NEC Says It IS Subject Of SEC Investigation 11
Corporate Scandals Highlight Work Of General Counsels 11
Study Highlights Cost Of Options Scandal 11
NYTimes Praises Senate Panels For Investigating SEC Pequot Probe 11

Criminal Law:

Hastert, Reynolds Testify Before House Ethics Subcommittee Investigating Foley Scandal 12
FBI Has Not "Substantiated" Allegations Against Harman And AIPAC 12
FBI Investigating Renzi's Role In Arizona Land Sale 13
Experts Say Ban Will Not Stop Online Gambling 13
Former Refco CFO Charged With Defrauding Investors 13
FBI Investigating LANL Classified Documents Found In Police Drug Raid 13
Safavian Defense Submits Support Letters For Friday Sentencing 14
Suburban Chicago Mayor Pleads Not Guilty To Bribery Charges 14
Jury Finds Man Guilty Of Murdering NYTimes Editor 14
FBI Investigating Stolen Art In Deceased New Yorker's Collection 14
FBI, Arizona Police Investigating Theft Of Power Line Maintenance Trucks, Tools 15
FBI, SEC Investigating Online Brokerage Account Hackings 15
Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Online Investment Fraud 15
FBI Investigating Child Porn Allegation Against Connecticut Episcopal Music Director 15
Massachusetts State Trooper To Plead Guilty To Child Enticement Charges 16
PG County Police Attribute Decline In Crime To Staffing Decisions 16
Ohio Executes Cult Leader For Murders Of Five Followers 16
Maryland Delegate Accused Of Foreclosure-Rescue Fraud 16
New Technologies Spur Wave Of Retail Crime 16

Civil Law:

COPA Litigation Begins Final Round 17
Group Claims More FOIA Resources Needed 17
Bankruptcy Judge Gives Dana Corp More Time For Bonus Plan 17
WSJournal Says Bankruptcy Overhaul Law Working 18

Civil Rights:

NAACP Calls For DOJ Probe Of Richmond Police Shooting 18
Two Mississippi Jailers Charged With Inmate Assaults 18
Judge To Lift DOJ Oversight Of Hawaii Mental Health Plan 18
Studies Finds Racial Disparities In US Health Care 19
Battle Over Virginia Gay Marriage Amendment Heats Up 19

Antitrust:

Steel Tubing Firm Owned By Carlyle To Announce Merger 19

DOJ Criticized Over Case Involving Shipping Industry Price-Fixing ... 19
Thompson Corp To Put Learning Unit Up For Sale ... 19
EU Probing French Guarantee Loan To TVO ... 20

Environment:

White House Solidly Behind Moratorium On Deep Water Bottom Trawling ... 20
US, EU Officials To Discuss Environmental Issues At Finland Meeting ... 20
Interior Department Delays Gulf Oil And Gas Leases In Settlement With Louisiana ... 20
Schwarzenegger Chides Bush Over Global Warming ... 21
Environmentalists Rate California Beaches' Levels Of Pollution. 21

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Scam Features Fake Email From Mueller ... 21
$27 Million Worth Of Meth, Cocaine Seized In Georgia, 3 Arrested ... 21
Agents Shut Down Pharmacy In Louisiana ... 22
Five Face Drug-Distribution Charges In Indiana ... 22
Four Face Charges Following Marijuana Dispensary Raid In California ... 22
Meth Seized In Indiana Following Warning By Federal Authorities ... 22
Judge Says Michigan Doctor Ran "Prescription Mill." ... 23
North Carolina Man Faces Federal Drug-Manufacturing Charges23
Convicted Doctor Criticizes Federal Investigation In Painkiller Case ... 23
In California, Marijuana Activist's Trial Prompts Dispute Over Supporters' T-shirts, Buttons ... 23
Bush Administration Seeks To Maintain Aid To Colombia ... 23
Two Congressmen Urge Rumsfeld To Step Up Afghanistan Anti-Drug Efforts ... 23

Immigration:

Role Of DNA Testing In Immigration Examined ... 24

Tax:

Thomas Questions Tax-Exempt Status Of NCAA Athletics ... 24

Congress-Administration:

Education Department Eases Restrictions On Single-Sex Classes ... 24
Federal Auditors Probe Costs Of Transporting Medicaid Patients25
Senate Finance Committee Produces List Of Possible "Tax Gap" Fixes ... 25
Reid's "Ethical Transgressions" Seen As Evidence Of Congress' "Entitlement" Mind Set ... 25
Perino Featured In Esquire's "Women We're Ashamed To Love" Special ... 25
White House Chief Usher Retiring ... 25
Patent And Trademark Office Institutes Telecommuting Pilot Project ... 26
Government Urged To Provide Face Protection In Event Of Flu Outbreak ... 26

Other News:

Dow Hits New High As Investors Await Federal Reserve Meeting ... 26
Some Heating Bills To Rise Despite Drop In Natural Gas Prices 26
Judge Rules Nine-Year-Old Cannot Be Forced To Undergo Circumcision ... 27
Former Editor Wins Lawsuit Against Music Magazine's Founders ... 27
Bush Says Tax Bills Would Increase Under Democrats ... 27
White House Uses "Radio Day" To Spread Optimistic Message 29
White House Reaching Out To Disaffected Conservatives ... 29
Rove Remains Optimistic About GOP Retaining House Majority 30
Pelosi Sees Economy As Number One Election Issue ... 30
NRCC Focusing On 33 Key House Races ... 31
Drug Industry's Contributions To GOP Candidates Prove Controversial ... 31
Democrats Hope To Create "Blue Belt" Across Three Florida Districts ... 32
Veteran Republicans Running Like Underdogs ... 32
In AZ5, Hayworth, Mitchell Display Differences In Personality ... 32
Despite Bribery Probe, Tight Reelection Bid, Jefferson Projects Confidence ... 32
NYTimes Endorses Shays' Opponent In CT4 ... 32
Documents Cast Doubt On Taylor Land Ownership Claims ... 32
Commentator Criticizes Treatment Of Ney ... 33
Senate Polls Show Three GOP States May Deny Democrats Senate Majority ... 33
Impact Of Racial Issues On Tennessee Senate Race Considered ... 33
Talent Says He Supports Bush On Some Issues, Disagrees With Him On Others ... 34
Limbaugh Accuses Michael J. Fox Of Exaggerating His Illness In Ad ... 34
Virginia Candidates, Parties Begin Multi-Million Dollar Ad Blitz ... 35
Kennedy States Support For Iraq War In New Ad ... 35
Cardin Says Faith And Family Sustain Him ... 35
Report Warns Of Potential Voting Problems In 10 States ... 36
GOP Lobbying Firms Not Clamoring To Hire Democrats As Election Nears ... 36
WPost Endorses Ehrlich For Reelection ... 36
Anti-Deval Ad May Have Backfired On Healey In Massachusetts36
Survey Finds US Muslims Likely To Back Democrats ... 36
Cheney Says Clinton Would Be A "Formidable" Presidential Candidate ... 37
Cook Called Most "Prominent" Political Forecaster ... 37
College Tuition Rising Faster Than Inflation ... 37
Former Morgan Stanley VP Praises Spitzer As "Good For Business." ... 38
Rice Defends "Axis Of Evil" Concept ... 38
Israel Ponders Preemptive Gaza Strike On Hamas Weapons Stockpiles ... 40
Pentagon Officials Enter Plea On Arms Deals ... 41
Chavez Continues Security Council Candidacy, Denies He's Backing Bolivia ... 41
Korologos Expected To Resign As Ambassador To Belgium ... 41

DOJ_NMG_0086303

Study Says Most Automakers Falling Short Of Europe's CO2 Emissions Targets 41
Vietnamese Economy Attracts Investment 42
Book Argues Mercenaries Could End Abuses In Darfur 42
Friedman Say Energy Struggle Reviving Cold War Tensions In Europe 42
WPost Says Europeans Not Bridging Gap With Muslim Community 42

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 42

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 43

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Believes US Is Misunderstood In War On Terror. The AP (10/25, Giles) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday he believes some of the U.S. actions in its war on terror have done damage to the image of the United States abroad, particularly its commitment to the rule of law." The AP continues, "The U.S. has drawn criticism around the world for the Abu Ghraib prison scandal in Iraq, its treatment of detainees and secret renditions of terrorism suspects to clandestine prisons in allied countries where they are allegedly tortured. … 'The notion that the United States does not fully support the rule of law is one I find very disappointing,' Gonzales told reporters, especially given that President Bush 'believes the Unites States is the leader, is a beacon of hope in the world and it's important that our actions should reflect a total commitment to the rule of law.'" The AP adds, "He blamed the country's deteriorating image on misunderstanding in Europe about what the U.S. is doing to fight terrorism. … 'Part of the misunderstanding is the fault of the United States in the sense that we need to be out there more, talking about what we are doing and why,' he said." The AP notes, "Gonzales was in Madrid for the sixth meeting of a working group set up two years ago to coordinate the fight against terrorism and other police matters. … Gonzales dismissed criticism that prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay detention facility were in legal limbo and said the recent Military Commissions Act ensured fair trials for terrorists and guarantees that evidence acquired through torture will not be used."

FNC On the Record (10/24, 10:47 p.m.) FNC's Harris Faulkner "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the U.S. needs to do better job spelling out what it's doing to fight terror and why. On a trip abroad, Gonzales says his trips are an important way to reach his counterparts there about what the U.S. is trying to do to protect America and, in turn, protect the interest of its allies."

US, Spain Agree To Greater Anti-Terror Cooperation. AFP (10/25) reports, "Spain and the United States agreed to ramp up cooperation against terrorism and organized crime during a visit by US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the interior ministry said. … The agreement came during talks between Gonzales and Spanish Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba, it said." AFP continues, "Washington offered to make technology which the US Federal Bureau of Investigation uses to index DNA samples available to Spanish police. … Spanish Justice Minister Juan Fernando Lopez Aguilar told reporters after the meeting, which also saw Gonzales confer with Spanish counterpart Candido Conde-Pumpido, that judicial cooperation between the two nations was 'excellent.' … He added that they were committed to 'achieving good long-term results' in fighting terror." AFP adds, "Gonzales said the United States was sometimes 'misunderstood' in Europe and it had to 'talk more' to explain its position on security. … Asked if Spain was prepared to countenance handing over terror suspects to US military courts, Aguilar told Spanish media that Spain was determined to protect its citizens' rights at all times."

More Commentary. The Longview (TX) News-Journal (10/25) reports, "Alberto Gonzales, who once made headlines when he authored legal arguments that President Bush had the authority to authorize torture, is now disappointed by our nation's sagging reputation. … Gonzales, then the White House counsel but now the U.S. Attorney General, was in Spain for a meeting of an international working group created two years ago to coordinate the fight against terrorism and deal with other global law enforcement issues. While there, he told reporters, 'The notion that the United States does not fully support the rule of law is one I find very disappointing.' … According to an Associated Press report, the nation's top lawyer added that Bush 'believes the United States is the leader, is a beacon of hope in the world and it's important that our actions should reflect a total commitment to the rule of law.' … Of course, Gonzales failed to mention that in order for Bush to live up to his words, he needed to sign legislation last week — the Military Commissions Act — to ensure fair trials for suspected terrorists and assure that evidence garnered through torture will not be used at such trials." The News-Journal adds, "Gonzales told reporters that our country's tarnished image abroad is due to our allies' misunderstandings about what the United States is doing to fight terrorism. … Actually, that tarnished image is due to our allies' growing understanding of measures the United States has taken in its efforts to combat terrorism, including the use of secret prisons abroad, the rendition of prisoners to governments known to use torture and the indefinite detention of people who are suspected but not yet proven terrorists. … Gonzales would like to talk about Bush's 'total commitment to the rule of law' but he has often been reticent about discussing the administration's commitment to the spirit of the law. That's because the longtime Bush aide and attorney has played a key role in seeking loopholes that allow the president to sidestep the spirit of the law. … The attorney general's comments were almost laughable when he opined that the way to dispel the 'misunderstanding' among our European allies is for the United States "to be out there more, talking about what we are doing and why." … Meanwhile, at home we hear administration officials and supporters raising the specter that members of the media are unpatriotic and possibly traitorous when they report about what the administration is doing — and why."

DOJ_NMG_0086304

US Concerned By Release Of Saudi Prisoners For Ramadan. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Williams, Connell, Lopez, 918K) reports, "US officials, apparently caught off guard by the Saudi government's recent release of more than two dozen former Guantanamo Bay prisoners, are voicing fears that the men will join the camp of violent extremist groups. The Saudis released the 29 men from jail for observance of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement, with instructions to return to custody by the end of this month. Saudi officials said that although the men were still under investigation for possible terrorist ties, they were not considered serious threats." The Times adds that Saudi decision to temporarily release the 29 men "illustrates the limits of US influence as the Bush administration seeks to shrink the population of Guantanamo by transferring prisoners to other nations. And it underscores how differently the US and other countries, including Britain and Germany, perceive the danger posed by former detainees."

"Essential Element" Of Canadian Anti-Terror Law Ruled Unconstitutional. The New York Times (10/25, Austen, 1.21M) reports, "An Ontario judge ruled Tuesday that an 'essential element' of Canada's antiterrorism laws was unconstitutional. The decision, by Justice Douglas Rutherford of the Ontario Superior Court, marks the second time in less than a week that a judge at the court has rejected parts of the nation's new antiterrorism laws. Justice Rutherford found that the laws, introduced after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, improperly defined terrorism as a crime committed with religious, ideological or political motives. That definition, he said, is 'an essential element that is not only novel in Canadian law, but the impact of which constitutes an infringement of certain fundamental freedoms,' including 'those of religion, thought, belief, opinion, expression and association.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

In Letter to Gonzales, Grassley Calls Lack Of Anthrax Probe Briefings "Outrageous." Under the headline "FBI Hit For Anthrax 'Dead-Ends,'" the Washington Times (10/25, Seper, 88K) reports Sen. Charles Grassley "wants Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to explain why the FBI has not made an arrest in its anthrax investigation, citing five years of 'dead-ends and a lack of progress.'" Grassley wrote to Gonzales, "The FBI's refusal to brief Congress over the last several years is an outrageous response to reasonable requests at getting to the bottom of the attacks." The Times notes, "FBI Assistant Director Joseph Persichini Jr., who heads the Washington field office, said last month that FBI and U.S. Postal Service investigators were 'fully committed to bringing the perpetrators of these murderous attacks to justice.' … Mr. Grassley said a detailed examination of the probe may reveal the FBI's 'institutional resistance to criticism and dissent.'"

Milloy Says Postal Workers Feel "Forgotten," "Vulnerable." In his Washington Post (10/25, 748K) column, Courtland Milloy writes that postal workers feel "forgotten" in the anthrax saga and notes that Brentwood Exposed president Dena Briscoe said at a memorial service last week for the postal workers killed in the attack, "Like soldiers, we continue to work on the front line, sometimes feeling unarmed, in hopes that our health and safety needs are met, and that the culprits are apprehended." Milloy adds, "The challenge of forgiveness was highlighted by a letter from Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski" to the memorial service, in which she wrote, "It is unacceptable that we still have no leads." However, "Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director of the FBI's Washington field office, told the postal workers that law enforcement agents had worked extremely hard, round-the-clock, and that the failure to solve the crime had caused much grief and frustration. … His humility seemed to soften the crowd," but "the wounds inflicted five years ago are still raw. And it probably doesn't help the healing that some postal workers still feel terribly vulnerable to attack."

Busy US Airports Show Interest In Registered Traveler. USA Today (10/25, 3A, Frank, 2.27M) reports, "Ten of the USA's busiest airports have asked" the TSA to let them run Registered Traveler programs and could start "by the end of the year, launching a much-delayed effort to expedite security for travelers who pass background checks." Among those on "a list of interested airports" released by the TSA after a Freedom of Information Act request by USA TODAY are Atlanta, Chicago O'Hare and Los Angeles airports. "Steven Brill, CEO of a New York company that would run Registered Traveler programs, said 10 large airports would provide a 'critical mass to ensure this program launches and flourishes.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086305

More Human Remains Found At WTC Site. The AP (10/24, Kugler) reported that 36 more bone fragments were found Tuesday in subterranean cavities along the edge of the World Trade Center site. Workers found the remains as they "continued burrowing into areas that were apparently missed during the initial cleanup." The AP adds, "The newly discovered bones are just the latest finding of overlooked remains. Hundreds of bone fragments have been found on the roof of a building just south of the trade center site, and officials are eyeing whether other buildings need to be combed again."

White Louisiana Residents More Likely To Seek Help With Insurance Claims. USA Today/AP (10/25, 5A, Callimachi, Bass) reports, "Though poor and minority neighborhoods suffered the brunt of Katrina, residents living in white neighborhoods have been three times as likely as homeowners in black neighborhoods to seek state help in resolving insurance disputes, according to an Associated Press computer analysis of Louisiana's insurance complaints settled in the first year after Katrina." Louisiana Insurance Commissioner Jim Donelon "said his department made an extra effort to reach as many people as possible and let them know the agency was willing to press their case with insurers. … Mike Trevino, a spokesman for Allstate, said the state agency treated minority and white homeowners equally. The figures obtained by the AP support his contention."

Quiet Hurricane Season Provides Relief For New Orleans, Insurance Industry. ABC World News (10/24, story 10, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) followed up a brief report on Hurricane Paul weakening to a tropical storm with a report on this year's hurricane season, which "has been…unusually quiet." ABC (Koffman) continued that forecasters, who had predicted an active season this year, "admit theirs is an inexact science." Meanwhile, the light season "is very good news for New Orleans, where the Army Corps of Engineers has another year to rebuild levees Hurricane Katrina overran." An inactive season is also good news for the insurance industry, but not for homeowners, who have "seen rates sky rocket. And they won't be coming down."

Recovery Official Says State Is Rebuilding "Safer, Stronger And Smarter." Norman C. Francis, chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, in an op-ed in USA Today (10/25, 12A, 2.27M) writes that in response to the Katrina, "we in Louisiana have pledged to acknowledge our risks and rebuild safer, stronger and smarter. This is oftentimes an unpopular position, but we've stuck to that commitment." The state "adopted a tough, new statewide building code and FEMA's new flood elevation guidelines. With funding from President Bush and Congress, we created programs to allow families to sell us their flood-damaged homes or elevate as they make repairs." Francis states that the question should not be "whether to rebuild Louisiana, but how to do so safely."

In an opposing editorial, USA Today (10/25, 12A, 2.27M) writes, "Federal taxpayers will be subsidizing reconstruction in flood areas, underwriting the insurance on those homes and will no doubt have to bail out the flood insurance program if the homes get wiped out again. The program collected only $2.2 billion last year in premiums but will pay out more than $20 billion in Katrina claims, leaving taxpayers on the hook for the rest." USA Today states that "the homeowners in and around New Orleans deserve some assistance because of the magnitude of the disaster and the failure of federally constructed levees to protect them. But encouraging rebuilding in the most flood-prone areas is foolhardy."

WAR NEWS:

More US Troops May Go To Iraq As Government Agrees To Set Timetable. All three networks led with Iraq and the news that US commander Gen. George W. Casey Jr. says more troops may be needed to stabilize the situation there. Between them, the networks ran just under 19 minutes on Iraq last night. The tone of the stories was generally negative. The CBS Evening News (10/24, 3:40, Couric, 7.66M) opened its broadcast by saying the "US death toll topped 2,800 today as the military announced the deaths of two Marines, a soldier, and a sailor. With these growing numbers, pressure is building on President Bush to find a way out and bring the troops home. But the President says that cannot happen until the Iraqis can handle their own security. So the question is when will that happen?" Casey was shown saying, "We are about 75% of the way through a three-step process in building those forces. And it's going to take another 12 to 18 months or so, until I believe the Iraqi security forces are completely capable." But CBS (Logan) added, "But these uniformed men you see here in handcuffs are the Iraqi security forces. This time, they're prisoners of an American unit instead of partners. That's because these troops from 101st Airborne Division, believe the grenades just fired at them came from the Iraqi soldiers' weapons, and it's not an isolated incident."

NBC Nightly News (10/24, 4:50, Williams, 9.87M) led with what it called "a relentless drumbeat of bad news from Iraq lately, and the message from officials there today was, they will need more time, maybe even more troops in order to fully join the fight to suppress the enemy in Baghdad. On that front today, the US announced the deaths of four more servicemen. That brings the total for October alone to 92. And that's a grim record pace." NBC (Engel) added, "Today was a carefully orchestrated news event to announce that the Iraqi government has accepted a timetable, clearly driven by Washington. As US troops patrolled Baghdad today, the top American officials in Iraq held a rare joint press conference to deliver a clear message: No staying the course here." NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 2, 2:50, 9.87M) followed on that theme in its next story, with anchor Brian Williams saying, "Last night we reported the President will no longer use the words 'stay the course' in his speeches." NBC (Gregory) added, "There are important signals being sent out" from the White House "two weeks before an election. A senior advisor told me tonight, we don't want to appear to have our heads stuck in the sand in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0086306

CBS Evening News (10/24, story 2, 1:15, 7.66M) anchor Katie Couric asked Pentagon correspondent David Martin, "You've got military leaders expressing guarded optimism, and yet, troops on the ground seeming to feel that things are not going the right way. So why the disconnect?" Martin replied, "I think the generals genuinely believe that success is still possible. But what's changed is that I think they also believe that failure is possible, and with each passing day of sectarian violence, failure becomes more of a possibility." ABC World News (10/24, story 2, 2:15, McCarthy, 8.78M) said "any progress" in Iraq "will require strong political leadership."

ABC World News (10/24, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M), taking a less negative approach, led by saying a "new timetable for when the troops might come home" comes "with the caution that more US troops might be needed before they do." ABC (Karl) said Casey and US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "say that the Iraqi government has agreed to set a time line for resolving major political and economic issues. It's a timeline, they say, that could leave the Iraqis largely self-sufficient within 12 or 18 months. The announcement came at a generally upbeat press conference in Baghdad." But "former generals were skeptical." Retired Maj. Gen. William Nash, Council on Foreign Relations: "If they don't deliver, the time line, undoubtedly, will be extended or we'll withdraw without a political settlement, in which case, we'll leave behind us much more chaos and much more violence."

The New York Times (10/25, Burns, 1.21M) reports in a "news conference held after a week of largely bad news from Iraq," Casey and Khalilzad "sought to reassure an increasingly restive American public that the war was still winnable." But the two men "did not address what would happen if the government failed to meet the timetable, which includes measures meant to address some of the most intractable issues plaguing the country, including the sectarian militias that have been responsible for much of the worst violence this year."

Under the front page headline "More U.S. Troops May Be Iraq-Bound," the Washington Post (10/25, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports Casey said he "may call for more troops to be sent to Baghdad, possibly by increasing the overall U.S. presence in Iraq, as rising bloodshed pushes Iraqi and American deaths to some of their highest levels of the war." The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Roug, 918K) leads a similar story by saying Casey said more US troops "might be needed to quell sectarian violence raging in the capital."

The Wall Street Journal (10/25, Jaffe, 2.03M) takes a different tack in a front page report, saying US officials, with "few military options left to counter the violence" in Iraq, are "shifting more of the onus onto Baghdad's beleaguered political leaders to broker compromises they hope might stem the rising bloodshed." The Journal focuses on the timetable, not the possible US troop increase, but concludes that "little in Iraq over the past three years offers reason for optimism that the renewed pressure" on PM Nouri al-Maliki "will produce better results."

USA Today (10/25, Jervis, 2.27M) headlines its front page story "No Major Troop Cut In Iraq For A Year," and spends much of the report discussing current troop levels. The Washington Times (10/25, Scarborough, 88K) and the AP (10/24, Hurst) have straightforward reports on the Casey/Khalilzad announcement.

Baghdad Violence Said To Belie Casey's "Laudable Goal." The New York Times (10/25, Gordon, 1.21M) says Casey's "laudable goal" of turning over security responsibilities within 18 months "seems far removed from the violence-plagued streets of Iraq's capital, where American forces have taken the lead in trying to protect the city and American soldiers substantially outnumber Iraqi ones." The Times says that with the "rise in sectarian killings, a Sunni-based insurgency that appears to be as potent as ever and an Iraqi security establishment that continues to have difficulties deploying sufficient numbers of motivated and proficient forces in Baghdad, General Casey's target seems to be an increasingly heroic assumption." USA Today (10/25, 8A, Jervis, 2.27M) headlines a story "More Troops Means More Targets For Snipers," writing that sniper attacks on US troops "have risen dramatically as more Americans have been pulled into the capital to patrol on foot and in lightly armored vehicles amid raging religious violence."

Some Iraqis Dispute Khalilzad's Assessment. The AP (10/24, Hendawi) reports that while Khalilzad "insisted" that things "are not all bad in Iraq, citing the growing number of satellite dishes on rooftops and consumers with cell phones as signs of economic progress," some Iraqis "saw things differently." Baghdad resident Mohammed Ibrahim, a government employee, said, "We'd prefer he take those back and return just 10 percent of our prewar life. Saying things like that shows the Americans' contempt for us Iraqis."

Pace Still Optimistic About Iraq's Future. The AP (10/24, Baldor) reports JCS Chairman Gen. Peter Pace said he is "not discouraged by what other U.S. commanders have described as disappointing progress in securing Baghdad, but he predicted no quick turnaround." Pace "told a Pentagon news conference that his optimism about Iraq's future is based on his belief that most Iraqis want peace and stability. He also said Iraqis have plenty of incentive to halt the sectarian violence that threatens to tear their country apart."

DOJ_NMG_0086307

Biden Federalism Plan Slowly Gaining Bipartisan Interest. The Hill (10/25, Schor) writes that lawmakers and candidates from both parties "are signaling new openness to dividing the war-torn nation into three autonomous regions, a plan closely associated with Sen. Joe Biden." Biden, "one of his party's most trusted foreign policy voices, has turned up the spotlight on his plan for largely self-governing regions in Iraq." Biden, appearing on CNN's Larry King Live (10/24), said the Bush Administration's Iraq policy has "been wrong from the beginning. There's been no apparent willingness on the part of the civilians in this administration to change it. … The thing is broken. They need a political solution in Iraq and we need a bipartisan solution at home."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "Yes, the Iraq project is difficult, and its outcome dangerously uncertain." But while "timetables and deadlines may sound like realpolitik," they "only feed suspicions that the U.S. will abandon Iraq's leaders once they have walked out onto a political limb. Iraq is not yet in a state of 'civil war,' and it has a functioning, if imperfect, government. If changes of tactics or force levels are needed, by all means make them. But what Iraqis most need from Washington is reassurance of support for the tough decisions and battles that lie ahead."

In a Washington Post (10/25, A17, 748K) op-ed, American Enterprise Institute resident scholar Frederick Kagan writes, "It's been coming for a long time: the idea that fixing Iraq is the Iraqis' problem, not ours -- that we've done all we can and now it's up to them. … The implication of these arguments is clear: The United States should prepare to leave Iraq, after which the Iraqis will work out their own troubles -- or they won't. In any event, we can no longer help them. This notion is wrong and morally contemptible, and it endangers American security around the world."

Cheney Says Iraqi Forces Must Take Over Responsibility For Security. Vice President Cheney was asked on NPR (10/24) why the US does not put a larger force on the ground in Iraq. Cheney said, "Because the judgment has been up until now that the key for us in Iraq is to get the Iraqis into the fight. And we've got 140,000 roughly troops there now, US and coalition forces, and we've worked very aggressively to stand up, and we're -- I think George Casey said today, we're about 75 percent of the way there in terms of getting an Iraqi force that's able to provide for their own security. The sooner we do that, the sooner we can reduce our own presence and turn things over to them."

Asked on NPR (10/24) if he still believes the insurgency is in its last throes, Cheney said, "Can't say that. I made it clear earlier that I would have expected that the political process we set in motion, the three national elections and so forth would have resulted in a lower level of violence than we're seeing today. It hasn't happened yet. I can't say that we're over the hump in terms of violence, no."

Snow Says US Is Winning War In Iraq. White House spokesman Tony Snow was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (10/24) if the US is winning the war in Iraq. Snow said, "Yes." Asked if the US will eventually declare victory, Snow said, "I think what's going to happen is the Iraqi people are going to be able to declare victory, because you're going to have a democratic society that in that part of the world is going to be able to set an example."

GOP Said To Evince Ambivalence On Iraq. The Financial Times (10/25, Sevastopulo, Dombey) runs one of the few optimistic headlines this morning, "Success In Iraq Possible, Say US Officials," but its report is less sunny, saying that while "top US officials in Baghdad on Tuesday said Iraqi forces should be 'completely capable' of taking responsibility for security" within a year and a half, "Republican support for the White House strategy on Iraq continued to erode just two weeks ahead of November's congressional elections."

The CBS Evening News (10/24, story 3, 1:20, Axelrod, 7.66M) said, "The White House is quite a bind, because on one hand it has to project some sense of resolve, certainly to keep appealing to its base. On the other hand, they read the polls, and they know that voters want a change in Iraq policy but as far as and significant change a White House official tells me do not expect to see anything significant prior to Election Day." McClatchy (10/25, Hutcheson, Talev) also examines the US election impact, saying that "judging from the initial reactions" at home, the Casey/Khalilzad announcement "appears unlikely to influence the Nov. 7 congressional elections."

Columnist Says GOP Defeat Would Be Islamist Victory. In his Washington Times (10/25, 88K) column, Michael Scheuer writes, "In a world where leading Western experts have consigned Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda to near-irrelevant status, the gangly Saudi is on the verge of seeing the forces he leads and inspires knock off their third infidel government. Not bad for a guy running from rock to rock and cave to cave." Scheuer faults "Islamist militancy" for the defeat of then-PM Jose Maria Aznar in Spain and the recent coup in Thailand, and says "bin Laden, et. al, know the biggest prize looms just ahead -- the chance that the Republican Party will be ousted from one or both houses of Congress."

Pelosi Says Americans Will Not "Stay The Course." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, appearing on CNBC's Kudlow and Company (10/24), said President Bush "has said

DOJ_NMG_0086308

'stay the course.' It was a slogan, not a strategy. Now he is banning 'stay the course.' I don't know if it is banned as a slogan or a strategy. But in any event it's clear that the American people are just not tolerating this course of action. They don't intend to stay the course."

McGovern Says US Headed Down Vietnam "Road" In Iraq. The Washington Post (10/25, A15, 748K) interviews ex-Sen. George McGovern, co-author of "Out of Iraq: A Practical Plan for Withdrawal Now." The Post leads its story by saying that "during the years that he led opposition to the Vietnam War," McGovern says he "consoled his family with the proposition" that the US "would never again commit such a 'tragic mistake,' as he put it." But McGovern said in the interview "that America is headed down 'the same road' in Iraq."

Columnists Examine Retirement Of "Stay The Course." In her New York Times (10/25, 1.21M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "Things have become so dire for the Republicans that now even Bush is distancing himself from Bush. The president is cutting and running from the president." Bush "will no longer stay the course on the rallying cry 'stay the course.' … Of course, the administration has never really said what 'the course' is, so it was never really apparent what 'staying' it meant, anyhow."

In his Washington Post (10/25, A17, 748K), column, David Ignatius writes, "The Bush administration's Iraq policy is no longer 'stay the course' but, in the phrase of White House spokesman Tony Snow, 'a study in constant motion.' The reality, as near as I can tell, is that the administration isn't sure yet where to move after the November elections. Nor are most of the administration's critics." How can the US, "in its search for an exit, avoid compounding the mistakes it made in invading Iraq? To help light the way, we are blessed with a deus ex machina in the bipartisan Iraq Study Group."

In his Washington Post (10/25, A17, 748K), column, Harold Meyerson writes, "The president has fled the field from 'stay the course,' signaling not just the unwinnability of his war but the bankruptcy of his political strategy. For as the president and his party grope for an alternative plan of action in Iraq, Karl Rove's bright line between Republican resolve and Democratic defeatism has become irreversibly fuzzed. … 'Stay the course' has been replaced by 'anything goes' -- so long as it helps the Republicans cling to power."

Overhead Consumes Large Share Of Iraq Reconstruction Budgets. The New York Times (10/25, Glanz, 1.21M) says a report by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction says "overhead costs have consumed more than half the budget of some reconstruction projects," leaving "far less money than expected to provide the oil, water and electricity needed to improve the lives of Iraqis." Overhead expenses including "housing and feeding employees, completing paperwork and providing security" have "ranged from under 20 percent to as much as 55 percent of the budgets."

IG Report Finds Halliburton Passed On "Unusually High" Costs To US. On the front of its business section, the Washington Post (10/25, D1, Witte, 748K) reports, "A report released yesterday by the inspector general's office overseeing Iraq spending found that at least 55 percent, or $163 million, of $296 million in total costs rung up by Halliburton unit KBR" and "passed on to the government under a key contract to restore Iraq's oil industry" were administrative overhead, "a figure that critics said was unusually high," although the report "does not directly say whether KBR's overhead costs were excessive." It is "significantly higher than it was on work by other firms in Iraq, and experts said it is far above what is typically found on a government contract." Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross "defended the company's administrative spending," and "while the Army Corps of Engineers -- which oversaw the contracts -- acknowledged that some of the administrative costs were high," it "argued that important work was getting done even when money was being spent on administrative matters rather than directly on Corps projects."

Halliburton To Sell 17% Of KBR In IPO. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, C5, 2.03M) reports, "Halliburton Co. will sell 17% of its Kellogg, Brown & Root engineering unit in an initial public offering of stock later this year, according to an updated Securities and Exchange Commission filing." The filing also said "that an investigation by a magistrate or a public prosecutor in Algeria 'may be pending' regarding sole-source contracts awarded to Brown & Root-Condor SpA, a joint venture with Condor Engineering SpA in which KBR had a 49% interest as of June 30." Following the sale of "27.8 million shares to the public, Halliburton will own the remaining 83% of KBR; it plans to spin that stake off to Halliburton shareholders in April."

Iran's Khamenei Calls For End To Iraq's Sectarian Conflict. The AP (10/24, Karimi) reports, "Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei on Tuesday called for an end to the bloody sectarian conflict" in Iraq. At an Eid al-Fitr event in Tehran, Khamenei told a large crowd, "The Iraqi people should do everything to avoid sectarian conflict."

Military Searches Fail To Find Missing Soldier. ABC World News (10/24, story 3, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that there is "no sign of a US soldier that went missing" in Baghdad on Monday. The soldier "is a translator, fluent in Arabic. And it is believed he was visiting a relative's house when masked men drove up and grabbed him." The AP (10/24, Salaheddin) says the US military "carried out house-to-house searches in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood" for the missing translator, "but said Tuesday they had found no sign of him." The Washington Post (10/25, A14, Anderson, 748K) says the soldier "apparently has family in Baghdad and left the Green Zone…to visit relatives Monday to celebrate Eid al-Fitr."

DOJ_NMG_0086309

US, Iraqi Forces Fortify Position In Retaken Insurgent Base. The Washington Post (10/25, A14, White, 748K) reports on US troops' taking of an "enormous power plant that had been used by insurgents" near the Euphrates. Inside they "saw cages -- one containing a pair of shoes and what appeared to be human feces -- on the bottom floor, what U.S. commanders said they believe is an indication that prisoners had been held there and possibly tortured." US and Iraqi soldiers "began fortifying their position inside the plant…as part of a concerted effort to deny insurgents a safe haven scarcely 10 miles from Baghdad's southern edge."

Army Training Military Advisors For Iraq. Under the headline "Army Is Training Advisors For Iraq," the Los Angeles Times (10/25, Spiegel, 918K) reports that at Fort Riley in Kansas, the Army "is building a training base that by early next year will be turning as many as 2,000 of its most promising midlevel officers into military advisors every two months, most of them headed to Iraq." The mission "reflects the U.S. military's vision of its long-range role in Iraq -- as advisors for local forces who will be doing the actual fighting. But it represents something of a gamble as well: The effort is sucking thousands out of their normal combat deployments at a time when American forces are facing personnel shortages and violence in Iraq is surging."

Service Members Sign Appeal Urging US Withdrawal From Iraq. The Washington Post (10/25, A13, Tyson, 748K) reports, "More than 100 U.S. service members have signed a rare appeal urging Congress to support the 'prompt withdrawal' of all American troops and bases from Iraq," according to organizers. The statement, "sponsored by antiwar activists including Iraq Veterans Against the War, Veterans for Peace and Military Families Speak Out," reads in part, "Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home." The "unusual appeal -- the first of its kind in the Iraq war, organizers say -- makes use of a legal protection afforded by the Military Whistle-Blower Protection Act, which provides that members of the military, acting in their capacity as citizens, can send a protected communication to Congress without reprisal."

But the AP (10/24, Flaherty) says "at least two senators -- both critical of the administration's handling of the war in Iraq -- said they were concerned that service members speaking out against the president may undermine the military's apolitical status." Sen. Jack Reed, a West Point graduate, said, "We expect our soldiers to follow…the legitimate orders of their commanders." And Sen. Lindsey Graham said, "We've had a long tradition making sure the military doesn't engage in political debate."

Isikoff Criticizes Weekly Standard For Choosing Novak To Review "Hubris." The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" column (10/25, McCaslin) reports on "the lengthy written exchange between" Newsweek's Michael Isikoff, coauthor with the Nation's David Corn of "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War," and conservative columnist Bob Novak, who reviewed "Hubris" for the Weekly Standard. In a letter to the editor of the Standard Isikoff wrote, "I was amused, to say the least, to see that my old friends at The Weekly Standard asked Bob Novak to review" "Hubris." Isikoff asks, "Was Scooter Libby unavailable?" Novak responded, "I regret that my friend Mike Isikoff, in his letter, is still peddling the story of Scooter Libby and Karl Rove attempting to discredit Wilson by revealing his wife's intelligence background. … Apparently, he joins David Corn in not being able to accept that the conspiracy theory was demolished by his own book."

Islamists Seen As Shifting Attention Back To Afghanistan. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Rotella, 918K) reports, "The conflict in Iraq is drawing fewer foreign fighters as Muslim extremists aspiring to battle the West turn their attention back to the symbolically important and increasingly violent turf of Afghanistan. … The shift of militants to Afghanistan this year suggests that Al Qaeda and its allies, armed with new tactics honed in Iraq, are coming full circle five years after U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban mullahs." In Iraq, insurgent leaders "are now mainly interested in foreign recruits ready to die in suicide attacks, anti-terrorism officials say. Moreover, the conflict is dominated by violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims. In contrast, an accelerating Afghan offensive by the resurgent Taliban offers a clearer battleground and a wealth of targets: U.S. and other North Atlantic Treaty Organization troops, and the Western-backed government."

WSJournal Blames Pakistan For Afghanistan's Woes. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "Our finest foreign-policy minds have been abuzz lately trying explain how and why the U.S. and its NATO allies are, as a recent Newsweek International cover has it, 'Losing Afghanistan.' But no need for deep thoughts here: The largest part of the problem is neighboring Pakistan. In September, the Pakistan government of Pervez Musharraf agreed to abandon its North Waziristan province -- which shares a long border with Afghanistan -- to the de facto rule of its 'tribal elders' and the Taliban and mujahadeen terrorists they harbor." Since then, "the number of cross-border raids into Afghanistan has risen threefold. … We don't know what General Musharraf promised President Bush and Afghan President Hamid Karzai during their recent conclave in the White House. But we hope it was more tangible cooperation than we have been seeing of late. Sovereignty has responsibilities, and General Musharraf is not exercising them."

DOJ_NMG_0086310

Scholar Urges US-NATO Aid Program On Pakistan-Afghanistan Border. In a Wall Street Journal (10/25, A14, 2.03M) op-ed, Barnett Rubin of the New York University Center on International Cooperation writes, "It will take more than a dinner at the White House…to overcome the longstanding antagonism between Pakistan and Afghanistan. Of course, the political clumsiness on the part of the U.S. does not begin or end there. Had we paid more attention to pre-9/11 history, we might not face a rising Taliban insurgency with sanctuary in Pakistan." Rubin says the US and NATO should "provide aid to develop the border area, where unemployment and illiteracy facilitate recruitment to armed groups" in order to "address the roots of instability and violence in this region, and make those on both sides of the frontier genuine partners in protecting both their own security, and ours."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Comverse CFO Pleads Guilty To Charges Stemming From Options Backdating Scheme. The Financial Times (10/25, Allison, Agencies) reports David Kreinberg, the former chief financial officer of Comverse, a "voicemail software company, on Tuesday became the first top executive to plead guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in connection with options backdating. The guilty plea, part of a deal struck with federal prosecutors, came as the US Securities and Exchange Commission announced that Mr Kreinberg had agreed to pay almost $2.4m to settle civil fraud charges." Kreinberg, "who has been free on $1m bail since he surrendered to the Federal Bureau of Investigations in August, was one of three former Comverse executives to be charged over backdating. Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander, Comverse's founder and chief executive, was arrested in Namibia earlier this month after being branded a fugitive from justice by US authorities. Mr Alexander, who has denied wrongdoing, is fighting extradition to the US, where he could face more than 20 years in jail if convicted. William Sorin, Comverse's former general counsel, is also facing charges."

The Wall Street Journal (10/25, C3, Davies) reports Kreinberg "has told prosecutors that Mr. Alexander offered him a 'name your price' bribe if he would take sole blame for the fraud, according to people familiar with the situation. The alleged bribe started with offers of $2 million and then $5 million, according to prior court documents from prosecutors. At a hearing yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, Mr. Kreinberg admitted to helping Mr. Alexander select particularly favorable dates on which to grant options, using hindsight. 'I was asked by the CEO to bring him a printout of the company's trading prices over a past year period to enable him to select the 'as of' date that would be used for the exercise price of the option grant,' he said in court."

Bloomberg (10/25, Hurtado) reports that "Kreinberg implicated his former boss as he pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in the U.S. probe of illegal manipulation of employee stock option grants." Bloomberg continues, "Former Comverse Chief Executive Officer Jacob 'Kobi' Alexander directed a scheme to systematically backdate stock option grants, Kreinberg claimed today in Brooklyn federal court. Contrary to Comverse's securities filings, Kreinberg told U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis 'the company was in fact issuing backdated options with an exercise price lower than the fair market value on the grant date.' … Alexander was arrested in Namibia last month and is the subject of a U.S. extradition request. Kreinberg, who faces a possible 15-year prison sentence, agreed to cooperate with the government in its prosecution of Alexander, and in related civil lawsuits as part of a separate $2.4 million settlement with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission." Bloomberg notes, "The U.S. Justice Department is trying to persuade the government of Namibia to return Alexander to the U.S. to face charges related to stock-option backdating, including conspiracy, securities fraud, making false filings to regulators and money laundering."

The New York Law Journal (10/25, Bar, Perrotta) reports, "Kreinberg, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in the Eastern District U.S. Attorney's Office, is the first person in the country to plead guilty to illegally backdating stock options. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud, and one count of securities fraud. He faces up to 15 years in prison and $1.2 million in fines when he is sentenced Feb. 23. He also could be ordered to pay tens of millions in restitution." The Journal adds, "Kreinberg has separately settled civil charges against him. As part of an agreement with the SEC, he is permanently suspended from practicing as an accountant and must pay $2.4 million in disgorgement and prejudgment interest."

AFP (10/25) reports, "The investigation was led by the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, but it was triggered in early March when a Wall Street Journal reporter became suspicious about Comverse's stock option practices."

DOJ_NMG_0086311

Skilling Sentence Ends Enron Era, But Corruption Probes Continue. The Washington Post (10/25, D1, Johnson, 748K) reports, "The sentencing Monday of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling ended the saga of the scandal-ridden Houston energy company and effectively closed the book on an era of high-profile corporate malfeasance. … Hours after a judge sentenced Skilling to more than 24 years in prison, the leaders of the Enron Task Force announced that they would close up shop," but "there were fresh signals about the direction post-Enron corporate crime enforcement would take. A new wave of investigations is targeting executive greed, insider trading and investment pools known as hedge funds. … 'There is an awful lot to do in the world of corporate fraud,' said Chip Burrus, assistant director in the FBI's criminal investigation division. Policing corporate malfeasance after Enron, it seems, won't be slow -- only different." The Post notes, "Timothy J. Coleman, a former prosecutor and Justice Department official, predicted that the legions of investigators hired by securities regulators, federal prosecutors and the FBI will pay lasting dividends because they will become a 'standing army' ready to target business wrongdoing."

NEC Says It IS Subject Of SEC Investigation. The Financial Times (10/25, Nakamoto) reports NEC, "the Japanese electronics group, said on Tuesday it was being investigated by the US Securities and Exchange Commission in connection with its delay in filing results for the last financial year. NEC said it had received 'a letter of informal inquiry from the SEC requesting voluntary production of certain documents' following the delay to its annual results. The Japanese group gave no further information but said it intended 'to co-operate fully with the SEC in connection with this inquiry'. NEC earlier this month received notice from Nasdaq that it could face de-listing as a result of its failure to provide its annual report for last year. … The Japanese group said it intended to maintain its Nasdaq listing but could not say when it might be able to provide last year's results under US GAAP."

Corporate Scandals Highlight Work Of General Counsels. The Legal Times (10/25, Mandel) reports, "Earlier this year, Judge J. Michael Luttig of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals stunned the legal world by surrendering his lifetime appointment to the bench in favor of the top legal job at Boeing Co. In his letter of resignation, Luttig called the job a 'singular opportunity,' one that he could not pass up. Luttig's move did not come as a surprise, however, to the in-house bar, which has noted that the career door that used to swing between government and law firms now revolves with a corporate stop as well for many top lawyers." The Times continues, "The demand for top legal talent in in-house departments has been growing as increased regulation and an increasing emphasis on corporate accountability have put greater emphasis on the attorney's role in helping to foster an ethical corporate culture. … In the current environment it is not enough for companies to be ethical and compliant; they have to be seen as such. As a result, companies are evaluating candidates for top in-house positions on the strength of their reputation for scrupulous ethics, judgment and objective decision-making beyond narrowly defined legal issues. In addition, law firms are seeing the benefits of seeking out new partners from in-house ranks because of the perspective on client service (and potential clients) that these lawyers can bring."

Study Highlights Cost Of Options Scandal. The San Jose Mercury News (10/25, Poletti) reports, "A financial advisory firm has released an analysis estimating the stock-option backdating scandal has cost at least 152 companies nationwide about $10.3 billion." The News continues, "A recent tally by institutional shareholder advisory firm, Glass Lewis in San Francisco, found that at least 152 companies have announced internal reviews, inquiries from the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department subpoenas related to their stock options granting practices." The News adds, "Glass-Lewis said its internal analysis also showed that the backdating scandal has resulted in an unadjusted initial decline of $5.1 billion in the companies' market value, based on the initial drop in their stock prices. The analysis also pegged an additional $5.2 billion in additional pre-tax compensation costs to the companies. … The firm said that at least 44 executives and directors at 24 companies have been fired or resigned to date. Of the 152 companies nationwide, 42 have headquarters in Silicon Valley." The News notes, "In another development Tuesday, Electronics For Imaging, a developer of technology for high-speed printers and copiers, became the latest Silicon Valley company to announce an investigation into its stock options granting practices."

NYTimes Praises Senate Panels For Investigating SEC Pequot Probe. The New York Times (10/25, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "Among the worst impressions the Securities and Exchange Commission could foster is that it pulls punches on delicate matters involving the rich, powerful and politically connected. Now two Senate committees are investigating whether the commission staff, rather than doggedly pursuing possible insider trading by the hedge fund Pequot Capital Management, held back when it came to taking the testimony of a prominent Wall Street player." A "full airing is in everyone's interest."

DOJ_NMG_0086312

CRIMINAL LAW:

Hastert, Reynolds Testify Before House Ethics Subcommittee Investigating Foley Scandal. The CBS Evening News (10/24, story 4, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "House Speaker Dennis Hastert testified before the ethics committee, which is investigating Mark Foley's e-mail to former pages. Hastert has said he didn't find out about the nature of the emails until late last month, but Congressman Tom Reynolds, who also testified, claimed he warned Hastert about them this past spring."

The Chicago Tribune (10/25, Dorning, Clough, 623K) reports, "Speaking briefly to reporters from a prepared statement after his testimony, Hastert said he told the panel 'that they needed to move quickly to get to the bottom of this issue, including who knew about the sexually explicit messages and when they knew about it.' Hastert, who testified behind closed doors for just under three hours, added that he answered investigators' questions 'to the best of my ability.'" Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean "said the speaker would not answer any questions about his testimony." The AP (10/25, Taylor) reports Hastert "urged ethics investigators to work quickly to unravel the congressional pages scandal Tuesday, testifying before them just after a GOP lawmaker whose recollections differ from his." Yesterday's testimony from Hastert and NRCC chair Rep. Tom Reynolds "could signal that the four-member ethics committee is nearing the end of its testimony-taking phase." The AP adds, "Hastert has said he first learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a former Louisiana page…just last month. … But Hastert's appearance followed that of Reynolds, who has said he learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to the Louisiana teen last spring and discussed the matter with Hastert. Hastert has said he didn't recall that conversation. He has also assured conservative activist Paul Weyrich that Majority Leader John Boehner was wrong when Boehner said he and Hastert discussed Foley's problems last spring." Hastert "and some other Republicans have suggested revelations about the messages were timed to hurt the GOP in next month's elections."

A number of news reports focus on the "drama" surrounding Hastert's appearance. The Washington Post (10/25, A3, Weisman, 748K) reports, "The twinning of Hastert's appearance with that of Reynolds surprised House Republican and Democratic leadership aides, and it only heightened the drama of the committee's deliberations. Hastert is the first House speaker to testify before the committee since Newt Gingrich discussed a much-criticized book deal in 1997. But in that case, committee members scheduled Gingrich's testimony at night, sparing him a daylight walk through the throng of reporters and camera crews camped outside the hearing room."

NBC Nightly News (10/24, story 3, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Across town a funny thing happened today outside the hearing room of the House ethics committee. The Speaker of the House walked in while stunned reporters looked on. It was thought that Dennis Hastert would testify but his sudden appearance today was a surprise." CNN's The Situation Room (10/24, Blitzer) said Hastert's "arrival on the Hill was a secret, as was his decision today to show up and testify before the House Ethics Committee."

The New York Times (10/25, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports, "On this day, two weeks before Election Day, Mr. Hastert had planned to be hopscotching from district to district across America, working to preserve Republican control in the House and protect his own seat of power."

The Hill (10/25, Sherman) reports Hastert "sneaked into the ethics committee, avoiding public areas of the Capitol in an apparent move to avoid reporters. As he exited his offices, he utilized the seldom-used Strom Thurmond hallway, and an esoteric attic elevator transported him to the basement. U.S. Capitol Police officers blocked the staircase between the crypt and the basement. Hastert's entourage, which included all three members of his communications staff, three Capitol police officers and his attorney, escorted him to the ethics committee hearing room. Hastert attempted to dodge photographers by repeatedly moving behind his staff."

Hastert Seen As Unlikely To Retain Speakership. The Chicago Tribune (10/25, Dorning, Clough, 623K) reports, "Republican officials said confidence in Hastert…has ebbed as the controversy over Foley has continued. Foley resigned last month. Though the party establishment concluded weeks ago that an ouster of Hastert prior to the election would be counterproductive, Republican officials privately indicated it would be difficult for Hastert to hold on to his leadership post afterward, even if the party retains the majority. At least one key Hastert aide recently explored potential new employment, according to a source familiar with the discussion."

CNN Poll Finds 52% Say Republicans Do Not Have High Ethical Standards. CNN's The Situation Room (10/24, Blitzer) reported that "our new poll shows most Americans, 52 percent, say Republicans do not have high ethical standards. But they're not impressed by the other party either. Forty-six percent of those surveyed don't think Democrats have high ethical standards."

FBI Has Not "Substantiated" Allegations Against Harman And AIPAC. The Washington Post (10/25, A6, Eggen, 748K) reports, "Federal law enforcement sources confirmed yesterday that the FBI opened an investigation in 2005 into whether Rep. Jane Harman improperly enlisted the aid of" AIPAC, "but they cautioned that no evidence of wrongdoing was found. The inquiry focused on whether Harman had made promises to…AIPAC in exchange for its support of her desire to become chairman of the House intelligence committee if Democrats take control of the House, several law enforcement sources said. Although the case is still considered open, officials said, the allegations have not been substantiated, and there has been no significant investigative activity on the issue in recent months. The inquiry was first reported by Time magazine."

DOJ_NMG_0086313

FBI Investigating Renzi's Role In Arizona Land Sale. The Washington Post (10/25, A4, Weisman, Eggen, 748K) reports, "US prosecutors in Arizona have opened a preliminary investigation into whether Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) twice pressured landowners to buy a 480-acre parcel owned by his former business partner, a major backer of Renzi's political campaign, according to federal law enforcement sources." The deal "ultimately netted the business partner a $3 million profit, according to Arizona land records." The Arizona transaction "has drawn the interest of the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI's Phoenix field office. Three law enforcement officials said both are investigating Renzi's involvement in two land deals -- one of which was not completed -- designed to put the 480 acres under federal protection from development in exchange for land more fit for commercial development." The inquiry "was revealed by two liberal Arizona blogs last weekend."

The New York Times (10/25, Johnston, 1.21M) reports, "Federal authorities in Arizona have opened an inquiry into whether Representative Rick Renzi introduced legislation that benefited a military contractor that employs his father, law enforcement officials said Tuesday. The officials said the inquiry was at an early stage and that no search warrants had been issued, suggesting that investigators had yet to determine whether there was a basis to open a formal investigation or empanel a grand jury." Law enforcement officials "said that the most serious accusation involved Mr. Renzi's sponsorship of legislation in 2003 that appeared to indirectly benefit the ManTech International Corporation, a communications company based in Virginia that employs Mr. Renzi's father, Eugene, a retired Army general, as executive vice president."

Experts Say Ban Will Not Stop Online Gambling. The AP (10/25, Goldman) reports, "Gamblers may look over their shoulder now, but experts say a new Internet gambling ban won't keep bettors from ponying up, just turn them on to overseas payment services out of the law's reach. … 'It has put a terrible scare into people,' said I. Nelson Rose, who teaches gambling law at Whittier Law School. 'But it won't by any means wipe out Internet gambling.'" The AP continues, "The fright swept through the $12 billion industry on the heels of the recent arrests of two gambling company executives and a new law President Bush signed Oct. 13 that seeks to ban most online gambling and criminalizes funds transfers. … The law has wiped out billions of dollars in shareholder value of British companies, leaving the industry's future in doubt as U.S. lawmakers initially trumpeted they had found a way to halt bets coming from America. But serious questions remain about whether the legislation can be effective in stopping U.S. residents from playing poker or betting on sports." The AP adds, "The 'Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act' goes after the money, not the millions of players, which would be nearly impossible to enforce. It will essentially try to choke off the way Americans fund their gambling habits, hoping to prevent the transfer of dollars to the popular Internet sites. … It's also widely understood that the law has online poker in its gun sights, identifying it as a game of chance - something the poker companies dispute. They believe poker is a game of skill and therefore not subject to the new rules. … But they're fearful nonetheless."

Former Refco CFO Charged With Defrauding Investors. The AP (10/25, Neumeister) reports, "The former chief financial officer of Refco Inc., one of the world's biggest commodities brokerages, was accused in an indictment Tuesday of defrauding investors in a scheme that resulted in losses of more than $1 billion." The AP continues, "An indictment in U.S. District Court in New York charged Robert C. Trosten with conspiracy, securities fraud, false filings and wire fraud. It also added new charges to the case against Refco's former chief executive officer, Phillip R. Bennett. … Prosecutors said Trosten assisted Bennett in hiding hundreds of millions of dollars of debt owed to Refco by a company controlled by Bennett. … The superseding indictment also added new charges against Bennett concerning fraud against holders of Refco's bonds." The AP adds, "Trosten, 37, of Sarasota, Fla., was scheduled to make his initial court appearance Wednesday. Bennett, 57, of Gladstone, N.J., is free on $50 million bail and subject to electronic monitoring. … A lawyer for Bennett, Gary P. Naftalis, said: 'Mr. Bennett reaffirms that he is not guilty of any of the government's charges and looks forward to his day in court.'"

FBI Investigating LANL Classified Documents Found In Police Drug Raid. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/25, Jordan) reports, "A drug bust at a trailer park in New Mexico turned up what appeared to be classified documents taken from the Los Alamos nuclear weapons laboratory, authorities said Tuesday. Local police found the documents while arresting a man suspected of domestic violence and dealing methamphetamine from his mobile home, said Sgt. Chuck Ney of the Los Alamos, N.M., Municipal Police Department. … Police alerted the FBI to the secret documents, which agents traced back to a woman linked to the drug dealer, officials said. The woman is a contract employee at Los Alamos National Laboratory, according to an FBI official who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the case." The AP notes FBI Special Agent Bill Elwell said that the bureau "and the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque were 'evaluating the information obtained as a result of the search warrant.'"

DOJ_NMG_0086314

Safavian Defense Submits Support Letters For Friday Sentencing. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/25, Apuzzo) reports, "A Utah congressman and a former aide to a Virginia congressman have written letters in support of former Bush administration official David Safavian, who is trying to avoid jail time in the Jack Abramoff investigation." Rep. Chris Cannon wrote the court for Friday's sentencing, "When David was my chief of staff, he worked tirelessly in my Washington office. He would come in early, stay late, and devote his undivided attention to the needs of the people in Utah's 3rd Congressional District." Rep. Tom Davis' former Government Reform Committee staff director Melissa Wojciak "wrote that Safavian 'always ensured that he was responsible in managing the taxpayer's dollars.'" The AP adds, "Defense attorneys wrote that Safavian did not harm anybody and committed no fraudulent acts. They have presented a list of past cases they believe are comparable," including Clinton HUD Sec. Henry Cisneros, "who paid a $10,000 fine for lying to the FBI about payments to an ex-mistres."

Rep. Cannon Asks For Leniency For Former Employee Safavian. The Salt Lake Tribune (10/25, Gehrke) reports, "Rep. Chris Cannon is asking a judge for leniency for his former chief of staff, David Safavian, who was convicted with obstructing a federal investigation into his ties with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. … 'When David was my chief of staff, he worked tirelessly in my Washington office. He would come in early, stay late, and devote his undivided attention to the needs of the people in Utah's Third Congressional District,' Cannon wrote in a letter quoted by Safavian's attorneys in court filings." The Tribune continues, "Prosecutors have asked Judge Paul Friedman to sentence Safavian to as many as 37 months in prison. He was convicted of four counts of obstruction of justice and false statements for lying to investigators about his relationship with Abramoff." The Tribune adds, "Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, argued that Safavian has been a committed public servant and family man, that his career has been ruined by his arrest and conviction, and asked the judge to impose probation or home confinement. … 'The government's caricature cannot detract from the fact that, as acquaintances, supervisors, and colleagues attest, Mr. Safavian's history and character reflects dedication to his family, his community, and country,' Van Gelder said. . … Prosecutors said it would be a 'miscarriage of justice' not to impose prison time."

Suburban Chicago Mayor Pleads Not Guilty To Bribery Charges. The Chicago Tribune (10/25, 623K) reports, "Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase pleaded not guilty Tuesday to a five-count federal indictment charging him with taking more than $420,000 in kickbacks for steering local business owners to buy insurance from a longtime friend and his son. … The charges allege that the kickback scheme originated more than 30 years ago with Blase's close friend, Ralph Weiner, who ran an insurance agency bearing his name. After Weiner's death in 2005, his son, Steven Weiner, continued to deliver the monthly bribes to Blase, prosecutors charged." The Tribune notes, "Lawyers for Steven Weiner and Paul Zdon, a former employee of the Weiner insurance agency, have said both are cooperating with the FBI and expect to plead guilty to mail-fraud charges." The AP (10/25) also reports on Blase's plea.

Jury Finds Man Guilty Of Murdering NYTimes Editor. The New York Times (10/25, Stout) reports, "The second of two men accused of killing a retired reporter for The New York Times in January was convicted on Tuesday of murder, robbery and other charges that could put him in prison for the rest of his life. The defendant, Percey Jordan Jr., 42, was found guilty in the slaying of the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, 63, who was beaten and robbed near his home in Washington on the night of Jan. 6 and died two days later. … Jurors deliberated for a day before finding Mr. Jordan guilty of first-degree murder or premeditated murder during commission of a felony; second-degree murder; robbery; conspiracy; and credit-card fraud. The second defendant was Mr. Jordan's cousin Michael C. Hamlin, 24, who pleaded guilty on Sept. 20 to second-degree murder, robbery and conspiracy to commit robbery and testified against Mr. Jordan."

The Washington Post (10/25, B1, Cauvin) reports, "The crime stunned many city residents, particularly those who live in neighborhoods thought to be safe, such as the one where Rosenbaum was robbed and where such random and violent crime is rare."

FBI Investigating Stolen Art In Deceased New Yorker's Collection. The New York Times (10/25, Barry, 1.21M) reports, "If it was the desire of the man who called himself William M. V. Kingsland to be remembered in the salons of New York long after he died, to be the subject of the kind of scandal-whiffed conversation he once so enjoyed…then the man who called himself William M. V. Kingsland has succeeded. He died in early spring in his one-bedroom apartment on the Upper East Side," and "this summer…his longtime friends learned that his real name was…Melvyn Kohn. Then, last week, they learned that several pieces in his private art collection were" stolen. "Now the Federal Bureau of Investigation is digging into the nature of his collection, two auction houses are cleaning up the artistic mess he left behind, and the Office of the Public Administrator for Manhattan is trying to sort out the increasingly muddy Estate." The Times notes, "A central question for everyone, of course, is Mr. Kingsland's role in all this. Was he a thief, a fence, or just an innocent collector of pretty things that happened to be hot?"

DOJ_NMG_0086315

FBI, Arizona Police Investigating Theft Of Power Line Maintenance Trucks, Tools. The AP (10/25) reports, "Thieves in Yuma County stole three specialized power line maintenance trucks and more than $100,000 in tools used to work on major power lines over the weekend, and the FBI is seeking the public's help tracking down the thieves. The trucks and tools were stolen from the U.S. Department of Energy's Gila Substation Maintenance Facility," and "specialized knowledge is needed to use them. There is no known terror threat from the theft and young people are known to hang out in the area, said FBI Special Agent Deb McCarley. However, the specialized nature of the equipment and its possible use is raising concerns." The AP notes, "The FBI and the Yuma County Sheriff's Office are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the persons responsible."

FBI, SEC Investigating Online Brokerage Account Hackings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/25, Funk) reports, "The government has launched investigations into fraud cases in which computer hackers apparently manipulated client accounts at two of the nation's largest electronic brokerages, stealing millions of dollars." TD Ameritrade COO Randy MacDonald "said the fraud that his company experienced during the quarter was part of an industrywide problem and that the company was working with the FBI and other law enforcement agencies." Ameritrade and E-Trade officials "said that while hackers manipulated individual accounts, their own computer systems remained secure." The AP notes, "The Securities and Exchange Commission, like the FBI, is investigating hacking fraud throughout the online brokerage industry."

US Banks, Insurers Expand Online Security Assessment Program. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A4, Guth, 2.03M) reports, "A group of U.S. banks and insurance companies concerned about data security are expanding a program for assessing the security of online banking and related financial services. The Financial Services Roundtable, an industry trade group, said that five banks have joined an effort to standardize how they judge the security of companies that provide online services. The new participants are Bear Stearns Cos., Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Regions Financial Corp., Wachovia Corp. and Morgan Stanley." The Journal notes that the Shared Assessment Program "formalizes procedures that have historically been handled differently by each financial institution, an approach that the members say is costly and isn't as effective in assuring a high level of security."

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Online Investment Fraud. The Oregonian (10/25, Denson, 329K) reports Frank Hendricks of Florida "pleaded guilty Tuesday to heading a Corvallis-based Internet investment scam that victimized 1,500 investors in the United States and Canada. … When sentenced in February, he faces as long as 26 years in prison and as much as $1.3 million in fines, plus mandatory restitution." The Oregonian notes that Hendricks and Scott Guenther allegedly "created a CD-ROM and electronic book-marketing business named Pacific Achievements International. Guenther is scheduled to plead guilty to some of the charges Dec. 5 in Eugene, authorities say." The Oregonian adds, "In early 2004, the FBI seized two residences purchased by Hendricks in Shalimar, Fla., and two residences in Gig Harbor, Wash., from a company promoter, federal prosecutors reported."

FBI Investigating Child Porn Allegation Against Connecticut Episcopal Music Director. The New York Times (10/25, Cowan, 1.21M) reports from Greenwich, Conn., "Federal authorities are investigating whether the longtime music director of a prominent Episcopal church here, who was a mentor to thousands of children, was involved in child pornography, according to people involved in the investigation. The head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's cybercrimes squad in New Haven, Tim Egan, said 'there is a pending investigation' into the matter, but declined to comment further. Susan Marks, a spokeswoman for Christ Church…said that Robert F. Tate, the music director, had recently resigned, and that the church's membership had been notified." The Times notes, 'It was unclear whether the reputed pornographic images that piqued the criminal investigation were stored on a church-owned computer or not."

NBC News (10/24, Sandler, 5:51 p.m.) reported on its Web site that "sources say that earlier this month the FBI searched a building on the grounds of Christ Church…after obtaining information that allegedly implicates" Tate. "A grand jury is convening in the case, and NBC has learned that other top church officials have been called to testify." NBC notes, "Located in one of the country's most wealthy communities, Christ Church in Greenwich has attracted an affluent membership since its inception in the 1830s. Former President George H.W. Bush attended services in his youth and, as president, returned to the church in 1992 for the funeral of his mother," and "a Christ Church minister reportedly signed the baptism records of President George W. Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0086316

Massachusetts State Trooper To Plead Guilty To Child Enticement Charges. The AP (10/25) reports, "A state trooper charged with trying to solicit sex from an undercover officer he thought was a 14-year-old boy plans to plead guilty in federal court, according to court documents, and has resigned from the force. Brian O'Hare was charged with using the Internet to entice an individual under 18 for sexual activity." The AP notes, "O'Hare allegedly had several sexually explicit chats with an FBI agent who was posing as a 14-year-old high school boy, and the two arranged to meet at the Medford Mall, authorities said. O'Hare was arrested by FBI agents in February after he showed up."

PG County Police Attribute Decline In Crime To Staffing Decisions. The Washington Post (10/25, B2, Partlow) reports Prince George's County police "have attributed a decline in violent crime and property offenses this year to more officers on the streets, the availability of overtime funds to keep experienced officers working and investments in new technology. Compared with the first nine months of last year, the number of homicides in the county has declined by 28 percent (from 128 to 92), rapes by 11.7 percent (163 to 144) and carjackings by 37 percent (from 565 to 356), police said. In preliminary statistics compiled by the Maryland State Police that cover the first half of the year, Prince George's showed a total decline in major crimes of 15.1 percent, the largest percentage decrease among the 23 Maryland counties and Baltimore."

Ohio Executes Cult Leader For Murders Of Five Followers. The AP (10/25, McCarthy) reports, "Ohio executed a religious cult leader Tuesday for the murder of a family of five followers who were taken one at a time to a barn, bound and shot to death. The youngest was a girl just 7 years old." The AP continues, "Jeffrey Lundgren, 56, died by injection at 10:26 a.m. at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility for the deaths of the Avery family." The AP adds, "The evidence against Lundgren was compelling. … Upset by what he thought was the Avery family's lack of faith, arranged a dinner hosted by cult members. Afterward, he and his followers led the Averys one by one - the father first, young Karen last - to their deaths while the others unknowingly cleaned up after dinner. A chain saw was used to muffle the gunfire. … Lundgren argued at his trial in 1990 that he was prophet of God and therefore not worthy of the death penalty." The AP notes, "Lundgren's attorneys had tried to put off the execution, arguing that he should be allowed to join a lawsuit challenging Ohio's use of lethal injection as cruel and unusual punishment. They said his execution had more of a chance of being painful because he was diabetic and overweight at 275 pounds. … Late Monday, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati issued an order allowing the execution to go forward. The U.S. Supreme Court refused a last-minute request to stop his execution Tuesday, and Gov. Bob Taft denied clemency."

Maryland Delegate Accused Of Foreclosure-Rescue Fraud. The Baltimore Sun (10/25, Butler) reports, "Anne Arundel County police are looking into whether Del. William A. 'Tony' McConkey might have engaged in criminal acts during a real estate deal that he is being sued over, although a police spokesman said that the review is not 'a full-blown investigation.' Police said they are reviewing claims by Teresa Milligan, 42, that the Severna Park Republican committed foreclosure-rescue fraud, in violation of a new law that has civil and criminal penalties. She filed a civil suit Monday in Anne Arundel County Circuit Court alleging that McConkey tricked her into signing over her townhouse to him."

New Technologies Spur Wave Of Retail Crime. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, A1, Zimmerman), in a front-page story titled, "Creative Crooks: As Shoplifters Use High-Tech Scams, Retail Losses Rise," reports, "Using sophisticated tactics such as bar-code forgery and fraudulent gift cards, criminals are stealing larger amounts, and it has gotten harder to catch them. Law-enforcement officers say many of the high-tech thieves belong to organized-crime rings that have turned retail theft into big business. And the Internet has made it easier for them to find buyers for the loot. Retail crime rose to about $37 billion in 2005 from $31 billion in 2003, according to a study conducted by the University of Florida, increasing almost twice as fast as retail sales over that period. Store employees, who have access to merchandise and familiarity with antitheft systems, account for 48% of retail-crime losses, according to the 2005 study. But professional thieves, many of them using sophisticated new methods, also are responsible for a big part, says Joseph LaRocca, vice president of loss prevention at the National Retail Federation, a trade group. The value of merchandise snatched in the average shoplifting incident has more than tripled to $855 in 2005, from $265 in 2003, the University of Florida survey reported."

DOJ_NMG_0086317

CIVIL LAW:

COPA Litigation Begins Final Round. The Legal Intelligencer (10/25, Duffy) reports, "It's not all that often that a month-long trial begins in federal court where everyone knows from the start which side is likely to win. … But that was the situation Monday in ACLU v. Gonzales as the final round of litigation got underway in a challenge to the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), a law which threatens criminal penalties for commercial Web site operators that allow children to access material that is 'harmful to minors.'" The Intelligencer continues, "Eight years after it was passed, COPA has never gone into effect because Senior U.S. District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr. granted a preliminary injunction that, after two trips to the U.S. Supreme Court, won the approval of a 5-4 court. … Although the majority was a slim one, the high court's holding was that the ACLU and its co-plaintiffs are 'likely to succeed' in proving that COPA is unconstitutional. … But 'likely' doesn't mean certainly, and the Justice Department isn't giving up the fight." The Intelligencer adds, "In preparation for Monday's trial, Reed ordered lawyers on both sides to file their proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. … Ordinarily, such briefs are filed after a nonjury trial has concluded to aid the judge in his drafting of an opinion that announces his verdict. … But ACLU v. Gonzales is no ordinary case, and Reed apparently wanted the lawyers to provide a roadmap for the trial, which is expected to boil down to a battle of the experts."

Group Claims More FOIA Resources Needed. Government Executive (10/25, Pulliam) reports, "A recent Justice Department report on agencies' compliance with a presidential mandate to improve processing of requests for government documents failed to address resource constraints, an independent research institute has charged." GE continues, "In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last week, the National Security Archive, a research institute and library located at The George Washington University, said the report did not acknowledge the scale of the challenge agencies face in reforming their Freedom of Information Act procedures. It avoided mentioning a lack of adequate funding and staffing, as well as the need for cross-agency leadership, the letter stated. … The executive order, signed by President Bush on Dec. 14, 2005, directs agencies to ensure that their FOIA implementation is citizen-centered and results-oriented. They must also appoint chief FOIA officers." GE adds, "The order states that any changes should be made using 'available resources' and 'existing agency staff.' The FOIA chief can, however, recommend adjustments to agency personnel and funding as "may be necessary to carry out" the order's policies. … Daniel J. Metcalfe, director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy, said there was little discussion of resources in the Oct. 16 report because the agency FOIA improvement plans reviewed in it were due 'only six months after the executive order was signed, in the middle of a budget cycle.'"

The Federal Times (10/25, Curl) reports, "The National Security Archive, criticizing a recent report by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, has called on Congress to hold hearings to determine if genuine progress is being made in agency administration of the Freedom of Information Act." The Times continues, "Gonzales' report, issued Oct. 16, highlighted progress agencies are making to comply with a presidential directive, issued last year, that requires agencies to name chief FOIA officers and create improvement plans to streamline the processing of FOIA requests. Gonzales wrote that the executive order 'has had an immediate and widespread positive effect on the operations of the federal agencies that administer the FOIA.'" The Times adds, "In letters to both Gonzales and leaders in the Senate Judiciary and House Government Reform committees, the Washington-based research group — which collects and publishes documents obtained through FOIA requests — called the report 'rosy' and said it 'ignored critical challenges facing the federal FOIA system.' … 'While the AG report is optimistic about the agencies' newfound embrace of technology/automation, FOIA request status tracking and backlog reduction, it fails to provide an honest assessment of where agencies' FOIA programs stand today and what it will take to bring their FOIA programs into compliance with the law,' the letters said."

Bankruptcy Judge Gives Dana Corp More Time For Bonus Plan. Dow Jones (10/25, Kary) reports, "Dana Corp. on Tuesday won more time to develop a new legal strategy to obtain a package of bonuses for its chief executive and other top executives." Dow Jones continues, "Judge Burton Lifland of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan, who previously rejected the proposed bonuses, approved the auto-parts suppliers request to further its legal work on a schedule that would permit a Nov. 8 final hearing on its request for a long-term incentive plan for executives. … Even so, Lifland continued to question whether the timeline was too 'aggressive' and whether Dana's strategy made sense. 'Frankly, I'm not fully comprehensive of the strategy of this motion,' Lifland said." Dow Jones adds, "The Toledo, Ohio, company has asked Lifland to reconsider his ruling striking down a program that would have paid Chief Executive Michael J. Burns $9.1 million over the next few years _ including a $6 million bonus once Dana exits Chapter 11 protection. … The Justice Department has called the request improper because it is in effect asking the court guidance on how to get the bonus plan approved. … 'We are not as of yet a part of the growing consensus in this case,' said Andrew Velez-Rivera, speaking in court Tuesday as a trial attorney representing the Justice Department's Office of the U.S. Trustee. That office monitors bankruptcy cases to ensure that participants comply with bankruptcy law."

DOJ_NMG_0086318

WSJournal Says Bankruptcy Overhaul Law Working. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, 2.03M) says in an editorial, "When President Bush signed the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act last year, Democrats and 'consumer' groups not only cried foul but predicted doom. A year after the law was enacted, however, the evidence suggests that their fears were misplaced, not to say cynical." Today, "the number of bankruptcy filings is down some two-thirds from what it's been in recent years. Partly this has to do with people rushing to file for Chapter 7 before the law took effect last October. But there are also indications that people are responding to the new incentives." In the past, "about 20% of bankruptcy filers have had incomes above the national median. But since the law took effect, nearly all filers are below the median. One plausible explanation is that many past filers were abusing the system."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

NAACP Calls For DOJ Probe Of Richmond Police Shooting. The Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch (10/25, Nolan) reports, "Leaders of the state and Richmond-area branches of the NAACP yesterday decried the $2,500 fine imposed against a former police officer convicted of manslaughter in the May 29, 2004, shooting death of Santanna Olavarria." The Times-Dispatch continues, "On Friday, a jury convicted Michael Couture, 33, of manslaughter. Two hours later, the jury returned with a recommended sentence of $2,500 and no jail time, which the judge imposed. Couture could have faced up to 10 years in prison. … 'This sends a message that black people's lives have very little value to citizens, the criminal justice system and all other institutions in this society,' the NAACP leaders said in a joint statement issued at a news conference yesterday afternoon." The Times-Dispatch adds, "The leaders also called for the Justice Department to pursue a civil-rights investigation into the shooting, in which then-officer Couture fatally shot the 21-year-old Olavarria following a traffic stop in the city's East End. … In February 2005, Police Chief Rodney Monroe forwarded all of the department's police-involved shooting cases to the Justice Department for investigation, including the Olavarria shooting. To date, there have been no federal charges filed in the Olavarria case. … Couture is believed to be the first police officer in the modern history of the city's police department to have been convicted of a homicide while on duty."

Two Mississippi Jailers Charged With Inmate Assaults. The AP (10/25, Mohr) reports from Jackson, MS, "A former jailer at a regional prison in Louisville has pleaded guilty to assaulting an inmate and is working with federal prosecutors in a case against two former correctional supervisors accused of similar crimes, the U.S. Justice Department said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Former Winston-Choctaw County Regional Correctional Facility Deputy Warden Scotty L. Graham and former Captain David G. Mitchell are charged with violating the inmates' civil rights, conspiring to obstruct justice and providing false statements, the Justice Department said. … Former officer Marcus Coleman already has pleaded guilty to similar charges, the Justice Department said, and has agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors." The AP adds, "An indictment unsealed Tuesday in Washington accuses Graham and Mitchell of assaulting an inmate in October 2001 with a device known as a 'shock stick.' Mitchell is charged with an additional civil rights violation for allegedly attacking another inmate the same day. … Details of the alleged attacks were not available. … 'The details will come out if there's any sort of trial proceeding,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson."

Judge To Lift DOJ Oversight Of Hawaii Mental Health Plan. The Honolulu Advertiser (10/25, Kobayashi) reports, "A federal judge this morning cleared the way for the lifting on Nov. 30 of the federal oversight over the state's efforts to comply with a community mental health plan to serve Hawai'i's estimated 11,000 seriously mentally ill residents." The Advertiser continues, "U. S. District Judge David Ezra essentially approved the latest federal magistrate's status report on the state efforts. … Although U. S. Magistrate Judge Kevin Chang could not say in his report in August that the state met a June 30 deadline to be in substantial compliance with the plan, he said the state made progress and he recommended the lifting of the oversight on Nov. 30. … 'This case will simply terminate (on Nov. 30),' Judge Ezra said." The Advertiser adds, "Attorney General Mark Bennett said even with the lifting of the federal oversight, the state will continue to seek to improve the mental health services. … 'We will keep our noses to the grindstone,' he said. … The state has been under federal oversight for 15 years as a result of a Justice Department lawsuit alleging violations the constitutional rights of patients at Hawai'i State Hospital. … The hospital emerged from the oversight in late 2004, but the oversight continued over the community plan aimed at providing adequate services to the mentally ill in the community. … Justice Department attorneys agreed to the lifting of the oversight on Nov. 30 after the state raised concerns about whether the federal oversight could continue beyond June 30."

DOJ_NMG_0086319

Studies Finds Racial Disparities In US Health Care. The Washington Post (10/25, Lee, 748K) reports that three new studies "in today's issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association…add to the voluminous evidence that the US health-care system works differently for minorities than for whites despite years of efforts to erase racial disparities." But "while the persistent disparities are well-documented, the causes remain the focus of research and debate. One explanation is that minorities tend to be poorer and less educated, with less access to care. And they tend to live in places where doctors and hospitals provide lower quality care than elsewhere. Others suspect cultural or biological differences play a role, and there is a long-running debate about whether subtle racism infects the health-care system." Now, "major medical organizations, private foundations and government health agencies have begun a host of studies, programs and initiatives in the past decade to try to close the gap."

Battle Over Virginia Gay Marriage Amendment Heats Up. The Washington Times (10/25, McLaughlin, 88K) reports that the battle over a proposed constitutional ban on same sex marriage in Virginia "is heating up as both sides of the debate deliver their final sales pitches two weeks before the Nov. 7 election. … Political analysts agree that the amendment could motivate conservatives to turn out for [GOP Sen. George] Allen, who is in a tight race against Democrat James H. Webb Jr. for the U.S. Senate. Mr. Webb opposes the amendment." The Times adds, "A poll conducted by The Washington Post earlier this month showed that 53 percent of Virginians support the marriage amendment, while 43 percent oppose it."

ANTITRUST:

Steel Tubing Firm Owned By Carlyle To Announce Merger. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, C5, Sender) reports, "John Maneely Co., a maker of steel tubing that is owned by private-equity giant Carlyle Group, is expected to announce a merger with Atlas Tube Inc. today in a deal valued at almost $1.5 billion, including stock and debt. The move to bulk up Maneely comes amid a boom in private-equity transactions, in which groups like Carlyle team up to buy companies they believe are undervalued -- often using elaborate financial arrangements -- with hopes of selling them later at a profit. While the proposed Maneely transaction is relatively small, it illustrates how not all these deals are about financial maneuvering. In this case, Carlyle is buying a rival manufacturer in order to gain economies of scale. Both Maneely and family-owned Atlas manufacture tubing used in the construction industry. The merger with Atlas, which is based in Harrow, Ontario, will make Carlyle the parent of the largest North American maker of steel tubing, with sales in excess of $2 billion, the companies say."

DOJ Criticized Over Case Involving Shipping Industry Price-Fixing. The Wall Street Journal's Holman W. Jenkins Jr. (10/25) writes, "Stolt-Nielsen is a name that won't ring many bells unless your peculiar interest is ocean shipping or knotty business cases that might tempt the Supreme Court's intervention. Or perhaps you are a corporate counsel for a major international company who just happened to be wondering, out of idle curiosity, whether the amnesty deals signed by the Justice Department in price-fixing cases are worth the paper they're written on." Stolt "finds itself hanging on whether the Supreme Court will hear its plea challenging the Justice Department's right to revoke an amnesty deal granted to Stolt in return for its help in cracking the cartel. … Justice granted Stolt immunity in return for Stolt coughing up the evidence to allow the successful prosecution of its fellow conspirators (two Norwegian firms, one Japanese). Only after the cases were concluded did Justice renege on grounds that Stolt's management had allowed the collusion to continue for several months between the whistleblower's internal hullabaloo and Stolt's decision to seek amnesty. Of course, Justice had known all this from day one and had chosen to sign the agreement and benefit from Stolt's help anyway. Nine petitioners, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, have joined Stolt in urging the Supreme Court to find that Justice has no business indicting Stolt and its employees until the lower courts have definitively ruled the amnesty deal invalid. In fact, the one federal court that looked into the matter ruled that Stolt had upheld its end of the bargain and ordered Justice to do likewise." Jenkins concludes, "With its brain a little less clouded by self-righteousness, the department might notice that its campaign to impose its dubious ideal of price regulation on the world might actually be helped if it grew up a little about antitrust."

Thompson Corp To Put Learning Unit Up For Sale. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, Berman, Cherney) reports, "Publishing and information giant Thomson Corp. is near a plan to put its Thomson Learning division on the auction block, in a deal that could fetch somewhere north of $5 billion, said people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "A deal would separate the company's second-largest unit as measured both by revenue and operating income. And it would concentrate Thomson's broad operating lines around legal, financial and scientific-information businesses. Analysts have been calling for a sale of Thomson Learning because it doesn't fit with the company's strategy of selling to professionals. The Learning division also wasn't moving as quickly to sales of electronic products as had been hoped." The Journal adds, "In recent years, Thomson has adeptly exited certain businesses that subsequently declined in profitability. Starting in the late 1990s, the company began shedding newspaper assets -- a move away from its historic roots as a Canadian-based newspaper empire -- to refashion itself as an information provider, with more of its services delivered online instead of in print. The sales included The Globe and Mail as well as other smaller dailies."

DOJ_NMG_0086320

EU Probing French Guarantee Loan To TVO. The AP (10/25) reports, "EU antitrust regulators on Tuesday opened an investigation into a French state guarantee for a euro570 million (US$716 million) bank loan to Finnish power company Teollisuuden Voima Oy that may have helped a French-German supplier win a contract to build Finland's newest nuclear plant." The AP continues, "The European Commission said the guarantee may have cut TVO's financial costs below normal market levels -- and could have encouraged the company to pick Areva-Siemens to build the first new European reactor in more than 10 years. … 'The guarantee may also have lowered the financial costs linked to the Areva/Siemens offer for TVO and, thereby helped the consortium Areva/Siemens to get the contract for the construction of the new nuclear power plant,' it said." The AP adds, "The EU executive said it would quiz France about the loan -- the interest rate and the guarantee premium TVO paid the French government -- to find out if it gave TVO a cheaper deal and an unfair advantage over rivals. … It said it was acting on two complaints about the guarantee the French state export credit insurance agency Coface gave to TVO to purchase equipment from France's Areva-Framatome."

ENVIRONMENT:

White House Solidly Behind Moratorium On Deep Water Bottom Trawling. The Christian Science Monitor (10/25, Spotts, 58K) reports that while less than one percent "of the world's commercial fish catch comes from trawling the ocean floor of the high seas," the "environmental impact is large - so large that many countries ban or severely restrict the practice within their territorial waters. This week, an international effort to curb bottom-trawling on the open ocean got a significant boost." In a letter to US negotiators "at the United Nations on Monday, a top State Department official set out Washington's unambiguous support for a halt to the practice 'until such time as conservation and management measures are adopted.'" The Administration's "stance on this critical marine-conservation issue may come as a surprise to some, given what many environmentalists call a shaky White House record on other environmental issues. But the president appears to have a deep personal concern about overfishing," says Joshua Reichert, "who heads the environment program at the Pew Charitable Trusts in Philadelphia."

US, EU Officials To Discuss Environmental Issues At Finland Meeting. The AP (10/25) reports, "Officials from the United States and the European Union - split over the Kyoto protocol - met Tuesday in Finland to discuss ways of improving cooperation on environmental issues." The AP continues, "The EU-U.S. meeting is a follow-up to a summit held in Austria in June, when both sides pledged to work 'more closely to address the serious and long-term challenge of climate change, biodiversity loss and air pollution.'" The AP adds, "Signed in 1997, the Kyoto protocol came into force in February 2005 after it was ratified by the required number of nations, including EU members. It requires signatories to cut emissions of six greenhouse gases to 5 percent below 1990 levels by 2012. … The United States rejected the Kyoto targets as placing an unnecessary burden on its economy, drawing criticism from environmental campaigners who say American pollution is responsible for one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gases. … No decisions will be taken at the Helsinki meeting, hosted by the Environment Ministry, but the aim is to explore ways of increasing trans-Atlantic cooperation on environmental questions, Finnish officials said."

Interior Department Delays Gulf Oil And Gas Leases In Settlement With Louisiana. The Wall Street Journal (10/25, Jackson Randall, 2.03M) reports, "The state of Louisiana and the U.S. Department of the Interior Tuesday said they have agreed to settle a lawsuit over oil and natural-gas leasing in federal waters off Louisiana's coast, with the agency agreeing to delay future offshore lease sales pending a complete environmental analysis. Meanwhile, Louisiana, under the pact, won't object to the department issuing leases to energy companies seeking to produce oil and natural gas under Lease Sale 200, which encompasses 20.4 million acres in the Western Gulf of Mexico." The state "sued the department in July, charging that it did not conduct a proper environmental review for its Lease Sale 200 because it didn't take into account coastal environmental damage caused by drilling as well as that brought on by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year. The move was seen as part of the state's battle to receive a bigger share of the revenue generated by oil and gas produced in federal waters off its coast."

The New York Times (10/25, Nossiter, 1.21M) says, "The suit, filed by Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, was part of the longtime quest for more of the $7 billion in royalties that Washington receives from the oil companies in the gulf."

DOJ_NMG_0086321

Officials and environmentalists in Louisiana "deem the new accord as a major victory for the state, because it implicitly acknowledges that drilling for oil and gas off Louisiana harms the coastline and contributes to devastating erosion. That, in turn, strengthens a push by the Louisiana Congressional delegation to obtain more oil and gas royalties out of the gulf, money that the state has said it will use to rebuild the coast." The Times notes, "The Senate has passed a bill that would give Louisiana and other coastal states 37.5 percent of the royalties. The House has yet to agree."

Schwarzenegger Chides Bush Over Global Warming. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Finnegan, Martelle, 918K) reports that in a "tart" letter to President Bush, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger chided the President "for ignoring his plea for more leeway to toughen California's vehicle exhaust standards, Schwarzenegger complained about 'the absence of a coherent federal policy' to stop global warming. At the same time, Schwarzenegger's Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, dismissed the governor's detachment from Bush as a ruse." The Times adds, "At tightly staged events this week in San Diego, Glendale and Oakland, Schwarzenegger has all but severed his Republican ties while playing up the value of bipartisan harmony. He has also taken pains to widen his appeal beyond white Republican men, his most loyal supporters. At every stop, Schwarzenegger has surrounded himself with African Americans or Latinos and stuck to themes that resonate with Democrats, independents and women: the environment and education."

Environmentalists Rate California Beaches' Levels Of Pollution. The Los Angeles Times (10/25, Kennedy) reports, "Los Angeles County predictably earned the dubious honor Tuesday of having the most polluted beaches in California. Less predictably, Long Beach jumped out as the worst offender among the worst. But having made those pronouncements, Heal the Bay, the environmental group that routinely conducts pollution studies along the California coast, declared this one a victory of sorts. The reason: a number of the usual cellar-dwellers passed with flying colors because of recent cleanup efforts." Mark Gold, executive director of Heal the Bay, "pointed to such perennial polluters as Will Rogers State Beach as examples of cleanup efforts along the coast that were starting to yield results."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Scam Features Fake Email From Mueller. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/25, Jordan) reports, "Think twice about answering e-mail from G-man. A new Internet scam promising cash for responding to a document request claims to be from FBI Director Robert S. Mueller. The top government cop's request is followed by a second e-mail threatening that 'failure to comply will result in charges being brought against the individual by the FBI.' 'This e-mail is a hoax,' the FBI said in an alert to consumers that was posted Tuesday on its Web site. 'Do not respond.'" The AP notes, "The spammed scan is the second in as many months to appear to be from Mueller."

ABC News (10/24, Ryan) reports on its Web site, "The e-mail contains information lifted from the FBI's Web site that descibes what an Identification Record is and how to obtain it from the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Services Division. … FBI officials say the hoax is a typical Nigerian scam, which has become more prevalent in recent years." ABC added that after the Mueller email, "individuals receive a second, more threatening notice, claiming to come from Donna Uzzell, another senior FBI official, which says, 'It has come to the attention of our Money Trafficking investigation department, that you have some funds valued at U.S $10.5 Million to your name. ... You are under an observational /Investigation in connection with money laundering.'"

Local TV News Reports Warn Of Scam. The email scam also was covered by local TV news broadcasts across the country. Some examples: WSB-TV Atlanta, (10/24, 11:10 p.m.) reported, "FBI director Robert Mueller is issuing an e-mail fraud alert tonight. Mueller says two e-mails with his name on them are circulating. First one says the recipient could be eligible for a big cash payment. The second e-mail threatens federal criminal charges if the recipient does not respond to first e-mail." WCPO-TV Cincinnati, (10/24, 11:11 p.m.) reported, "Think twice about answering e-mail from the FBI. A new internet scam promises cash for responding to a document request that claims to be from FBI director Robert Mueller. It is followed by a second email threatening that 'failure to comply will result in charges' and demands that a fee be sent to FBI Nigeria. The FBI says the email is a hoax and do not respond." KXXV-TV Waco, (10/24, 9:58 p.m.) noted, "This is the second scam in two months purporting to come from the top g-man."

$27 Million Worth Of Meth, Cocaine Seized In Georgia, 3 Arrested. The Atlanta Business Chronicle (10/24) reports federal officials "have busted three Mexican citizens living in metro Atlanta on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and crystal methamphetamine ('ice'). The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and the U.S. Attorney's Office jointly announced the filing of a federal criminal complaint. DEA also seized 145 pounds of ice and 72 kilograms of cocaine -- with a street value of $27 million -- in a house in Clayton County searched in conjunction with the arrests."

DOJ_NMG_0086322

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/25, Jefcoats) reports Clayton County Assistant Police Chief Jeff Turner "said the men kept a low profile. 'But that's what you'd expect if you had that amount of drugs and money around,' he said. … The arrests are the culmination of a month-long federal investigation by the U.S. Department of Drug Enforcement Administration and DeKalb Police Department."

Jonesboro, Georgia's News-Daily (10/25) reports the DEA and a metro-area drug task force have "seized 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine and 72 kilograms of cocaine from a Jonesboro house. … DEA officials believe the drugs, seized in a bust Monday, were being delivered to the house from Mexico and stashed there. They were then being delivered from Mexico to …Jonesboro and then distributed from Jonesboro to be sold on the street in Atlanta and in other cities along the East Coast."

On its Web site, WSB-TV, Atlanta (10/24) reports this latest drug bust "is bringing more than drugs and money – it's also bringing a title Atlanta does not want. Agents tell Channel 2 the metro area is now the largest meth distribution hub on the East Coast. Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration say it's a balancing act. They say they've reduced the number of local meth labs but are working to also crack down on international shipments, which make Atlanta number one for meth distribution on the East Coast."

On its Web site, WXIA-TV, Atlanta (10/24) reports the DEA "says it's another indication Atlanta is a meth hub. 'With the recent seizures of meth and ice in Atlanta, each one being larger than the other one, I don't want us to become numbed by the numbers,' said DEA Special Agent in Charge Sherri Strange. It is the third-largest seizure of meth for the DEA in Atlanta."

Local TV Coverage. WAGA-TV, Atlanta (10/24, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Federal officials say you are looking at more than $27 million worth of drugs, half cocaine and half methamphetamine."

WGCL-TV, Atlanta (10/24, 11:00 p.m.) aired, "You are looking at Atlanta's dose of reality. Twenty-seven million dollars worth of crystal meth, cocaine and cash, all seized in a single bust."

WSB-TV, Atlanta (10/24, 11:00 p.m.) aired, "Atlanta apparently has become the largest meth distribution hub on the East Coast. Today, federal authorities announced they made a huge dent by seizing drugs worth millions of dollars. About 27 million dollars in meth and cocaine from a home in Clayton County. … Authorities say they arrested three men linked to a Mexican drug ring. … In all they seized 145 pounds of methamphetamines and 72 grams of cocaine. They say that this was one of the largest busts of its kind in the metro area."

WXIA-TV, Atlanta (10/24, 11:00 p.m.) aired, "In Clayton, agents conducted one of the largest drug busts in state history and arrested three men. Nearly 27 million dollars worth of meth and cocaine and thousands in cash were found inside a home in Jonesboro."

Agents Shut Down Pharmacy In Louisiana. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (10/25) reports federal agents "shut down and searched an Elmwood pharmacy they suspect of shady Internet business practices on Tuesday, marking the second crackdown of its kind in East Jefferson this month. … Unlike the previously shuttered Elite Pharmacy…Pharmacy 101 began as a retail operation about two years ago and later added Internet sales, investigators said. … But similar to Elite, Drug Enforcement Administration officials said huge purchases of painkillers drew their attention to Pharmacy 101. They said the pharmacy was Louisiana's largest purchaser of oxycodone, used in OxyContin, and the third-biggest purchaser of hydrocodone, found in Lorcet, Lortab and Vicodin."

Five Face Drug-Distribution Charges In Indiana. The Fort Wayne (IN) Journal Gazette (10/25) reports federal prosecutors "have accused five men of drug distribution in the transportation of 1,000 pounds of marijuana – packaged in bales – from Texas to Fort Wayne. … According to federal court documents, an undercover Texas Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent tipped off authorities to the plan. … All five men were arrested. When questioned by agents, (one man) said he would be paid $10,000 for his role in the delivery."

Four Face Charges Following Marijuana Dispensary Raid In California. Torrance, California's Daily Breeze (10/24) reports federal agents "seized about 70 pounds of marijuana along with nearly 100 pot plants, a shotgun and a small amount of cash during last week's raid of a medical marijuana dispensary in Torrance, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman said Monday. Following the raid at Green Cross, four people "were taken into custody after they allegedly attempted to sell pot to undercover detectives working for LA IMPACT, a countywide task force with an emphasis on drug trafficking."

Meth Seized In Indiana Following Warning By Federal Authorities. The Indianapolis Star (10/24) reports Greenwood police "have seized $300,000 of methamphetamine -- a drug that police in Indiana have been fighting hard to eradicate -- in a bust involving a highly addictive and often-imported variety called 'ice.' … Greenwood police arrested two men Friday and seized two pounds of crystal methamphetamine. Federal authorities had warned local police that Mexican ice had been found in the northeastern United States and soon would be reaching the Midwest, said Greenwood Police Chief Joe Pitcher."

DOJ_NMG_0086323

Judge Says Michigan Doctor Ran "Prescription Mill." The Flint (MI) Journal (10/24) reports a one-time Flint Township doctor who "was convicted earlier this year for distribution of narcotic drugs will spend the rest of his life in prison. 'You were running a prescription mill,' U.S. District Judge Paul V. Gadola told Mukunda D. Mukherjee of Fenton, who formerly practiced as an M.D. … Mukherjee was indicted in June 2004 on one charge of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and 53 felony and misdemeanor counts of illegal distribution of various prescription painkillers, including OxyContin, Vicodin, morphine and drugs with codeine. … The investigation had started some four months earlier. Tipped off by a confidential informant, agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the state-local narcotics units, the Flint Area Narcotics Group and the Bay Area Narcotics Enforcement Team started a probe."

The Detroit Free Press (10/25) reports a federal judge "has sentenced a Flint-area doctor to 328 years in prison for illegally prescribing prescription drugs, one of the stiffest sentences ever handed down in an illegal prescription case in eastern Michigan. Gadola imposed the sentence Monday on Mukunda Dev Mukherjeree. … Gadola also ordered Mukherjeree to forfeit $150,000 in assets."

North Carolina Man Faces Federal Drug-Manufacturing Charges. The Staten Island Advance (10/24, Annese) reports that more than a year ago, when federal drug agents "raided his 600-plant marijuana warehouse in Port Richmond, Scott Lawler said the loss was disappointing, but 'it could have been worse,' the feds allege." A federal grand jury now has "indicted the North Carolina man on federal drug manufacturing charges -- charges that could bring him 10 years to life in prison. … Lawler, whose name was on the warehouse lease and who paid the security deposit with a personal check, was arrested this summer. The grand jury indicted him this month."

Convicted Doctor Criticizes Federal Investigation In Painkiller Case. The Morris (IL) Daily Herald (10/24) reports Dr. Parambaloth Edwin "believes the federal government spent five years and $5 million just to hand him six months in jail. 'A lot of money for nothing,' he said Monday, in the wake of his sentencing in federal district court in Chicago for failure to accurately track tens of thousands of tablets of prescription painkillers he dispensed through the years to patients. … He said Monday the Drug Enforcement Agency cleaned out his office during the case. He was charged in June 2005 on 17 counts of allegedly dispensing painkillers to patients without a legitimate medical purpose."

In California, Marijuana Activist's Trial Prompts Dispute Over Supporters' T-shirts, Buttons. The Fresno (CA) Bee (10/24) reports that in the upcoming trial of Merced marijuana activist Dustin Costa, prosecutor Karen Escobar "says the federal government — just like the defendant — has the right to a fair trial. To that end, she is asking a federal judge to prohibit Costa's supporters from wearing buttons, T-shirts or anything else that promotes legalizing medical marijuana. … The request prompted Costa's defense attorney, Robert Rainwater, to point out that Escobar was wearing a lanyard with 'DEA' on it, for the Drug Enforcement Administration — which could bias a jury in the opposite direction. Why should she have that right, Rainwater said, when supporters of Costa and medical marijuana might not."

